The Russians object to national missile defence for the same reason that the United Kingdom wants missile defences to be restricted, and believe that national missile defence preserves the credibility of their deterrent forces. If the Russians start to think that national missile defence can shoot down their warheads, they will want more of those warheads to overwhelm those defences. That is what the previous Conservative Government argued when they deployed more warheads on Trident than were deployed on Polaris, saying that that was necessary to overwhelm Soviet missile defences around Moscow.

Will the Foreign Office ask the Ministry of Defence how it will respond if Russia starts to deploy its own national missile defence? Will the MOD be forced to consider reversing the Government's welcome cuts in warhead numbers announced as part of the strategic defence review?

Another response to national missile defence could be to rely increasingly on launch on warning, or, in other words, launching a retaliatory strike on detecting an attack, rather than waiting for incoming missiles to land. That is the hair-trigger posture, which, as anyone who knows anything about strategic nuclear matters is aware, is inherently dangerous because it heightens the risk of accidental nuclear war. Indeed, for many years, people have been trying to find ways of moving away from those hair-trigger dangers.

Incredibly, documents published in the most recent edition of the useful American publication The Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists suggest that the United States is encouraging Russia to maintain a hair-trigger alert to allay Russian fears about national missile defence. The Americans say that they plan only a limited national missile defence which cannot challenge the credibility of Russian nuclear forces. However, Russia believes that that limited national missile defence is only the thin end of the wedge and that, at some later date, it will be expanded to provide a capability that will be effective against its nuclear forces as well as those of so-called rogue states.

Let us imagine that the United States deploys its national missile defence. What happens when, at a later date, scientists say that they are able to do more, and ask for missiles, radars and satellites so that they can work to achieve invulnerability against Russia as well as Korea. Is it credible that an American President in those circumstances would refuse to do that? He would be denounced and people would cry, "Why do we insist on invulnerability against North Korea, but accept vulnerability to Russia?" The argument about the thin end of the wedge is therefore persuasive.

If Russia does not compromise and the US proceeds with unilateral deployment of national missile defence, thereby abrogating the ABM treaty, what happens then? Russia has made clear that the START process would stop. It might not be able to afford to re-arm, but it would not feel bound by the START treaties. Verifiable reductions in Russian nuclear weapons would be a thing of the past and Russia's launch-on-warning posture would be strengthened, as it would fear that it would lose weapons if it did not use them. China will expand its nuclear forces, taking further cuts in global nuclear weapons off the agenda.

The comprehensive test ban treaty would be threatened because Russia and China in particular might insist on developing and testing new warheads that are more capable of penetrating the new missile defences. Agreeing the fissile material cut-off treaty would be more difficult, as China has already said that national missile defence will oblige it to continue producing fissile material for more weapons. Therefore, there would be no ABM treaty, the START process would reverse, the comprehensive test ban would unwind and there would be no progress on the fissile material cut-off treaty. The future of the non-proliferation treaty itself would appear uncertain. The nuclear weapon states committed themselves in article VI to act in good faith in disarmament measures. However, they would be seen to have reneged on that and, as a result, more states might consider nuclear weapons of their own and the whole non-proliferation regime would be under threat. Indeed, India and Pakistan might be even less likely to join the non-proliferation treaty.

There is still time for the United States and Russia to do a deal, but, given the forthcoming US elections, the prospects are not good. We must therefore start to consider what will happen if there is no deal and the US withdraws from the ABM treaty. Under those circumstances, would the Government co-operate with whatever the Americans ask for on radar upgrades and so on? Are we prepared passively to accept the new reality because it appears inevitable, even though we may not like it? Do we just sit and watch all the arms control treaties unravel, our own security situation worsen slowly and our relations with Russia deteriorate, damaging European security?

[Mr. Mike Gapes]

The issue has the potential to become the most divisive in NATO for 20 years. I do not want to go back to the situation in the 1980s, as those of us involved in the debate at that time know how damaging it was to the cohesion of the NATO alliance. The United States says that it will consult its allies before deciding to proceed. It is time for all NATO allies forcefully to make our views known. Do we share the views of Javier Solana, the EU High Representative, who states that national missile defence could be decoupling? Do we believe that it is worth jeopardising the future of the NATO alliance, European security, strategic arms control and security on the planet in the hope of, or aspiration to, some misguided technological fix? Clearly, we must say no to that and convince the United States that it must not go ahead with abrogating the ABM treaty.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Keith Vaz): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Gapes) for giving us the opportunity to debate this important issue. I pay tribute to his long-standing involvement in international affairs, to his close interest in nuclear issues and to the passionate and eloquent way in which he presented his case.

I know that the United States interest in the possible deployment of a national missile defence system has engaged the close interest of many hon. Members over the past few weeks and months. The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) responded in some detail to concerns raised on the issue during a debate in Westminster Hall on 3 May on the non-proliferation treaty review conference. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence also set out the Government's views on the matter in some detail in the House during the defence debate on 4 May. I know that the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs is also examining the issue in some detail, as part of its on-going inquiry into weapons of mass destruction.

I think that it is fair to say, therefore, that there has been no shortage of recent debate and discussion on the issue. For that reason, I apologise in advance if anything that I have to say is familiar to hon. Members who have followed the issue closely. I have no dramatic statements to make in response to my hon. Friend's initiative. He will not be surprised to hear that the Government's approach to the issue has not changed during the past fortnight. As my fellow Minister of State said on 3 May, and in his speech in New York to the NPT review conference, we recognise that United States interest in national missile defence raises some complex issues. As has been evident from the debate, these of course go wider than the potential impact on the anti-ballistic missile treaty.

First, I shall focus on that question, which has been the starting point for this afternoon's debate. In expressing views on the ABM treaty, we have been careful to emphasise that it is primarily a matter for the parties to that treaty. As my hon. Friend knows, we are not such a party; that is an important distinction in international law, and one that we need to keep firmly in mind when debating this issue. It explains why we have not been, and will not be, directly involved in negotiations on the future of the treaty. It explains also why we have not offered proposals of our own on whether or how the treaty might be amended to accommodate the limited national missile defence system that the United States Administration has discussed with Russia.

Some hon. Members have asked, not only today but on previous occasions, whether, in the Government's view, the sort of NMD system that the US is considering would be compatible with the present terms of the ABM treaty. The US is not arguing that the system would be compatible; indeed, it has acknowledged that if it were to decide to proceed with the deployment of the sort of system that it currently envisages, amendments to the present terms of the treaty would be required. That is why the US has sought negotiations with Russia to that end.

Presidents Clinton and Yeltsin agreed at Cologne in June 1999 that the US and Russia should hold discussions on the ABM treaty and on further reductions in their respective nuclear arsenals. We welcomed that move. A number of rounds of such discussions have since taken place. It is no secret that these discussions have not been easy. However, it is not for us to attempt to intrude on them in an effort to be helpful. We have no intention of further complicating what are already highly complex and sensitive discussions. Neither the US nor Russia, nor anyone else, would thank us for that.

We have stressed consistently at the highest level that if the US decides to proceed with the deployment of a national missile defence system, we strongly hope that it will be in the context of agreement with Russia. We have made clear to both sides the importance that we continue to attach to the ABM treaty, and our wish to see it preserved. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister spelt that out clearly in his meeting last month in London with President Putin. He also made it clear that we hope that Russia will engage in earnest in negotiations with the US on this issue.

Russia cannot have failed to appreciate the strength of concerns in the US about the acquisition of long-range ballistic missiles by countries of concern. As both my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office have said, we understand these concerns. We do not believe that any responsible Government, including the Russian Government, can afford to ignore that threat. At the same time, we continue to value the strategic stability which the ABMT provides.

We believe that it is in Russia's interest, too, to see that stability is preserved. The Russians have made it clear that they wish to see significant cuts in US and Russian nuclear arsenals. So we believe that it is strongly in Russia's own interests to engage seriously with the US over its concerns about the long-range missile threat, and at the same time over the START 3 treaty.

The US Administration have said publicly that the President would have to decide whether to withdraw from the ABM treaty if the US decided to proceed with the deployment of a limited NMD system but had been unable to persuade Russia to agree modifications to the treaty to permit it.

A second question raised by hon. Members over the past few weeks has concerned potential UK involvement in any US NMD system. Let me be clear about the present position. The US has not taken a decision to deploy such a system. It will not do so until later in the year, at the earliest. Only if and when that decision has been taken might the US Administration put any request to us in relation to the possible use of facilities in this country for NMD purposes.

Reports that we have already agreed to host elements of the system are simply untrue. We cannot reasonably be expected to say now how we might respond to such a request, if and when it comes, as we cannot know now in what circumstances such a request might be put to us. All that we can sensibly say is that we would naturally give any such request careful consideration, in the light of the circumstances at that time.

My hon. Friend talked about deterrence. Neither we nor the United States are about to give up our long-standing policy of deterrence, notwithstanding my hon. Friend's eloquence and passion. However, the question of so-called rogue states is more complex. Many are concerned in the United States that they themselves may in future be deterred from intervening in support of their allies by rogue states possessing long-range missiles and weapons of mass destruction. That concern requires consideration going far beyond long-standing thinking about traditional defence and deterrence. However, it does not mean giving up that fundamental tenet of our policy.

It has been suggested during debates over the recent past that there have been significant differences in the views expressed by Ministers and Departments. I am happy to have the opportunity to put the record straight. No such differences exist. I hope that what I have said will have made that position absolutely clear.

I reaffirm that progress on arms control remains one of the Government's highest priorities. As we have been discussing the issue, our officials have been working hard in New York for a successful outcome to the five-yearly non-proliferation treaty review conference. I am sure that the House will join me in expressing the hope that their efforts will meet with success.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Two o'clock.

Construction Industry

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Clelland.]

2.30 pm

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Mr. Nick Raynsford): I am pleased to have the opportunity to initiate this debate on the future of the construction industry. It is entirely appropriate to use the facilities of Westminster Hall for a debate that, I am delighted to see, has attracted a significant number of hon. Members from different parties, which reflects the importance of the industry. It is not appropriate to refer to both sides of the Chamber because there is a lot of overlap, which is thoroughly healthy.

The construction industry is important for a number of reasons, one of which is its scale. It has an annual turnover of £65 billion—some 8 per cent. of gross domestic product—it employs 1.4 million people or 1.7 million if the professionals and consultants are included, and it consists of 160,000 companies. But it is not just size that matters. The construction industry is important because of its vital role as a key delivery mechanism for the improvement of our economic and social infrastructure. The public sector alone accounts for some £25 billion of the industry's turnover, which is 40 per cent. of the total. Railways and other public transport facilities, hospitals, schools, universities, housing and other public services depend on high-quality construction. Similarly, in the private sector, services and industries depend on efficient, reliable, good-value construction for the delivery of plans to improve their services to consumers.

The Government came to power with a commitment to invest in the modernisation of Britain and to improve its economy and social infrastructure. Construction plays a vital role in the delivery of those improvements. British construction companies are world leaders in many respects. They are renowned for innovative engineering, high-quality design and architecture, and they are world leaders in project finance. They are major players in the supply of materials and components, project management and professional consultancy. They earn around £10 billion a year in overseas earnings.

However, the industry also has problems. It has traditionally been fragmented and even the largest United Kingdom contractors are small in comparison with the major continental, American and Japanese companies and, in a globally competitive market, that sometimes matters. Profit margins have traditionally been low and construction companies have seen relatively poor stock market valuations.

The industry is one of the UK's worst polluters. Every year it produces some 70 million tonnes of waste material, with some 13 million tonnes of that being material that is delivered to sites but never used. The industry does not have a good record on training, despite the sterling efforts of the Construction Industry Training Board. It has one of the worst records of any industry for health and safety with around 4,000 serious accidents and only rarely fewer than 80 deaths a year. The work force is ageing and has a very small proportion of women and representatives of ethnic minorities. Only 3 per cent. of construction professionals and 1 per cent. of craft operatives are women and only 1.7 per cent. come from ethnic minorities, compared with 6 per cent. in the total work force. In the domestic sector, the industry's reputation is tarnished by the often outrageous activities of cowboy builders.

Our task is to help the industry to build on its strengths, to continue the process of improving its standards and at the same time to bear down on the problems and difficulties that hold it back.

Aware of the vital role of construction, and of the need for radical improvements in performance, my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister asked Sir John Egan to chair a construction task force to review the performance of the industry and to recommend changes to improve its delivery and effectiveness. Sir John and his team reported in July 1998. "Rethinking Construction" is an excellent report, which built on, supported and extended the work and recommendations of Sir Michael Latham's equally important report "Constructing the Team" which was published a few years earlier. We owe a considerable debt of gratitude to both Sir Michael and Sir John for their mould-breaking contributions to improving the culture and performance of the construction industry.

"Rethinking Construction" came to radical conclusions, yet it reflected a substantial consensus emerging among many leading figures in the industry. Its recommendations have won wide acceptance, not in every detail but as a strategy that points the way forward and gives urgency to the process of reform. I shall not delay the proceedings by trying to summarise in detail the report's many recommendations.

The key conclusions were that capital costs and construction time could be reduced by 10 per cent. a year, year on year; performance on predictability in relation to budget, time, defects and accidents could be improved by 20 per cent. a year, year on year; and productivity, turnover and profits could also be increased by 10 per cent. a year, year on year. At first sight, those appear to be bold targets. However, they are only modest advances on the targets that Sir Michael Latham set out in his earlier report. As the task force pointed out, the best clients and suppliers are already close to achieving them.

The task force identified a need for leadership by clients, and especially by Government and the public sector. That leadership would demonstrate what could be achieved and would disseminate those lessons across the industry as a whole. That represented a major challenge for the Government, the public sector and UK plc. It was also a unique opportunity. We have responded to that challenge and grasped the opportunity.

The construction industry is large and varied. It is deeply embedded in the fabric of our economy and society, and I do not pretend that there are any magic wand solutions. Success will depend on concerted and sustained action across a broad range of issues, which must be pushed forward boldly, pursued persistently and stuck to resolutely. It is less than two years since "Rethinking Construction" was published, but I am pleased to say that there are already signs of substantial progress.

Before I outline what has been achieved, I must stress the importance of the broader context within which the construction industry must operate. As an investment industry, it is especially vulnerable to wide swings in demand. Anyone in construction can tell us that the boom-and-bust approach that characterised the economic management of the previous Government had a disastrous impact on the industry.

The first, and perhaps most important, role for the Government is to manage the economy so as to deliver the steady growth that is vital to a healthy construction industry. Because of prudent macro-economic management, construction is benefiting from an economy that is growing steadily. The prospects for continuing steady low-inflation growth have rarely looked better. That is true for the United Kingdom domestic economy and for export markets on the continent. It is beginning to come true in south-east Asia, where Japan and the other tiger economies are now recovering from the shock of their recent collapse.

Secondly, apart from creating the right macro-economic environment, the Government have also broken away from the pernicious tradition of annuality in Government spending. With three-year spending plans and the move towards resource accounting, not least for local authority housing revenue accounts, we are enabling public sector clients of construction in both local and central Government to plan their spending over a period of years. That will enable them to secure a steadier and more cost-effective programme of construction work, and to build longer-term relationships, which is a fundamental element of the partnering approach that is advocated by Sir Michael Latham and Sir John Egan. From next autumn, local authorities will be required to draw up business plans to help all concerned to plan for the most effective use of resources. The best value reviews, assessments and performance measures will also contribute a powerful incentive to improve whole-life value through construction.

Thirdly, we have provided for sustained programmes of expenditure on the extension and improvement of many public services, notably hospitals, schools, social housing and transport infrastructure. As announced in the Budget, spending on gross capital formation will increase over the next five years from £24.1 billion a year to £41 billion a year.

In those three ways, the Government have played a key role in helping to ensure that the construction industry benefits from a steadier and more predictable work load than for many years. That gives the industry a secure base and the prospects that it needs to make essential major investments in new technology, improved processes and recruiting and training a high calibre work force.

We have also taken a series of measures to promote the radical reforms advocated in "Rethinking Construction". First, 18 months ago, we helped the industry to set up the Movement for Innovation—M4I—board and the housing forum to promote and disseminate innovation in the industry at large and in the housing sector. We invited the leading plants and suppliers to propose demonstration projects that would illustrate innovative approaches, measure their performance and share and help to spread their experience and lessons. I am pleased to report that 235 demonstration projects, worth about £3.5 billion, have been submitted, including 56 housing projects and 179 non-housing projects. That is seven times the level for which Sir John Egan called in his report. It is a great tribute to the construction industry that it has responded with such enthusiasm, and on such a scale, to the challenge laid down in "Rethinking Construction".

Secondly, we established the central and local government task forces to promote radical improvements in the performance of public sector clients. In April last year, my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary launched the achieving excellence campaign, with challenging targets, action plans and regular measurement and monitoring of performance to raise the performance of Government Departments and agencies. The pioneering building down barriers project, which is run by the Ministry of Defence and supported by my Department, has shown impressive results. Whole-life costs are down by between 7 per cent. at Wattisham and 14 per cent. at Aldershot. Construction time has been reduced by 20 per cent., and wastage has been almost eliminated.

Turning to local government, the Deputy Prime Minister and Sir Jeremy Beecham wrote to local authorities last July, inviting them to commit themselves to similar targets and programmes as part of the best value initiative. The local government task force had its first substantive meeting in January this year, and launched its campaign at a conference six weeks ago. We already have 70 demonstration projects from local authorities, including road repairs, bridges, schools and housing.

Thirdly, also last July, and again building on Sir John Egan's recommendations, we challenged the leading clients from both the public and private sectors, to draw up a clients charter to encapsulate and drive forward a radical improvement in client and industry performance. A draft of the charter is currently out for consultation. I am confident that by around the end of the year, we will have achieved our target of getting enough clients signed up to account for 50 per cent. of construction procurement. That will provide a major impetus for improvement across the industry.

Fourthly, we have set in hand an important initiative to improve the industry's performance on respect for people issues—that is, valuing the people who work in the industry and encouraging policies that promote diversity, health, safety, good site conditions, welfare and training. That has been widely welcomed—not least by industry leaders, who appreciate that their growing recruitment and retention problems can be resolved only by delivering radical improvements in the way in which they treat their work force. That includes attracting more women and ethnic minorities to view construction as a potential career. This autumn, we hope to start trialling, with the demonstration projects, a set of performance measures on respect for people issues.

Fifthly, we took the initiative to improve the industry's performance in respect of sustainability and minimisation of waste. In February last year, we issued a consultation paper and encouraged the establishment of an industry group, under Sir Martin Laing's able chairmanship, to raise awareness, demonstrate the business case for sustainable construction and help the industry to measure its performance. Last month, we published the strategy paper "Building a better quality of life". It sets out our priorities, including better use of existing assets, improved design to minimise waste, minimising whole-life consumption of energy, and a variety of other measures designed to achieve improvements in environmental performance and greater profitability for the industry. The assumption that environmental targets can be met only at a greater cost is one of the fallacies of the current debate. Cutting out waste saves money, and many environmental improvements will benefit the profitability of the industry.

Sixthly, we are taking steps to encourage improved design. In particular, we want public sector clients to lead the way by adopting a team-based approach to design. Design should be visually attractive and imaginative, respect its locality and environment, allow quick, reliable and safe construction, and deliver maximum value, effectiveness and efficiency. As recently as this week, we launched a new design guide to encourage quality design throughout public planning.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): I should be grateful if the Minister would explain to what extent the house-building industry has been consulted on the design guide. Those in the industry seem to feel that the Minister was criticising them for not executing good design. What was the policy imperative that brought about the design guide? Was it simply that, in future, building density will be far more concentrated?

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman raises a valid point about the purpose of the design guide. I shall return to his earlier question on consultation in a moment, but the purpose of the design guide is to improve standards of design. Those who look at the performance of designers in this country will know that, at their best, they are world class. Sadly, that high quality is not to be seen in all the buildings that we construct. There are too many examples of shoddy, second-rate buildings that damage our environment, and we want to raise the general standard. I should say in a completely non-partisan way that the Secretary of State for the Environment in the previous Conservative Government, the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), had an equal passion for improving the quality of design. We are simply pursuing and developing that agenda.

I have met regularly with house builders, and forcefully made the point that we are keen to improve standards of design, so they are well aware of our views. It is in everyone's interest that the guidance is followed. It is not restrictive; it does not try to impose a blueprint; it does not say, "We know best"; but it does say, "We want to improve the quality of design in the interests of the environment, the public and good quality building."

In respect of measures relating to the construction task force, I turn to the publication last May of the first set of key performance indicators, which were based on the "Rethinking Construction" targets to which I referred. Last month, we published figures for the end of the first full year, which showed improvements in some areas but plenty of scope for progress. Measurement is a key to driving forward improved performance—whether in terms of value for money, construction time and predictability, health and safety, diversity or sustainability. It will enable individual companies or projects to compare their performance with others, identify areas of weakness and provide a tremendous motivation for continuous improvement. We are steadily improving and extending the measures, so that, before too long, they will cover the full range of issues to which I have referred. In time, they will provide a powerful incentive and tool for improving performance.

The construction task force suggested that its recommendations would be widely taken up only when they were seen to be successful, hence the emphasis on demonstration projects. We must show what can be achieved, before we start to disseminate the lessons.

We must create the mechanisms to help the industry to be aware of and understand the lessons. That is why, 18 months ago, we established the construction best practice programme. It is has grown increasingly popular, and, so far, there have been more than 70,000 requests for help or advice. Next week the M4I board will launch the knowledge exchange, a net-based system to help the industry to hear about good practice and exchange experience.

It is still early to judge the impact of the initiatives. It is scarcely 18 months since we began the drive to promote the implementation of "Rethinking Construction". The main representative bodies of the industry—the Construction Industry Training Board, the umbrella groups and the professional bodies—agree that "Rethinking Construction" has given an invaluable impetus to reform. Unquestionably, the initiatives that I have described have aroused real enthusiasm across a wide swathe of the industry and a real determination among many leading clients and suppliers to rethink construction.

I have focused on our efforts to improve the performance of the industry. However, we have also taken important initiatives to protect consumers and improve standards in the domestic sector. In April 1998, we published a consultation paper on tackling cowboy builders. In July 1998, in response to the views expressed about that paper, we brought together a working group, under the chairmanship of Tony Merricks, to develop a practical scheme to tackle cowboy builders. The group reported to me in August 1999, and we accepted its recommendations. Last month, we launched the first of two pilots in Birmingham. Once sufficient numbers of builders have been assessed and registered, the scheme will be open to consumers in Birmingham, probably in June or July this year. A second pilot will be launched in Somerset next week. By the end of the year, we should have gained enough experience from the pilots to decide whether the scheme should be extended nationwide.

Mr. Baldry: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way a second time. We have a strange format here, Mr. Deputy Speaker, which does not encourage interventions and lulls us into a false sense of consensus. That is why our forefathers were wise not to have a horseshoe shape for the main Chamber.

Is the Minister concerned that, in the whole of the midlands, only about 100 building firms have signed up for the pilot scheme? That suggests that a purely voluntary scheme will not work, particularly if it is a complicated scheme for which people have to fill in huge numbers of forms. Clearly, firms are not supporting the scheme, and many of them probably feel that they are better off with the cowboys.

Mr. Raynsford: I rather value the horseshoe shape in this Chamber. I believe that encouraging consensus, where genuinely possible, is a thoroughly good thing.

I would have thought that there would have been consensus on this issue. I have with me a copy of a report from the beat the cowboys working party produced by the previous Government. It was published in 1988.

Mr. Baldry: Before my time.

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman, who served as a Minister with responsibility for construction in the intervening period, will, no doubt, wish to explain to the House why the previous Govt took no action to implement the recommendations of that working party. So far, about 250 builders in the Birmingham area have registered an interest in the new quality mark scheme, although we have not yet launched the formal publicity and marketing campaign. The reports suggesting that there is no interest are wide of the mark.

Such schemes will always have a chicken and egg problem. Builders will not be keen to sign up until they see positive results, as consumers start placing their orders. Equally, the scheme cannot be promoted to the public until enough builders have signed up and there is a reputable group from which the public can choose. That is the chicken and egg issue. We are determined to have a strong and reputable group of builders in place, before we launch the scheme to the public. I am confident that we will achieve that. In that way, we will ensure effective action to tackle cowboy builders 12 years after the previous Government talked about it but failed to act. More than 200 builders in Birmingham have shown sufficient interest to join the scheme and have been sent registration packs—and that is before serious marketing has started.

Finding a builder who delivers competent, reliable work is never easy. The quality mark scheme is aimed at giving domestic consumers the information that they need to choose a competent builder or tradesman to maintain, repair or alter their homes. Builders who register with the scheme will be assessed against basic criteria of technical competence, financial soundness and training, including management, and craft skills. They will agree to follow a code of practice, to conform to a complaints procedure and to use an insurance-backed warranty scheme. We will develop the scheme carefully, building on the experience that we gain from the pilots. It represents an historic innovation and a major step forward for the industry and especially for consumers. We must not let them down. If it takes a little time to get it right, it will be time well spent—not 12 years, I hasten to add, but a matter of months.

Some feel that a voluntary scheme may not be sufficient to curb the cowboys. We agree that tougher measures are needed. In parallel with my Department's initiatives, the Department of Trade and Industry published in July last year the White Paper "modern markets: confident consumers". That included proposals to amend the Fair Trading Act 1973 to provide a power for the courts to grant injunctions against specific practices carried out by specified trades, a power for the courts to ban from trading for a period traders with a history of disregarding their legal obligations and a power for the Secretary of State to make orders by secondary legislation to specify that certain unfair practices should become criminal offences.

Rogue traders usually operate at local level. Colleagues at the Department of Trade and Industry propose that the new powers should be available to local authority trading standards officers as well as to the Office of Fair Trading. Those legislative changes, taken together with our quality mark scheme, will in time have a major impact in helping consumers to find a trustworthy builder or tradesman and in helping consumers and trading standards officers to put a stop to the outright rogues.

I have outlined a number of initiatives that we have taken to promote a radical improvement in the performance of the construction industry and to protect consumers from cowboy builders. Time prevents me from covering many others, such as changes to the building regulations to assist people with disabilities and improve energy efficiency in buildings as well as the measures that we have taken to assist British construction companies to compete successfully and secure work in overseas markets.

Our initiatives have been widely welcomed by all the representative bodies. Perhaps most encouraging of all, the old adversarialism, which was the bane of construction, has begun to give way to a genuine determination among leading clients, professionals, contractors and suppliers to work together to promote innovation.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I do not want to put my hon. Friend on the spot, but I was pleased to receive a submission from the Federation of Master Builders. The first point that it identified was the equalisation of the VAT regime to help with repair, maintenance and improvement. I know that that is subject to review by the Treasury, but, given the strong support from the Rogers urban task force, I hope that anything that the Minister can do in his Department, which I have to believe is in favour of the move, will help the construction industry by making sure that we have a level playing field from the outset.

Mr. Raynsford: My hon. Friend raises a fair point, which exercises many people in the industry and in the House. While taxation is a matter for the Chancellor, there is genuine interest across Government in the way in which we can use economic instruments more effectively to promote our objectives. Following the Budget, there has been a move to consult about changes to stamp duty and to encourage activity in urban areas. A wider debate about the use of economic instruments, including VAT, is likely in the months ahead. We shall make clear our response to the important Rogers report in the forthcoming urban White Paper.

With a sound economic basis for solid growth and a real sense of excitement about the scope for transforming the industry's performance and profitability, prospects for the future of the construction industry are better than at any time during the past 20 years. However, this is no time for complacency. The clear lesson from the past few years is that British construction has the capacity to be—and at its best, it already is—a world-class industry. A commitment to continuous improvement and a determination by the industry and the Government to work together to drive forward the Egan agenda, are the only ways to ensure that the industry can take on and beat the best in the world. That is our objective, and we are determined to achieve it.

3 pm

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): I should start by declaring an interest. The Register of Members' Interests shows that I am the director of a family property company that has a subsidiary that is involved in building, and I am a fellow of the Chartered Institute of Building. For three years, I have tried to avoid getting involved in debates on the building industry, but because my colleagues are serving on Committees upstairs, I volunteered to participate in this debate.

It may be the effect of this Chamber's shape or the fact that it is Thursday afternoon, but I have to say that I agree with quite a lot of the Minister's comments—I am sure that many other hon. Members do too.

The building industry is difficult to measure. When I was doing some research for this debate, I found that some sources suggested that the appropriate figure was more than 5 per cent. of gross domestic product, others put it at 9 per cent. and the Minister gave the figure of 8 per cent. One source states that the industry employs 1.4 million, but that figure can be worked up to nearly 2 million if one includes professionals and those who supply the industry.

During the past three years, I have observed that on occasion statements are made in the House because a particular firm or industry has problems, but on other occasions hundreds of jobs, or a few thousand, may be discussed. The building industry involves thousands of jobs. I do not need to remind hon. Members that dividing the number of people who are employed in the industry by the number of constituencies shows that, in our constituencies, more people are employed in building and its allied industries than in any other industry.

What the industry produces is vital. In the modern age, we spend most of our day in a product of the building industry. The importance of producing decent, quality buildings has become more pressing with our move from the previous century to this one.

The building industry always has certain problems—it is a cyclical industry. The Minister said that boom and bust had been eliminated, but that remains to be seen. Throughout my lifetime, and those of my father and grandfather, both of whom were builders, there have been cycles. Sometimes, the upside of a cycle can be just as devastating for the industry as the downside. When one is competing for contracts and hoping that one will have the labour for a particular job six or 12 months hence, a housing boom may cause one concern because someone may come along and offer one's workers higher wages, and one might be left with labourers who are not sufficiently skilled to complete the contract.

Those who work in the industry experience terrible problems getting paid—customers do not always provide builders with their due. If one supplies a person with a refrigerator, one can always take it back, but if one has built an extension on a house, and a long legal argument ensues, it is much harder to do that. Bills and cash flow are important to the industry.

The industry has a tremendous image problem. Much of the difficulty involves cowboy builders, who were discussed earlier. People who have visited me in my surgery because of problems with builders usually thought that they would make a saving, perhaps by making a cash payment. They experienced difficulties because they did not go to someone who was reputable and were not willing to pay a proper price for a proper job. People sometimes get caught in that way.

I welcome the Government's and the industry's initiatives.

Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby): I was interested by the hon. Gentleman's comments on debt and cash flow in the building industry, which may be an historical problem. Does he agree that the introduction of the Late Payment of Commercial Debts (Interest) Act 1998 has done much to help small businesses, especially those in the construction industry?

Mr. Syms: The 1998 Act has been helpful to some businesses, but a real problem remains. People sometimes commit to building jobs, but do not appreciate the full cost or the expense of additional extras. They may suddenly find at the end of a job that they do not have the resources to pay for it. One ends up in arguments or litigation much more frequently than one used to years ago.

The biggest enemy of cowboy builders is the industry itself, as those who work in the industry appreciate the damage that they do to it. The quality of work must be secured. I am glad that the Treasury is considering the VAT regime, but at present it does not provide great incentives for getting rid of cowboy builders because people often try to save a little by avoiding tax.

I welcome Michael Latham's report; it was a good start in the effort to create a strategy for the industry. Sir John Egan's report is also very good. Of its key points, I think that we would all agree with the need for committed leadership for the industry, a focus on the customer—these days, one lives and dies by the way in which one treats one's customers—integrated processes and teams, a quality-driven agenda and a commitment to people. All those aims are vital for the industry.

While echoing the caveats of my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry), I welcome the attempts at the quality mark scheme in Birmingham and Somerset. One needs a critical mass in these matters, but there must also be a method of differentiating quality builders who will provide a decent product from those who are less good. We hope that the industry will adopt that scheme and give it an opportunity to run. If it does not work, we shall have to try something else.

[Mr. Syms]

There is also a problem, as always, in relation to employment training and skills shortages. Because of the cyclical nature of the industry, qualified people often leave it and do not return, perhaps because they get work in factories, where they find the temperature warmer and the work easier. At the moment, there is labour market pressure because of the years of economic growth that we have experienced, and because of events in Ireland. Growth rates are quite high, and there is a construction boom over there. Women and ethnic minorities were mentioned, and it is true that there are not enough members of either group in the industry. However, anyone who has worked in the construction industry will appreciate the contribution made by the Irish contingent, and its absence might be causing a problem.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury): It is important to recognise that in Ireland a great deal of the construction spend is a combination of catch-up from a very low base and a culture in which a replacement building is put in place, especially for family dwellings, without demolishing the previous one. In this country, we have one of the world's longest tail demolition rates—a fact that will help when making a comparison. Furthermore, a great deal of Irish construction is still financed by European Union grant aid, because Ireland is on a different base formula.

Mr. Syms: My hon. Friend makes a good point. I am aware of the fact that there are many experts and people with many years' experience in the industry here today.

In terms of skills shortages, the number of applicants for civil engineering courses has fallen from 5,100 in 1994 to 3,800 in 1997. That trend must be reversed, and we must make the industry more attractive to those looking for a long-term career. Everyone these days seems to want to go into the media, but one can have a worthwhile career in the building industry.

We must continue the line adopted by Latham and Egan in terms of the need for better leadership in the building industry, and the need to do all that we can to weed out the cowboy builders who give the industry such a bad name. The industry also needs a stable economic environment, and I hope that the economy continues to grow. As I have said, economic cycles have always been with us, and I believe that they always will be. However, if we can maintain more balance between the upswings and the downswings, perhaps we shall stand a better chance of succeeding.

The Government have got one thing badly wrong. That is the construction industry scheme, in relation to the tax scheme that has been introduced. I know that it had its genesis under the previous Government, because I had a go at Ministers about it then, although they did not seem to listen. The present Government made several changes when they introduced the scheme. Under the old scheme, using the 714 certificate, one could fax through and photocopy certificates, which worked pretty well. It is unbelievable that anyone could introduce a scheme in which people now have to drive around and physically show the certificate to the person with whom they are doing business. In the age of electronic commerce, that is not a terribly good idea. However, I am glad that the Government have taken on board some of the problems and started to amend the scheme.

Treasury officials always complain that the industry does not pay its full whack of tax and national insurance, but it is difficult for it to do so, given its structure. In trying to crack down under successive Governments, the Treasury has not thought through the consequences, and has sometimes done the industry great harm. As always, those who are law abiding and try to do what the Government want by obeying regulations do not benefit, as opposed to those who ignore the regulations and work in the cash economy.

This is a vital industry: if it prospers, the nation will prosper. Provided that we can find decent leaders and encourage young people to attend appropriate university courses and training schemes, we can provide better buildings that will benefit everyone in this country.

This is a good subject to debate in this Chamber. It has not been discussed sufficiently, whether in the House or in Standing or Select Committees. I hope that this will be the first of a number of debates on the construction industry, and I look forward to members of all parties bringing their experience to the subject.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): Order. Before I call the next speaker, I should say that several hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye. If all want to speak, could they please try to be as brief as possible?

3.11 pm

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): I will take your words to heart, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and give other hon. Members the chance to bring their experience to bear on this important debate.

I should begin by declaring an interest. I am a civil engineer—non-practising, but I am hoping to do better—and a fellow of the Institution of Civil Engineers. It is good to see that many of the hon. Members who are chartered engineers are present today, and I shall extend that observation even to the odd architect. [Laughter.] He is a good chap really.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir S. Chapman) has been a Member of Parliament for a long time. He has been called lots of things, but never odd. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chidgey: I shall contemplate your intervention, Mr. Deputy Speaker, when time permits.

I want to deal with three points in this debate, which is concerned primarily with the construction industry. However, we have spent time discussing the somewhat different issue of housing, and with regard to the Minister's response to an intervention on tax regimes, a little more support for the use of tax regimes to encourage housing development on brownfield sites, rather than greenfield sites, would have been helpful. That is an area in which much can be done.

Before developing my main argument, I should repeat an apology. Because of a constituency engagement, I cannot stay for the end of the debate. I have already spoken to the Minister about the matter, so I am sure that he will understand.

There have been mammoth changes in the construction industry in my professional life, and we must prepare for the future challenges. The construction industry has formed a very important part of our employment base for many decades, if not centuries. As has been said, when there is a recession, the construction industry always bears the brunt and experiences the first fallout. We are not talking about the loss of a few thousand jobs; often, as many as half a million jobs are lost in a short space of time. In the main, those people do not return to the industry, even when the economy picks up or there is a boom, so the industry is always playing catch-up.

Changes in the construction industry in the past few decades are important to the way in which we view its future. When I started as a professional civil engineer in the 1970s, the construction industry was benefiting greatly by the oil boom in the middle east, and British contractors and consultants led the way because of our long-standing ties with those countries and Governments. That was a great source of export income for this country, and presented significant opportunities for the industry and the development of its skills. Of course, it did not start there. In the 1950s, the industry had a great dowry from the days of empire. In post-colonial times, local civil services continued to award contracts to British contractors and consultants because that was the system that they knew and respected; they understood the way that we worked and were reassured by that. The problem was that people sometimes became complacent in the knowledge that work would come their way.

At that time we had a huge, worldwide export market, in which the construction industry was a major player. The Minister's comment that our industry has the potential to be world class rather shook me, because, until fairly recently, I had always thought it to be so. Traditionally, it has been world class and a world leader. I accept that it has to change: we can no longer scour the world to pick up civil engineering contracts in roads, bridges and railways. Times have changed since the days when thousands of men could be put on-site for a job somewhere on the sub-continent of India. The middle east market is much smaller than it was, and is serviced mainly by local employees, technicians and engineers.

The internationally funded projects that we used to bid for, and win, are nowadays too few, and too unprofitable—far too many British firms compete for returns that are far too small. For example, a few years ago there were some 4,000 registered consulting engineers in this country. Whenever those 4,000 engineers bid for a European-funded project, they were bidding for a place on the shortlist for the European contender. That was an almost impossible situation.

Mr. Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby): In 1998, professionals in the construction industry who worked in overseas markets contributed £2.3 billion to the British economy in invisible earnings, which equates to 20 per cent. of the total. Is that not a sign that we are world leaders and world class, and that we should continue to market that throughout the world?

Mr. Chidgey: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making the important point that 20 per cent. of our invisible earnings come from the professional and technical skills of the construction industry. However, two decades ago the proportion was 40 per cent. or more. The industry vied strongly with the financial institutions, which are always quoted as the main source of invisibles. Yes, we are still major players, but we will not be in any shape to continue along those lines unless we look to the future and address the problems.

The high-value overseas markets for our construction industry, in terms of construction management and engineering skills, are no longer in the world as we used to know it, but in north America and Europe.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that when we talk about the value of the construction industry in relation to exports, we should consider the fact that Berlin, for example—especially east Berlin—is a vast construction camp where many British companies are involved?

Mr. Chidgey: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. I recently had the good fortune to visit Berlin on parliamentary business, and saw the latest developments in the German Parliament's move from Bonn to Berlin, which is probably the biggest construction project of its type in the western world.

I do not know whether there are opportunities for the British construction industry beyond those that we have grasped, because I am not involved in that day-to-day aspect of the profession. The point that I am trying to make is that the market has changed dramatically. The industry has made great strides in recognising that, in order to stay in business, but the Government must recognise it too.

Consulting engineers and contractors have changed their way of operation in response to the Latham report and they are responding now to Sir John Egan's efforts in the Movement for Innovation board. I welcome that, because it is a good initiative. We can do a lot more, and I hope that the Government will be minded to take the necessary interest to ensure that we do more to introduce best practice, initiatives and progress.

I am aware that other hon. Members want to speak, so I shall be brief in my final comments. Much more could be done in the United Kingdom. We have an horrendous legacy of decaying infrastructure, which is inevitable because we were one of the first countries to industrialise, so our infrastructure is that much older. It needs attention and we must consider how to maintain, improve and develop it to meet the needs of society in transport and public buildings. We must examine more closely and work more readily on sustainable development. I want to place on record the work of the Institution of Civil Engineers in throwing off the image of dusty, dog-in-the-manger engineers which the profession had and being forthright and visionary in their approach to sustainable development. We should welcome that and pursue it, and the Government have a role to play.

Our export market presents a tremendous challenge in sustainable development and the environment. When we consider a healthy environment, we tend to think of reducing the pollution and fuel consumption of cars on motorways, but for people in much of the world it means clean water, sanitation and food that they can rely on, and that presents tremendous opportunities for British companies.

[Mr. Chidgey]

We have the opportunity to develop sustainable skills. There are too few engineers and technicians. I heard today that half the structural engineers employed in this country are now imported not just from Europe, but from further afield. We are importing the basic engineering skills that we have taken for granted since Victorian times, which is an illustration of how far we have gone in being unable to sustain the skills that we need to drive our economy.

There is a huge problem with the public attitude that engineering and manufacturing is a dying industry. With the problems at Rover and Ford at Dagenham, parents do not encourage their children to go into engineering because they believe that there may be no decent jobs available. Nothing could be further from the truth. Engineering is the essential industry that drives our economy and sustains the quality of life that the people of this country have the right to expect. The Government have a duty to ensure that they can achieve that.

3.22 pm

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South): Unlike some Opposition Members, I would not claim to be an expert on the construction industry. I am a layman, but I want to raise a number of issues. I welcome the report and the Government's intention to take action and to set up pilot schemes. It is always wise to set up pilot schemes because mistakes can be discovered as well as the good points.

The construction industry is important to the economy not only because of the jobs that it provides locally, but because of exports, especially hidden exports. When I intervened earlier, I alluded to Berlin, which I visited 18 months ago. There is a vast construction camp in east Berlin, for which British companies provided designs, skills and know-how. Some projects are massive, including the German Parliament building and others in places such as Dresden, which was bombed during the war.

The Construction Industry Training Board has projected an average annual increase of 2.5 per cent. in construction output in the west midlands, matching the national average, and there are more people employed in the construction industry in the west midlands than in many other parts of the United Kingdom, but people do not often think of that.

Large projects such as Coventry City stadium, which is in my constituency, and the Bull Ring in Birmingham involve a huge number of people from the industry in designing, planning, building and maintaining major schemes, and many smaller industrial projects are up and running or set to start later this year. It is good to see a buoyant forecast for the construction industry, especially after the lean years of the early 1990s, but there are still challenges to face, some by the Government, which I am sure that some of my hon. Friends will mention, and some by the industry.

On industry challenges, Sir John Egan's report "Rethinking Construction" raised such themes as a better response from industry employers to clients' needs, greater respect for people in the industry and the dissemination of best practice to maximise value for money, profitability, reliability and respect for people.

The quality mark initiative, a Government-sponsored scheme aimed at raising the standard of workmanship in the domestic repair, maintenance and improvement sector, is a great start, and I am pleased to see that consumers, builders and all the major stakeholders, including the construction industry and consumer groups, had a hand in developing the scheme from an early stage.

We welcome the news that consumers will be able to select reputable builders who have shown independent assessors that they have the skill to complete work to a high standard. That will enable firms to identify themselves as a quality enterprise and to differentiate themselves from the cowboys. I will watch the pilots in Birmingham and Somerset with interest.

In August last year the cowboy builders working group published a report that made recommendations aimed at protecting consumers from unfair practices, largely in the domestic repair and maintenance sector. The report's proposals have major implications for training in the industry at all levels and for the industry's operative registration schemes. The final report recommended that an independent body be established to own the quality mark and supervise its operation. Together with representatives from the construction industry, consumers and local authority interests, the group is charged with implementing the quality mark and ensuring that cowboy builders are corralled as far away as possible from trusting consumers.

There will always be groups who are more vulnerable and susceptible to cowboy builders than others. Nationally, Age Concern has decided that it, too, wants to take action against cowboy builders, who often prey on the elderly and the housebound. Its new scheme, First Checkpoint, is a way of doing just that. It has launched pilot schemes in three areas to protect vulnerable older people from cowboy builders and other rogue home maintenance tradespeople. Its aim will be to help older people to obtain good-quality home improvements on fair terms from the right people. The scheme already has community-wide backing in each area from trading standards, social services, crime prevention officers and neighbourhood watch associations.

One of the pilot areas is Coventry, and I am happy to give it my full support to stop disreputable and untrustworthy builders and tradesmen giving the construction industry a bad name. The cowboys damage the reputation of decent professionals, because even older people who do not suffer directly are put off having work done because of the stories that they have heard.

Some of the scams that people try to get away with are incredible. An 86-year-old housebound woman in Coventry was driven to her building society by a boiler installer to withdraw her £900 savings. The boiler that he installed failed to heat the water, and she had to spend another £700 having the work put right. A blind pensioner from Bradford was talked into signing a cheque for £180 to tarmac a drive, which was left unfinished. The firm in question had spent just two hours on the job. In another case roofers charged a disabled pensioner £40 for a roof inspection. They told him that the battens were rotten. Another roofer who later checked the roof found that the tiles had been deliberately removed to expose the battens to the elements.

Shoddy home improvements cause distress, inconvenience and serious financial loss to vulnerable older people and their families. Accredited and experienced builders, architects, surveyors and home improvement professionals such as glaziers, plumbers and electricians, many of whom have been recommended, will be invited to register with Age Concern. They are needed either on a paid-for basis to carry out work for older people at the going rate or on a voluntary basis to help to ensure that the scheme is successful.

Age Concern has taken steps to protect older people from being ripped off by builders and tradespeople who join the scheme. Participating home improvement professionals will be able to provide three references from the previous year and will be fully insured. They will sign up to a code of practice and agree to site inspections by local Age Concern First Checkpoint schemes.

Last year, according to a survey by Coventry trading standards officers, there were 138 incidents involving cowboy builders and other rogue traders preying on local people. I am informed that that is just the tip of the iceberg. Before our debate, Sandra Williams, an advocacy officer for Age Concern, told me of a recent case in Coventry, in which a retired couple in their 80s noticed a leak in their bathroom. Their daughter, who would normally have helped them with such matters, was on holiday, so they found someone in the "Yellow Pages" and asked him to look at it. He claimed to be a member of the institute of planning and gave them a price, to which they agreed.

He did the work—poorly, it turned out—in a couple of hours and offered to drive the 80-year-old lady to the building society. She refused to go for the cash, pointing out that the invoice was for far more than had been agreed. Many people fail to do likewise, and there have been cases of people being taken to banks and building societies to withdraw hundreds of pounds. In the case of the couple in Coventry, the builder issued an invoice for £130 for materials and £90 for labour. An independent assessor said that the parts would have been £45, at most, and that the labour would have taken no more than an hour.

Why should lay people have to argue with those who are employed to do a job for them? We should be able to have confidence that we are not being ripped off, every time that we employ a tradesman or tradeswoman to fix a problem. In conclusion, I applaud the work done by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, and by my hon. Friend the Minister in trying to address the issue of accreditation. I ask the Minister to help organisations such as Age Concern, which have very little funding, but provide a valuable service in addressing the problems caused by cowboy builders.

3.32 pm

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): I begin by declaring an interest as parliamentary consultant to the British Cement Association. Moreover, as a barrister, I did a number of construction industry cases and, as a corporate lawyer, I have worked for construction companies and other companies involved in building and property. I therefore come to this afternoon's debate with a considerable interest.

We should all be aware that a balance should be struck between the interests of our constituents, who wish to preserve the environment and the green belt from excessive development, and the interest of the country in high-quality development and the replacement of inadequate buildings with good ones. I know that the Minister shares my commitment to achieving that balance, not least because we were the only two Members of the House who attended the construction industry awards dinner. The Minister was present to give out the awards, and I agreed with much of his speech on that occasion, as I have agreed with what he and my hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) have said today.

There can often be a measure of agreement in debates such as this. We all accept that there are challenges to be faced and a great deal of work to be done, but everyone involved in the reputable side of the construction industry has a great deal of which they can be proud. As many hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey), have said, it is important to recognise that British construction companies are earning huge amounts abroad by producing high-quality buildings. I can tell the hon. Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham)—whose concerns I share—that what he saw in Berlin 18 months ago still applies. I was able to visit our German counterparts in Berlin during the Easter recess, where I saw how British companies continue to play a major part in the reconstruction work there, as in many other countries.

The Minister would also agree that, just as he faces challenges in his discussions with his counterparts in the Treasury, every level of the construction industry faces great problems. My hon. Friend the Member for Poole and other hon. Members who have spoken have rightly expressed concern at our failing to get taxation arrangements right. I therefore urge the Minister to continue the pressure that I know he has already sought to put on his counterparts in the Treasury. When amendments are debated by the Committee considering the Finance Bill, and perhaps in future legislation, it will be essential to realise that for small companies taxation arrangements and issues such as the replacement of the 714 form scheme—I think that everybody now accepts that the changes originally introduced by the Government were not helpful—can make the difference between profit and loss and between survival and prospering and bankruptcy. I see the Minister nodding and making notes. I am grateful to him, because I know that he has taken these issues seriously.

Further work still needs to be done on CIS 5 and CIS 24. I apologise to the Minister for the fact that, like the hon. Member for Eastleigh, I will be unable to stay until the end of the debate, but I hope that he will at least be able to say a little about those. I cannot stay until the end because I have to attend a meeting with one of his ministerial colleagues, but I apologise to him and to other hon. Members for leaving early.

I want to turn to some of the other issues, on which I think the Minister and I will again agree. First, much new housing construction is of high quality. The Minister may be aware of the green leaf awards for environmental standards. He will probably be pleased to know that last Friday I presented two of those awards to successful projects in my constituency. He is certainly aware that in my constituency there is a great deal of Ministry of Defence land, which will now be developed, and other brownfield sites.

When I presented the green leaf award certificates last Friday morning, I was pleased to see that one of the developments was a high-quality, low-cost development on a brownfield site. The developers, Barratt, and people from the Housebuilders Federation told me that the houses had replaced a disreputable nightclub that had had to be closed down, having been an enormous nuisance to people living in the area, and had then become a derelict site with crime, criminal damage and use by drug addicts and squatters. Local people, who in other circumstances might not have wanted the site to be developed for housing, were delighted to see it cleared and good-quality, low-cost affordable housing built on it. The high-quality developers are looking out for such sites.

The second site was an extremely high-quality development for retired people by English Courtyard at Mytchett Heath in my constituency. Having seen that large site being developed over the past three or four years, I know how greatly those who live in it appreciate the good balance between the number of housing units and the preservation of an arboretum, an open-air theatre and other high-quality facilities. The developers did not seek to cram in the maximum number of units. Again, the Minister nods. He shares my praise for developers who develop sites sensitively.

I want to make a final constituency point, of which I think the Minister is aware. It is agreed in the local plan that one of the larger Ministry of Defence sites will be developed—the former Alma-Dettinger barracks. A group of concerned residents, led by my constituent, Mrs. Shirley Coveney, is working with the developers—once again, Barratt—on a large site to try to preserve some of its best features and not allow everything to be knocked down, and to have a development along the same environmentally friendly lines as the Poundbury model village that His Royal Highness Prince Charles has so strongly supported on his estate.

I hope that there will be cross-party agreement on some of those issues, but many in the construction industry continue to be concerned about the effects of the climate change levy. On behalf of a range of industries—not merely those in construction but those in horticulture and others—I should tell the Minister that there are severe concerns. He and other hon. Members may not have focused yet on the impact that positive environmental measures have had on many people involved in construction, particularly in cement and concrete, in recent years. I know that he is aware of the environmentally friendly use of recycled waste tyres in cement and concrete production, and I hope that he will continue to support that, but I hope that he recognises that further progress is necessary and that he and Ministers not only in his Department but in all Departments, especially the Treasury, will take seriously the concerns that have been expressed by industry leaders.

Cement and concrete can help to prepare brownfield sites for new home development, because in-situ cement mixing can physically and chemically mobilise contaminants in the ground. The British cement industry, other industries and the university of Greenwich's centre for contaminated land remediation continue to collaborate on that. The Minister smiles; I know that he particularly welcomes anything involving the university of Greenwich. Once sites are decontaminated, the improved land can be used as ordinary building land. For example, the millennium dome is built on such a site, as are a new school in Leyton and housing in West Drayton.

Whisper concrete has been trialled extensively, and such experimental road surfaces can offer environmental benefits. My constituents express much concern about road noise from the M3, and nearby constituents have noise problems from the M25, so I hope that the Government will examine not only whisper concrete but other road surfaces. Some technical experts have written to me and have pressed the Minister's colleague in another place, Lord Whitty, on the possible use of Colsoft. Perhaps the Minister will consider that and examine my correspondence with the noble Lord.

I will briefly make one or two other points. Not only the construction federation but the Construction Industry Council and the Chartered Institute of Building have told me that further work should be undertaken to ensure better collaboration between some of the construction industry bodies. The Construction Industry Board, the construction research and innovation panel and the construction best practice panel sometimes experience liaison problems. Councillor Keith Bush, one of my constituents, is a diligent borough councillor and has done much work with the Chartered Institute of Building. Some bodies are partly or entirely funded by the Government, and he regularly discusses with me the need to ensure that they work together better. I am sure that the Minister will take account of that.

The plans to deal with cowboy builders need to be allied to changes in the value added tax regime, which I hope that the Minister will discuss with his counterparts in the Treasury. The Construction Industry Council believes that unless changes to the VAT payable on domestic repair and maintenance are made to help reputable builders, it will be difficult to make the cowboy builder schemes work. I am sure that all hon. Members will agree that although tougher measures are needed to tackle the cowboys, the real rogues will try to drive a coach and horses through the rules. The boys from the blackstuff, if I can caricature them as that, are not interested in schemes or rules. We must persuade people always to use reputable builders.

In answer to an intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry), the Minister said that many building firms around Birmingham have expressed interest in the scheme. It is all very well to say that, but reputable companies must sign up for the scheme when its marketing takes effect. The acid test will be whether people use the reputable builders—I see that the Minister agrees.

Construction output is estimated at between £60 billion and £62 billion per annum. All hon. Members support a continuing increase in that, but it must be high quality, and construction firms and building companies must not be strangled by red tape. When the Minister examines his pilot schemes, I hope that he will ensure that we do not repeat the problems with the replacement of form 714 and with taxation, and that we do not create an over-bureaucratic system.

When we debate again, perhaps in the main Chamber, the way in which housing and construction should develop, we should all bear in mind the fact that in south-east England, and especially in constituencies such as mine, there is enormous pressure not to spoil the green belt or the countryside beyond it. We must ensure that we maximise the use of existing brownfield sites and preserve the best of our existing buildings. The Minister will know that I have regularly championed the conversion of existing buildings for modern uses, not only throughout my eight years or so in this House, but in articles that I wrote before entering Parliament. We have seen good examples around the country, such as Dean Clough in Halifax and the way in which marvellous Victorian industrial heritage, such as Salt's mill, has been used as art galleries. There are marvellous examples of how those projects can be developed.

I ask the Minister to bear in mind the concerns being expressed about another fine Victorian building that might be under threat, Manningham mills in Bradford, which is not dissimilar to Salt's mill. I ask him to consider carefully the comments that experts have made about that issue in the press in recent days.

I have tried to cover a lot of ground quite quickly. The Minister was right to praise all the work being done by leading industry figures, such as Sir Michael Latham, Sir John Egan and Sir Martin Laing; I echo what he said. There is great hope for the future that construction will continue to be an industry of which everyone in Britain can be proud. However, we must ensure that there is delivery and that consumers dealing with small building firms are encouraged to choose only the reputable ones. We cannot stop every rogue who is operating, but we can ensure that there is real consumer protection, so that the good firms can flourish without being strangled by red tape and the rogues can be pursued and driven out.

We must ensure that larger firms are also encouraged to have high standards, particularly in relation to safety, which I regard as of paramount importance, but which has not been mentioned a great deal so far. At the same time, we must ensure that there is no risk that even large firms will be strangled by an over-bureaucratic approach.

3.47 pm

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): I do not bring with me any vested interest in the industry. I have a certain amount of experience, as the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) knows from his earlier incarnation in materials testing and engineering geology. I suspect that I might have done some work for him when he was an undergraduate many years ago. I leave it to hon. Members to decide who has worn best. I also suspect that I have laid more bricks personally than the Opposition have dropped collectively.

I am concerned about cowboy builders, and we must get to grips with that issue. I have one case in mind from my own constituency. I shall not deal with it in any detail, because I hope that there will be a police prosecution shortly. The case is similar to that described by my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham).

I am concerned about another aspect. Again, I shall not name the firms involved, but one major construction site in Chester employs, quite understandably, a network of subcontractors. They are further subcontracting and saying to people down the chain, "We want you to work on a self-employed basis, rather than being directly employed by us." That is a clear and deliberate attempt—the owner of the principal contract understands this—to avoid paying into the national insurance fund and to avoid paying income tax. That practice must be wiped out; major companies that are subcontracting, and whose subcontractors are also subcontracting, must take action and be more responsible.

A constituent visited me a few weeks ago—a bricklayer who is nearing retirement. A company had dismissed him because he refused to work for it on a self-employed basis. He won a tribunal; the principal contractor dismissed the sub-contractor; the second sub-contractor did the same and is now in the process of a second industrial tribunal claim against the other sub-contractor. That practice is utterly unacceptable. It reflects the fragmentation to which my hon. Friend the Minister referred. In turn, that has a major impact on training, where apprentice bricklayers—the next generation of skilled workers—have been working with the contractors.

My principal topic this afternoon is health and safety. The practice that I described does not promote an effective health and safety culture. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Hope) for bringing a Biblical quotation to my attention. I did not know that one of the qualifications for being a Parliamentary Private Secretary in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions was Biblical scholarship. My hon. Friend pointed out that verse eight of chapter 22 of Deuteronomy states:

> When you build a house, you shall make a parapet for your roof that you may not bring the guilt of blood upon your house if anyone fall from it.

Safety in the industry is crucial. We all agree that preventable accidents and ill health are unacceptable. The industry has done much in recent years to reduce the number of fatal accidents, but the latest figures are still worrying. There were 70 deaths in 1998-99; 86 in 1997-98; and 93 in 1996-97—an unacceptable number of fatalities. The number of musculo-skeletal injuries is horrific. Averaged out over the previous five years, there were 83 fatal accidents, 3,164 major injuries and an estimated 123,000 musculo-skeletal injuries. Those injuries currently cost the country approximately £180 million a year—a burden that the taxpayer should not have to bear. Responsibility lies with all players in the industry, including employees, to drive those figures down. There have been some encouraging trends, as I said, and we must further encourage participants to move towards a healthier and safer environment.

The industry is examining the all-round competence, including knowledge of health and safety, of its workers. There is significant support for the construction industry training board construction skills certification system, which covers the skills of brickies, plasterers, carpenters and other jobs of significant risk. There are currently 292,000 cardholders of the certificate of training achievement for those operating cranes and hoists, which is a positive step in the right direction.

Last week there was a fatality on a refurbishment project at Cleanaway in my own constituency, when scaffolding collapsed. It is still under investigation by the Health and Safety Executive, but that sort of incident should not occur if we drive forward standards and improve certification at all levels of the industry.

Employees and trades unions can help tremendously. There has been a greater coming together and professionalism on major building sites in recent years. I hope that the work that has been done in more static occupations such as factory environments to promote health and safety and proper representation continues.

Mr. Quinn: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the main problems with the construction industry is its mobile nature, and the fact that it is not easy to employ safety representatives on sites? Does he agree that the construction trade unions should be considering some type of roving safety rep scheme to bring about the change of culture that is needed on construction sites?

Mr. Miller: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I recognise his experience in this sphere. That approach ought to be considered as it may provide a solution.

I refer my hon. Friend to my earlier remarks about subcontracting, which exacerbates the problem. I am not sure where the right model lies. It is possible that parts of the country where there is greater activity might provide different solutions, but something along the lines that my hon. Friend suggests needs to be considered.

I go along with the comments of Conservative Members about VAT. This is another Tory U-turn. That is wonderful. It was their party's policy to impose VAT on construction materials. I know that only too well because it happened when I was rebuilding my derelict house and I got caught for the 12.5 per cent. that the Tories slapped on them. It also taught me some interesting things, one of which was that the whole process was rigged with loopholes, all of which surrounded not the repair and maintenance of listed buildings or churches, but the extension of them, created for the benefit of one or two people down the end of the Corridor. It was outrageous. I could understand their being used to protect listed buildings to ensure their repair and maintenance, or churches, and our heritage, but it was done to enable listed buildings to be extended. That is an absurd set of rules, which I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will address in due course.

Public perception of the industry has improved tremendously. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, design and architecture have improved dramatically. Exciting new developments are taking shape all around us, ranging from the London Eye to some of the superb blocks of flats on the river. Even the character of housing estates in suburbs and towns is improving dramatically. The relevant professions deserve to be congratulated on that.

However, there is more to be done. I refer to the management of sites while developments are taking place in order to minimise disruption. The transfer of responsibility for roads and communal areas between developers and local authorities must be undertaken in a more systematic and tidy way. There have been a few unacceptable examples in my constituency, where I have had to persuade developers to finish work that they should have done before the transfer to the local authority. Some improvements can be made in quality standards in all areas. The public are entitled to a better recourse to the complaints process than they have through the current NHBC system, which has caused a number of problems in my constituency.

The industry is exciting. It provides a lot of work in this country. It has huge risks associated with it, but there are moves in the right direction to improve that. I urge the industry to work with all the partners, including the trade unions, to address those health and safety issues. I am sure that it will continue as an important and vibrant contributor to the British economy.

4.1 pm

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I am grateful to be called in this important debate. I should like to begin by congratulating all the speakers so far. The Minister is to be applauded for the tone and most of the content of his speech. I do not claim to be an expert on the construction industry, but I recognise it as one of the greatest industries in our country. Its definition varies, and that is amplified by the different figures that have been given. I would prefer to stick to the £65 billion output; last year it was £62 billion, so that it is a pretty conservative point to make.

The industry represents about 8 per cent. of our gross domestic product and, equally importantly, employs 2 million people. That figure is broken into roughly 1.25 million employees and 750,000 self-employed people. That underlines the variety in the industry, but adds to some of its complexities and problems.

Historically, the construction industry has had little influence in the corridors of power and there are two reasons for that. First, people who work in it are evenly spread throughout the country. There are no construction industry seats waiting to be swung by the drop of an electoral promise, in the way that there used to be car manufacturing or farming seats. Secondly, and this was exemplified by the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey), it is a disparate industry that almost has a genius for falling out among its different parts.

I can more truthfully describe myself nowadays as a non-practising architect, an honorary chartered surveyor and a has-been politician. I hope that the division in the industry is ending—there are some good signs for that. The Minister referred to the excellent far-reaching report of our erstwhile colleague, Sir Michael Latham. That spawned the Construction Industry Training Board and the Construction Clients Forum. Then there was the setting up of the Construction Industry Council, with 55 representative bodies. It might be appropriate at this time to declare an interest. I belong to seven of those 55 bodies. I am an honorary fellow of five of them, a member of the Royal Institute of British Architects and a fellow of the Royal Town Planning Institute. If I may declare a reverse form of financial interest, I have to pay the architects and the planning profession.

I can be brief because many of the points have been made. I should like to rehearse the five principal problems facing the industry, as I perceive them. First, historically—I am not making any party political points here—the industry has suffered from under-investment. I mentioned the 8 per cent. investment. Research shows that European Union countries have an average investment of about 12 per cent. We see the result of our investment in the huge backlog of infrastructure that needs attention and the huge number of homes that need to be brought up to modern standards, and it is perfectly legitimate of the construction industry to point that out. I recognise and welcome the construction task force that was set up by the Deputy Prime Minister and headed by Sir John Egan. I hope that its plans will be implemented.

The second problem is efficiency, but since everybody has talked about that, I do not need to. The third problem, which has also been touched upon, is the quite frightening skills shortage, particularly in the engineering sector. I hope that that can be addressed. It is easy to talk about spending someone else's money, but the Government, rightly or wrongly, have introduced a scheme to encourage more teachers by offering £6,000 to postgraduates who take up certificate of education courses for one year. Perhaps we are coming into an era when such an arrangement should be targeted at parts of the construction industry to attract engineers and the other skilled craftsmen.

The fourth problem, inevitably, is regulation. As hon. Members have said, not least the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller), health and safety are paramount in our society, never mind the construction industry. However, there is too much red tape, which has been added to unnecessarily in recent years. Much of the construction industry consists of small and medium-sized businesses, which have suffered from increasing burdens. An almost byzantine structure of separate regulations applies in this huge, all-embracing industry, and many of them overlap. They govern, not only the design and construction of buildings, but their operation. I offer the House an eight-word quotation.

Our regulatory framework is excessive or poorly conceived.

Those were the wise words of the Prime Minister and they fit the construction sector to a T-square. Even recent employment legislation has not helped. There is a division of opinion on this, but I question the value of the working time regulations.

The fifth problem facing the industry is the VAT inconsistencies, for which the previous Government are partly to blame. All Governments are to blame, however. I know that the Government are looking at the effect of VAT on maintenance and repair of buildings and that there is an EU directive problem, but my reading of the directive is that, if minded to, the Government could reduce VAT to 5 per cent. Let us remember that the repair and maintenance sector represents almost half of the output of this great industry.

I must make the point that the climate change levy is an absurdity. We seem to be encouraging the domestic sector to spend more money on energy while also taxing every other sector on the amount that it uses. Exceptions have to be made for big energy users so that, although they pay a huge penalty—and will continue to do so—they will get some recompense, which will not happen for more modest building material producers. The building products business is a big part of the construction industry. I feel strongly that in introducing the aggregates tax the Government have got it wrong. The aggregates industry proposed an improvement programme that would be far more protective that the aggregates tax ever could be.

The construction industry has a vital role in sustainable development. I define this as using resources to meet the needs of people today without irrevocably damaging the world for future generations. We must maximise the use of renewable energies and the recycling of waste. We must minimise contamination of land and water and stop poisoning the air. We must reuse existing buildings wherever practicable. The Government must implement a comprehensive waste strategy. I am confident that they will begin to do so. They must insist on the minimum use of energy in construction works and ensure that buildings are designed for maximum energy conservation.

The Government have promised to take the lead, and rightly so, as the biggest single client in the construction industry. I understand that they want to see buildings designed, procured and constructed in a more environmentally friendly way. The Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Stretford and Urmston (Ms Hughes), rightly observed that Government action alone will not make construction more sustainable. There is a genuine challenge to the industry. Building a better quality of life must begin with a more sustainable built environment.

I am grateful to have had the opportunity to speak in the debate. I end simply by echoing what has been said about where we build in the future. We must build on brownfield sites wherever possible, if necessary, giving tax incentives to people to do so. We must build on greenfield sites only as a last resort—I realise that we shall have to build on some of them. We must never build on what is perhaps one of the most successful examples of post-war planning policy—green belt land.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next hon. Member, I want to make it clear that payment of professional fees by Members is not a declarable interest any more than is the fact that I found a couple of my old slide rules the other day.

4.12 pm

Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby): I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to be able to speak in this important debate. I declare several interests. I am a passionate engineer, a fellow of the Institution of Mechanical Engineers, a senator on the Engineering Council, which regulates our professional body, an honorary fellow of the Institute of Chartered Surveyors and a devotee of one of the most outstanding professions in the United Kingdom that contributes more to the quality of life than any other discipline that I can think of.

It has been a great privilege to work in the engineering business for the past 20 years. I am sorry that I did not get into the construction business. Fortunately—I am pleased that some of my colleagues are not with me today—I entered the mechanical engineering business, but had I known more about the civil engineering business I would probably have gone into that. There can be no greater tribute to individuals than to see their legacy stand after their demise. Some of the United Kingdom's building structures are first class. They are outstanding, and they draw visitors from all over the world—not least the building in which we stand today.

As an aside, I have to tell hon. Members that when the original plans for this building were submitted there was such an outcry—which continued before and after its construction—that, unfortunately, it led to the suicide of the original architect. That is terrible but it illustrates the way in which views about the edifices around us—I am thinking in particular of the millennium dome—change after a suitable period for reflection.

Mr. Syms: One hundred years.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: If it stays up that long.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: Yes.

I turn to the serious matter of skills shortages and gaps, and regulation. Most of us who have lived through the latter part of the 1970s and right through the 1980s and 1990s witnessed the decimation of the construction industry. It went quickly from being a booming business, with more projects than it knew what to do with, into major recession. The skilled and semi-skilled work force at both technician and professional levels moved from the industry into other work. Some in the vocational and craft industry did not; they went into employment.

That was fine, but unfortunately it had a tremendous impact on further education colleges, higher education colleges and universities. There was a lag of some three to four years between the demise of the construction industries and the impact on the academic and training institutions—but that impact is still felt today. FE and HE colleges simply could not attract enough recruits through their doors to support the courses that they had offered previously. Therefore, the people who generated the skills and academic requirements for the business slowly diminished. Excellent lecturers and facilities in small FE and HE colleges and in universities diminished gradually but surely over time.

In the latter part of the 1990s, we began to see a welcome resurgence of the construction business. However, the skills and requirements needed to underpin it were in short supply. Many companies were unable to fill order books or respond to demand simply because they could not find recruits. The Government have taken a number of significant initiatives to tackle that, but Government action alone is not sufficient.

Last year I attended a conference under the banner "From Skills to Prosperity" in the north-west that brought together businesses and the academic community. It sought to match academic output with skill requirements in the region. The reality today is that there are many academic institutions with reasonable facilities that produce individuals who do not match local employers' requirements. Many local employers require skills that are not articulated by the academic and training institutions that could satisfy those demands. I would applaud any dialogue that encourages academic and training institutions better to fit their courses and training programmes to meet the needs of local employers. The lag in producing courses that meet demand is about three to four years, so I am seriously concerned that the current shortages will become significantly worse in the coming two to three years.

I am greatly disappointed that this nation now has to import such expertise. We stand to benefit a great deal from bringing engineers from other parts of the world, gaining from their experience and learning from their academic and professional courses.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Lady speak to the microphone? The people who transcribe the debate are not in the Room and they rely on the signal from the microphone.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: The arrival of engineers from other parts of the world is welcome because we learn much from them in terms of their approach to training and to our work. However, we are failing to tackle the crisis in our universities.

The perception of engineering was mentioned earlier. I will touch on this because it relates particularly to women. A significant number of mathematics and science graduates are coming out of universities. Much to my delight, women achieve far better grades than their male counterparts. It might be thought that the most wonderful resource is therefore available to us, but unfortunately, it is not interested in the construction industry. It is a source of personal sadness, because I know that the business offers opportunities for every sort of skill and intellect. I know that the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions is tackling the problem. I am pleased that there has been some improvement, but much work remains to be done.

I want to move on to the budget allocated by several different Departments to the public understanding of science. That budget is currently fragmented, so the impact of the collective budget is also fragmented. Many of us would agree that we should make considerable effort to improve the recruitment and retention of people in key United Kingdom industries. The budget, which is intended to encourage the public understanding of science and support the crucial industries, should be realigned to meet the needs of industries that underpin the UK's economic contribution.

Finally, I want to deal with regulation. I received some useful literature from the Construction Federation—two notes, one of which referred to the burden of regulation and excessive red tape. Because I am an engineer, I tend to the objectives, so I did not hesitate to ring up and say, "You referred to burdensome regulation and red tape. Please supply some details." I received a three-page note today, some of which I should like to share with hon. Members.

The concern expressed by the Construction Federation is not unique to this particular engineering discipline, but is shared by all the other disciplines. The regulations are generated by several Departments. The main ones that affect the industry include the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974, the Fire Precautions (Places of Work) Regulations 1992, the MOD building regulations and the Disability Discrimination Act 1995.

There is no doubt that regulation is necessary, but there is concern that the co-ordination and impact of regulation is not as effective as it could be. I am heartened by the work of the better regulation unit and the insistence of both the previous and the present Administration that newly drafted regulations should have an accessible structure and a deliverable and enforceable mode of execution. We are not in a perfect position, but significant progress has been made to make the impact of regulation less burdensome.

Finally, I want to congratulate the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions on today's debate. I have enjoyed all the contributions. The construction industry is an unsung hero in terms of the excellence and wherewithal of our nation.

4.23 pm

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): The hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) referred to vested interests, but there are no vested interests in this Chamber—only registered interests and experience. The hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) demonstrated in her contribution how valuable it is to have people in the House who can draw on such genuine experience.

The Register of Members' Interests will show that I have several registered interests relating to the construction industry, though I do not intend to deal with any of them specifically this afternoon. I also have experience at the Bar where I specialise in construction disputes, and as an adjudicator for the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996.

The debate is the first that I can recall to have been held specifically on the construction industry. Given the size of the industry, it is a good development. I hope that the debate will become annual, and perhaps the Minister will confirm that.

I oppose consensus, but the Minister keeps on making reasonable speeches. That is dangerous because it lulls people into a false sense of security. Ministers are not meant to do that. I sometimes think that I or the shadow Leader of the House, my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young), might have made such speeches, with a few tweaks, when we were the Ministers responsible for construction, so I suppose that some continuum exists. The Minister did extremely well to avoid standing as a candidate for London mayor, and has done well to remain as the Minister responsible for construction for three years.

It was perfectly fair for the Minister to say that the previous Government published a report on cowboy builders in 1988. That was before I entered the Department, which had moved on to other issues by the time I entered. In fairness, during my tenure, we established a construction sponsorship directorate, we started to have fortnightly meetings with the industry and we initiated the Latham review, which produced the Latham report. However, dealing with cowboy builders was unfinished business.

I fully understand why Ministers are always reluctant to introduce statutory measures, because competing for legislative time is difficult and involves participating in the requisite Cabinet committees. However, I hope to show that statutory underpinning to a scheme for dealing with cowboy builders could be achieved within the existing law.

The public's perception of the construction industry is often based on their feelings for cowboy builders, and the reports that they read on them. Such builders are the bane of the responsible construction industry. Figures from the Office of Fair Trading show that home repair and maintenance is the fastest-growing source of consumer complaints. Builders receive proportionately more complaints than do car mechanics, estate agents or anyone else. That is a matter for concern. All hon. Members can give examples, from their constituency surgeries or postbags, of people who have been ripped off by cowboy builders, and one or two of those cases have been mentioned this afternoon.

Sadly, the constituents who are cheated are often among the most vulnerable, and can least afford such treatment. The Government's response has been unnecessarily timid. They are moving in the right direction, and the working group to consider the problem of cowboy builders was good news. The group recommended establishing a nationwide register to cover all building work, and the Government accepted its recommendation on the quality mark scheme for construction.

Earlier this year, the Government launched a pilot scheme in Birmingham, and parliamentary written questions could be tabled to tease out the disputed numbers involved in that. In response to my intervention, the Minister said that more than 240 builders in Birmingham had evinced an interest in taking part in the pilot scheme. If that is true, there must have been a sudden rush in the past few days.

I once told someone that I found Building magazine and Construction News compulsive bedtime reading, and that person said that I had a sad life. Undeterred, I read the 4 May edition of Building magazine, which said:

> Midlands builders snub cowboy pilot
> Fewer than 100 firms have called government hotline to join Birmingham quality mark trial.

Clearly, there is dispute over the figures, but the number remains proportionately small whether it is 100 or 240. The reason for that may be the amount of time that a builder must waste in providing proof that he is a competent builder, as described in the application packs. The packs appear to be prohibitive, as they are complicated, and at £500, the registration fee is fairly substantial. I fully appreciate the Minister's point that there is a chicken and egg element about this. However, if one does not achieve sufficient coverage of a quality mark scheme, one is further penalising good builders. It is they who take the time to fill in the registration forms and pay the fee, yet they do not benefit from the quality mark.

As I said when I introduced a ten-minute Bill on the scheme last year, it is more than patent that there will be several difficulties when voluntary schemes are not backed by the force of law. Consumers must come to terms with yet another identification mark, when a plethora already exists in the construction industry.

I was interested in the comments by the hon. Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham) on the scheme being introduced by Age Concern. It sounds perfectly worth while and valuable, but will doubtless involve yet another logo or identification mark with which consumers in Coventry and elsewhere must come to terms. It will take some time before a voluntary quality mark achieves the necessary recognition among consumers to ensure that builders who have become sufficiently competent to acquire it are seen as such by consumers. As the Constructors Liaison Group said, for any scheme to be effective consumers must be sure that the company they choose is technically competent. CLG is concerned that the pilot schemes as they are currently instituted do not adequately ensure this.

The Birmingham pilot does not seem to be commanding support, and that seems to be because it is impractical for small buildings firms. The greatest difficulties often exist in small firms. The forms issued require information about management systems and procurement systems that may be partially irrelevant to the average one-man band or smaller building company. It is more than plain that the lack of interest may be due in part to the six-part forms. As the chief executive of the Specialist Engineering Contractors Group observed,

The amount of time a small builder will have to waste providing proof that he is a competent builder laid out in the application packs is prohibitive...a good builder might feel he's better off with the cowboys.

Therefore, it is no surprise that not many firms in the midlands—the Minister's figure is 240, Building magazine says 100—have called the Government to register. Sadly, that lack of interest will, I suspect, mean that the trial is again delayed.

The Birmingham pilot highlights the real need for the Government to reconsider their approach. I firmly believe that the best way to combat cowboy builders is compulsory measures. Time and again, surveys have clearly shown that consumers want a Government-sponsored approach to cowboy builders. Why then do the Government not build on their existing proposals and combat the cowboys through statutory regulation? They could use the Building Act 1984 to extend building regulations and establish a new category of minor works. That would provide a framework for the regulation of builders and would be linked to membership of a professional body or trade association and third-party inspection.

Such an approach would give clear statutory underpinning to any quality mark scheme and would provide a clear incentive to those within the construction industry to achieve quality mark status, which could only be good news for consumers. It would also place the onus on local authorities to police more effectively the activities of unqualified builders. Above all, it would send the clearest possible signal to the consumer about who are, and who are not, quality mark builders. That signal would be far clearer than those offered by the Birmingham pilot.

This is not a new idea. It already enjoys widespread support throughout the construction industry. The Federation of Master Builders has said that it is doubtful whether the voluntary nature of the quality mark scheme will lead to better regulation of the industry and drive out cowboys. It believes that a combination of simple, but formal registration, a mandatory requirement to provide an insurance backed and a reduction in VAT would be the ideal solution to curb rogue traders.

The FMB has a point about VAT. In France, VAT has been reduced and so has the black economy. It is not a point that I will pursue, but the essence of its comments remains the same: the Government's proposals will not work as effectively as we should all like.

It seems strange that the Government are not acting in that way because the final report of the working group on combating cowboy builders recommended that DETR continue to consider how amendments to the building regulations, including their extension to repair and maintenance sector could be affected to reflect and complement the objectives of the quality mark.

Why do they not develop their proposals into a statutory obligation? It seems even stranger when one considers that the Government published a consultation paper only last year on the Building Act 1984 which acknowledged that the development of a quality mark scheme identifying competent building firms should be central to the effort to tackle cowboy builders. The DETR's new consultation paper states:

by having such powers at its disposal, the department may be able to introduce new regulations in response to changing national requirements without these becoming an onerous burden either on business, the householder or third party building control.

In other words, it readily acknowledges that it would be possible to give statutory underpinning to a quality mark scheme for construction to protect consumers without it placing any particular burden on the construction business, the consumer or local authorities.

The voluntary approach will not be effective. Only time will tell whether my fears are well founded. I simply hope that if it appears that a voluntary scheme is not attracting sufficient registration from builders or sufficient recognition from consumers, the Government will not be too proud to reconsider the issue, particularly when it is clear that the consensus in the construction industry favours mandatory underpinning.

I now wish to raise an entirely different matter. The Government have introduced new design proposals this week. I was interested in the Minister's comments about their origin. He was certainly right that previous Conservative Ministers, not least my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) had particular views on design. Sometimes I thought my right hon. Friend's views were particular to himself, but none the less he sought to encourage good design. The Minister's introduction goes part and parcel with new pressure for builders to intensify the amount of new housing that they put on land and increasing the density from 20 houses to 30 houses an acre. To put that into perspective, it would mean putting 30 houses on an area the size of Banbury United football pitch. It is the sort of density that we see in the back-to-back houses in the opening credits of "Coronation Street"—a programme that we watch when we are not reading Building magazine or Construction News.

The Government have got themselves into this position. They are trying to ensure that sufficient houses are built in the south-east, but they are also conscious of the considerable concern that too much land and green fields will be taken up for housing. Part of their approach to square that circle is to encourage builders to increase their housing density. Is that appropriate? Will there be sufficient space for play, recreation and family life if one encourages that degree of housing density?

Perhaps we should rethink the way in which housing numbers are determined and give local communities a greater say over the speed with which their towns and villages expand. In my constituency, there is considerable and growing resentment about the fact that large numbers of new houses have been imposed on towns such as Banbury and Bicester, which want to stabilise at their current size. I hope that the Government will reconsider the density figures. I cannot believe that building new housing at the specified level of density will be good news for future generations.

Those who work in the construction industry often bemoan the fact that there is insufficient interest in construction. Today's debate demonstrated that there is interest in and considerable knowledge about the industry. I hope that we shall have similar debates in future—that would be good news for the construction industry and those in the House who take a genuine interest in the subject.

Angela Smith (Basildon): I thank those hon. Members who kept their contributions brief so that as many speakers as possible could participate. Rather than repeat points that have already been made, I associate myself with the comments that were made by my hon. Friends the Members for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) and for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham) on cowboy builders and on health and safety at work.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I can assist the hon. Lady, who encouraged hon. Members to be brief. There are rules about being near live electrical equipment in thunderstorms.

Angela Smith: In that case, perhaps I should be extremely brief. If the electricity supply allows me, I want to discuss the Minister's comment on whole-life value in construction and the way in which the construction industry is key to the delivery of economic and social improvements.

The construction industry does not simply build houses—it also builds homes and communities. We need to examine the impact that housing design and construction have on communities. I welcome the Minister's response to my question earlier this week, when "By Design", which involves urban design, was published. When we discuss the quality of the environment, we often refer to the countryside. However, those of my constituents who live in heavily populated urban areas also need to maintain their quality of life and the quality of their environment. I welcome the approach that the document adopted.

I speak with no expert knowledge, I do not read Building magazine at bedtime and I have no professional qualifications or recent academic qualifications in this area, but many of my views are shared by the experts. The Egan report and the report by the social exclusion unit on neighbourhood renewal touched on relevant matters.

I speak not as a professional but from my experience and that of my constituents. At the age of nine I moved to Basildon, where I was brought up in what was then called council housing, which has been renamed social housing. When I left home and went to college, many of my peers thought that I was wealthy because I had mentioned the gardener on my parents' estate. It had not occurred to them that I was referring to the gardener on a council estate.

The house in which I grew up and in which my parents still live is typical of the good-quality homes that can be found in my constituency. I still remember my excitement at the age of nine when I moved to Basildon. However, with a little extra cost, imagination and thought, the pitfalls and problems that may affect future generations could have been avoided. I shall highlight some of those problems and some of the solutions that have been found locally.

New towns, by their nature, have high-density housing. Basildon is just 51 years old—a sparsely populated area quickly became a large and busy new town. While the relevant housing policy was generally good, designers occasionally appeared to be experimenting with us. I should have the support of most of my constituents if I proposed a ten-minute Bill that suggested that all house designers and builders should live on the council estates that they create for at least five years after they have designed and built them.

It is easy to see the problems with hindsight. The unprecedented and unpredicted growth in car ownership meant that garage space was quickly filled. People had to park their cars in parking areas a long way from home and car crime increased substantially. At that time, privacy for the individual was greatly prized in house design. As a result, there were no front gardens and houses were created around courtyards with high brick walls. Windows tended to face the back, so those who walked through the estate did not enjoy the security of being observed by people at their windows or in their gardens. In addition, some of the new heating systems proved inadequate.

We have looked at the work that can be done, some of which is mentioned in the "By Design" document. I hope that the final act of regeneration will be to rename the Vange 3/4 estate, although that is merely window dressing. We were concerned about the physical condition of homes. Structural repairs were needed and heating and ventilation were poor.

We have worked with the Rev. David Eaton and St. Chad's church, among others, to identify economic and social problems. There is high unemployment and far lower academic achievement than our children are capable of.

The council has used the estate renewal challenge fund to kick-start partnership with the Anglia housing association and set up the Vange community housing association and its board of volunteers. All the volunteers have put in considerable time and effort, but I shall flag up only a few. Councillor Paul Kirkman, who is chairman of housing, Lyn Beaumont, Julie Estarbrook and Keith Pocket have worked hard to ensure that the project was a success. There was a recent visit by the Archbishop of Canterbury, which was hosted by St. Chad's church, and the Barge pub has also participated. Although it is welcome, I cannot think of many projects where a church and pub have come together for the benefit of the community.

The Minister will be aware of the planning for real concept. In keeping with that concept, Bardfield junior school constructed a scale model of the estate and local community. We asked residents about the problems that they experience in their environment and homes. As well as matters relating to their homes, they mentioned crime, safety, the environment, traffic, leisure and community facilities, jobs and training, and health. All those issues have impacted on the quality of life on the estate.

We have brought together partners from the various agencies. Lack of time prevents me from going into detail, but by investing in the construction and improvement of homes, we have also rebuilt the community. Similar work has been undertaken on the five links estate by using money from the single regeneration budget, social housing grants and private finance. The part of the estate that has been completed is excellent. Unpopular blocks of flats, underground car parking areas and garages have been demolished. My assistant, Lynda Gordon, and I have visited several people in their new homes and they are delighted. I am very envious of Lynda. She is a former resident of the flats, so she was allowed to knock part of them down with a huge crane. I was not, and I shall never forgive her for that.

Crime and the fear of crime were the main factors that residents identified, but they feel unsafe in their own homes and environments because of poor housing design. Although I have stressed how wonderful the project is, it has tackled only half the estate and the Minister will forgive me for taking this opportunity to mention that we need the SRB6 bid to complete the work. I emphasise that point because my constituents need that money and I hope that he will ask his ministerial colleagues to look favourably on the bid.

Our aim has been to stop regarding the construction of housing and the construction and rebuilding of communities as separate issues. As I have said, when we construct homes, we construct communities. It is not simply a question of the homes themselves, but of how we treat the surrounding environment. Sadly, many years ago, the high street was knocked down and a private shopping centre built. Crime is rife because of the design of the shopping centre, and it is proving difficult to force the private owners to do something about it. Builders and all who are engaged in construction have an obligation to the families who will live in their homes and communities. That goes far beyond ensuring that the fabric of the house is safe—it is an obligation to the fabric of the community.

Government is about quality of life. The Minister mentioned the respect for people initiative in relation to those who work in the industry. I should like that to extend to the people who live in the council estates and housing estates that are provided by those contractors and constructors.

All hon. Members meet people with housing problems. With hindsight, it is easy to say that councils, Government builders and estate designers have created those problems, but allocating blame does not help the situation. What will help is learning the lessons from the mistakes that we have made and ensuring that we do not repeat them.

4.50 pm

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury): While I was waiting for the debate to begin, I had a brief interchange with the Minister about the difficulties involved in knowing where to sit in this hemicycle Chamber. I have moved as close to him as I possibly can, but can go no further. I hope that he realises that I have taken centre stage, rather than the middle ground.

Before I entered the House last July, I was involved in the construction sector—especially the building materials side—for 10 years. I worked for Redland plc, an international FTSE 100 company that makes roof tiles, bricks and aggregates in 32 countries. I was also, for five years, chairman of the public and parliamentary affairs committee of the National Council of Building Material Producers, which subsequently joined with the Alliance to become the Construction Products Association. I no longer have any declarable interests in that regard, although I should say that I am an unremunerated member of the parliamentary panel for the Association of Consulting Engineers.

Perhaps I should challenge the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) as to which of us has laid more bricks.

Mr. Miller: The hon. Gentleman has dropped more, that is for sure.

Mr. O'Brien: I have not had as much time as the hon. Gentleman in which to do so. More importantly, he has worked on only one house; I assure him that I have worked on many more roofs. I have to say to the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Hope) that the parapet referred to in Deuteronomy has now given way to the soffit board.

As has been widely acknowledged during today's debate, the health of our economy is dependent on a vibrant construction industry. The industry is capable of sustained growth. The signs of that—the number of tower cranes that can be seen or the number of track homes that are being built—can be identified in this country or in any other part of the world. The old truth about construction—that it was essentially a local business, in terms of materials or building, with radial markets—has disappeared, principally because of the value-to-weight ratio of building materials.

The construction industry is undeniably vital to the health and prosperity of the nation, because we spend 80 to 90 per cent. of our lives in or on the built environment. That applies to leisure time, home life, work life and transportation and movement. The industry represents 8 per cent. of gross domestic product and a huge number of jobs.

I felt that the Minister demeaned himself during his opening remarks by using the Chancellor's hackneyed phrase "boom and bust", because he has a great deal of experience of the industry—indeed, he and I met many years before I entered the House. The industry has been, and is likely to remain, fundamentally cyclical—although the degree of cyclicality is open to question. That is due primarily to the fact that the marketplace has two main drivers, in addition to the normal laws of supply and demand.

The first is that most of the materials for construction are commodity materials and it is difficult for competitors to make distinctions between their different materials. A welcome degree of innovation and a great deal of effort are going into research—especially, these days, into the environmental aspects of the market. However, whenever there is a variation in supply and demand in commodity markets, in relation to the people, office space or factory space required, the price will be the factor that collapses. For example, a company making bricks will commission the factory when it sees the curve going up. However, by the time the commission period—usually a minimum of 18 months—has passed, the market could have peaked. That will put more overcapacity into the market and perpetuate the cyclicality. That is inevitable because competitors in a free market—a welcome state of affairs—habitually compete for market share.

The other driver, apart from the normal supply and demand criteria, is the land turn. In the construction industry, the idea exists that it is the building that matters. The building is phenomenally important to our identity, culture and national pride. Much of what we see when we look around us is a definition of what we believe we are. However, the driver for the financial base of construction is the land turn. In this country, particular issues arise from that because of our planning laws and because we are an island with a restricted amount of useable land—not least if we preserve the green belt, as my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir S. Chapman) mentioned.

Land has a scarcity value. There is, therefore, an added premium on the land turn. The speed with which value is added to land is often the determining factor in its profitability. As the Minister rightly said, we might argue in favour of increasing the work load within the sector, for the health of the economy. The fact that, in Europe, construction accounts for an average of 12 per cent. of gross domestic product has been mentioned. Even if we take away the rather oddly funded European Union grants, that figure would still be about 11.5 per cent. An example of those grants can be found in Madeira, where tunnels and motorways are being built all over the island. That seems to be the last place one would want such construction, but that is where the European Union has decided to put its money. The United Kingdom's figure is 8 per cent. of GDP. We have a serious deficit in terms of infrastructure, replacement housing and remodelling. That is one of the main issues relating to what is to drive the two main concepts that the built environment represents: our quality of life opportunities and competitiveness.

Politicians have a role to play in bringing value to the construction industry. It is not good enough that people are badly housed or that they do not have sensible work places—an increasingly environmentally sensitive area. Furthermore, it is no good producing commodities if one cannot get them to market—for example, to the docks at Southampton.

I cite the example of the dispute over Twyford down. Irrespective of the politics behind that decision, had we been minded to invest more in the scheme, a solution might have been to put a tunnel under Twyford down. In my opinion, that would have been a better way, although I understand why the decision was taken to build the M3 corridor in the way that it was; it was vital to our competitiveness. There was no dispute that the M3 had to be properly linked to Southampton. It would have been a good idea to spend more money, but the general tenor of public opinion at the moment is that it is difficult to persuade people that raising taxation, which such a proposal might have entailed, is a good thing. However, that was a trade-off that I want to place on the record.

When we look to the future of the construction industry, the essential commodity is confidence. It drives the necessary planning and investment and although we have mentioned cyclicality and the opportunities of economic growth, certain factors are dragging confidence down. I shall touch briefly on those issues, given that so many have already been well argued and addressed. I applaud the initiatives of the Government and the previous Government in trying to get best practice to demonstrate best value, both in the private sector and in the major client sector—the governmental and quasi-governmental organisations that commission work—but there is a drag on that because the very best practice may mean giving up some competitive advantage. That is one area in which trust must be created. Trust and confidence in the construction industry are necessary if there is to be added value benefit.

Other hon. Members want to speak and time is pressing, so I shall skip my detailed arguments because they have been adequately covered, but I will refer briefly to the calibre of those who go into our industry. The hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) made a valid point. I used to be involved with the Cambridge university career service and it was a great disappointment to find that only 4.8 per cent. of Cambridge graduates went into manufacturing industry, primarily the construction industry. My aim was to increase that figure to 10 per cent., but I failed. It got to 9 per cent., but has since fallen back to 7.6 per cent. If we are to encourage high-calibre graduates, including women—who are proving to be very successful in their attainments at graduation—into the industry, we must change the perception that it is a dirty, working-site sort of business. It is a highly sophisticated, innovative, science-based industry.

I urge the Minister, when considering the arguments that have been made today, to do his best to encourage the Chancellor to take a positive step to align the fiscal incentives to all the initiatives that have been suggested today by various hon. Members and by the Minister. Those incentives make a difference and will enable the construction industry to have a secure future.

5.2 pm

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East): I shall try to be brief because I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Quinn) wants to speak.

The aspect that I want to focus on and to which my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) referred is the image of the construction industry and how young people perceive it. No one in the Chamber has focused on that during our debate, but young people are the future engineers, carpenters, bricklayers, painters and so on. The Construction Industry Training Board recently commissioned a poll from MORI on young people's perception of the construction industry. Young men and women aged 15 to 19 were asked whether they would consider entering the industry as a career choice. One in five found the idea of a career in construction very or fairly attractive, but the majority—65 per cent.—found it unattractive, with more than half of those finding it very unattractive. The disadvantages, with which more than 40 per cent. of respondents agreed, included long hours, dirty, dangerous, outside work, and hard physical work. That was hardly an encouraging response from an age group that is needed to maintain the industry's productivity. The Minister must consider that because the future of the construction industry needs quality young people.

I want to focus on the Teesside tertiary college in my constituency, which is a good example of a local training provider and tries to narrow the skills gap to which hon. Members have referred. The college offers NVQ courses at various levels in the built environment, painting and decorating, wood occupations, plastering, plumbing and so on. Recently, it has offered taster sessions in construction to local secondary schools to try to raise understanding of construction activities and awareness of opportunities available in the industry.

The Minister referred to the problem of promoting women in the industry, but I am sure that he will be pleased to know that Teesside tertiary college has been making a tremendous effort to promote women and disabled students. More women students are attracted to the construction courses than to other engineering courses, and the college has two deaf students, who are supported by a sign language interpreter.

I also want to draw to the Minister's attention an article in the Daily Express earlier this week about the Oxford women's training scheme, one of a handful of United Kingdom schemes providing training, employment development and support in non-traditional skills for women. Of course it is limited, but it is an achievement, and there should be more such schemes.

Teesside tertiary college has also seen a marked increase in the number of modern apprenticeships and new deal students registering for its courses. From September 2000, school leavers will be offered the opportunity to combine academic A-levels with vocational training in the built environment. Most of those students are self-motivated. While links with employer organisations such as the Engineering Construction Industry Training Board and Building Engineering Services Training are good, employers do not fund training except by providing day release. Consequently, some students find it hard to be motivated to complete a course that their employers do not appear to value and they leave, adding to the semi-skilled work force that causes so many problems.

An encouraging report published by the Minister's Department on Monday, which was written by a working group of the Consultative Committee for Construction Industry Statistics, found that the number of companies providing support went up by 10 per cent. between 1998 and 1999. The Minister should encourage that sort of training in colleges and provide future support.

5.6 pm

Mr. Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby): Before I begin, it would be appropriate for me to draw everyone's attention to my interests listed in the Register of Members' Interests. I am proud to be a chartered civil engineer. I worked in the railway industry for 20 years and I am glad to say that, should I ever need to find alternative employment, my former employer, Railtrack, has offered me first refusal if I want to return to that career, so I have duly listed it. That neatly brings me on to one of the recurring themes of today's debate—the future of the construction industry and a desperate skills shortage.

Recently, the industry's widely read magazine New Civil Engineer reported the lamentable fact that we are now having to recruit engineers from the Indian sub-continent to deliver the prestigious west coast main line infrastructure project. That is the thin end of the wedge. I join the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir S. Chapman), who displays a considerable knowledge of the construction industry, in urging the Government to look closely at the crisis point at which we are arriving. We need to focus on these skill shortages; we need classic, joined-up government across all Departments to look at construction professionals for the future; and we need to provide people with an opportunity to become flourishing engineers and construction professionals, so that they can contribute to the overseas earnings delivered by construction—20 per cent. of invisibles, as was mentioned earlier. It is an important part of the British economy that we cannot afford to lose.

In the limited time that I have I want to refer to an important conference that will take place in Birmingham next week. I congratulate the Minister on facilitating this debate, because I know from visiting the millennium dome, which is a good example of British engineering and innovation, that an important event is taking place in his community today. When I met the person who is now the mayor of Greenwich borough, I gave her an alibi for the Minister—not that he needed one. I told her that he was involved in an important debate in the House and that I was hoping to catch Madam Speaker's eye. She understood, and I am sure that she would want me to pass on her best wishes. The Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister have supported the Movement for Innovation initiative throughout. Next week, it is holding an important national conference entitled, "Rethinking construction—profiting through innovation".

The considerable time that I have spent in the construction industry has taught me that construction involves teams and partnership and it requires people to work together. It is appropriate that we had our debate in this Chamber—we all want to focus on the future of this vital industry, and there has been a consensus throughout.

Some hon. Members who spoke earlier may not have passed on due credit to the many learned organisations that work in construction, including the Institution of Civil Engineers, to which I belong, and the Institution of Structural Engineers. The chartered surveyors organisations have done much important work. All such groups have been batting for Britain—they helped to ensure that the world's engineering opportunities have been met by British engineers and, recently, they have helped to develop the skills of engineers abroad, especially those in the developing world. I commend all those engineering institutions, which have worked closely with and offered learned expertise to the Republic of China.

We need to focus on world markets and the skills of engineers. I hope that under this Labour Government, engineering and construction will move from its current high point to even better times.

5.12 pm

Mr. Raynsford: We have had an absolutely excellent debate. My opening speech was followed by those of 12 hon. Members, and if my concluding remarks are added, there will have been 14 speeches in all. Our debate ranged over many subjects, all of which are of considerable importance and relevance to construction.

Our debate was characterised by the expertise of the hon. Members who have spoken—we have had an incredibly well-informed debate—and by the many different perspectives that have been represented. We have benefited from, for example, the professional and technical expertise of my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Quinn) and from the business expertise of the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien). We were given some interesting insights into professional backgrounds. My hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) clearly went the wrong way in her training when she studied mechanical rather than civil engineering. I was delighted by her contribution to our debate.

There is a risk of a brick-laying competition between my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) and the hon. Member for Eddisbury, and there may be a bedside-reading competition between the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) and other hon. Members, who may choose to read alternative construction publications at night. We have discussed several immensely serious issues that matter greatly to the industry and which will affect its future.

The hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms), the Opposition spokesman, opened the debate in his characteristic way. I became well accustomed to his style during our exchanges on the Transport Bill, when we sat on opposite sides of a Committee Room, which is a more confrontational venue. He displayed the sweet reasonableness that characterises his contributions, not only in this debate, but elsewhere. He highlighted certain specific problems, notably those of people in the construction industry who were not being paid on time. I am happy to be able to say that, because of the recommendations in the Latham report and the action taken to put them into effect in the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996—introduced by the previous Government, but brought into effect by this Government—we are making inroads into the issue. It is widely accepted that that Act has made things better. However, there are still some problems, and we shall consider those as we review progress on that legislation.

The hon. Gentleman also highlighted the problems with the construction industry scheme. One of the curiosities of the old 714 scheme was that it required people to present their 714 certificates in person. That is not widely known, because virtually no one did so. The problem with the use of fax is that it is difficult to authenticate material sent through electronic communication systems; it is easy to present bogus certificates. Presentation in person should provide an extra element of security. We are aware of the anxieties that have been voiced about the scheme. As the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, a review is under way. We are looking for ways to simplify the scheme, while preserving the basic principle that we should provide proper safeguards against abuse and tax evasion. We want to create a framework in which the industry will find it easier to operate and which will cut out unnecessary red tape—a theme that came up repeatedly in the debate.

The hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) mentioned his experience in civil engineering in the middle east in the 1970s. He described the dominant position of the British construction industry at that time. He was concerned that we should continue to push our interests in that part of the world, as well as elsewhere. I am pleased to be able to put on record—the hon. Gentleman explained courteously that he could not stay for the winding-up speech—that, in the past three years, the Department has led construction trade missions to several countries in that region.

I have led missions to Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon and Turkey, the last leading to a successful joint venture between the British construction industry and the British Government to prepare a master plan for reconstruction in the Yalova area, which is one of the areas most devastated by the terrible earthquake in Turkey last year. That is a practical example of industry and Government working together to help where it is needed overseas, thereby helping the British construction industry to compete more easily and more successfully in those markets. We are committed to that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham) spoke with great knowledge and passion about appalling examples of abuse of vulnerable people by cowboy builders. Nothing angers hon. Members more than stories about elderly people and other vulnerable people being scandalously ripped off by rogues who masquerade as builders and, by doing so, blacken the reputation of the whole construction industry. That is why we are determined to drive forward our programme to tackle the evil of cowboy builders. I shall return to that issue in response to the points raised by the hon. Member for Banbury.

Before I do, I will refer to the contribution made by the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins)—also, unfortunately, unable to stay, as he explained courteously. He rightly highlighted the difficulty of achieving a balance between conflicting interests. He mentioned the importance of high-quality building while preserving the countryside. That is one of the great dilemmas of our time—how can we ensure that we meet the great need for housing in areas under great pressure without damaging or destroying our priceless countryside unnecessarily? We are trying to do that through planning policy guidance that seeks less profligate use of land without downgrading the quality of the environment.

To refer to a point made by the hon. Member for Banbury, the densities of some of the most desirable and most well designed buildings in our cities—for example, Georgian houses in London and some of the much praised new developments such as Poundbury in the west country and even the millennium village in Greenwich in my constituency—are far higher than the 23 per hectare which has been the average for housebuilding in the south-east in recent years. If a high-quality environment can be provided at 30 dwellings per hectare, housing needs can be met and further unnecessary land-take avoided. That is a prize that we must achieve. We are discussing not poor-quality, tawdry environments but high-quality design to create environments such as Poundbury, Greenwich, Chatham Maritime and the Georgian terraces in London. We want to provide good environments where people will want to live. That is how we can achieve the balance that the hon. Member for Surrey Heath rightly wants.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston rightly highlighted problems with employment practices under which self-employment regulations were abused for a variety of reasons that were endemic in the industry. He stressed the importance of a new approach and an end to the old adversarialism in the industry. We are making progress, but there is a long way to go. Above all, we are getting the message across that it is important for the industry to have a well trained, loyal work force instead of depending on individuals who are simply hired on a casual basis. Many of the evils of poor employment practice and poor construction can be attributed to those patterns of the past and we are trying to move away from that.

My hon. Friend also highlighted the safety issue, which is of great concern to him and many other hon. Members, as well as the trade unions, which have played an important part in highlighting practices in the industry that have led to an unacceptable level of accidents, injuries and fatalities. There are currently around 80 fatalities a year, which is too high, and too many people suffer serious health problems and injuries as a result of unsatisfactory working practices.

There is no complacency and we continue to work to improve standards and to ensure that the Construction, Design and Management (Health and Safety) Regulations 1994 are carried forward to improve working practices. I know that the Health and Safety Commission is extremely vigilant in pursuing the matter. The "Working Well Together" initiative is a ground-breaking campaign developed by the Health and Safety Executive's construction industry advisory committee to refocus the industry on the principles of the 1994 CDM regulations and provide impetus for change. We shall continue to maintain a high focus on that.

The hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir S. Chapman) has great experience and knowledge of the construction industry, having worked as an architect and having retained his interest and understanding of the issues relating to architecture, planning and construction. He raised a number of important matters. He questioned why the construction industry has had less political clout that it deserves. I hope that we can begin to change that.

In response to a challenge from the hon. Member for Banbury and in advance of my comments on his speech, I should say that we initiated this debate because we thought that it was right to have it. It is not for me to decide whether we should have such debates annually, but our debate today has been informed and serious and the House would benefit from similar debates. We would have no difficulty with that, and it might help to raise the political profile of the industry, which would be a thoroughly good thing.

The hon. Member for Chipping Barnet asked about the climate change levy and the aggregates levy, while stressing the importance of sustainability in construction policy. If we want to achieve sustainability, we must discourage profligate use of materials. There is no doubt that economic instruments can play a role in discouraging unnecessary use of certain materials. Whether the aggregates levy is the right method is a matter that we shall continue to debate for some time, but the voluntary package put together by the Quarry Products Association has failed in a number of respects to meet the objectives essential to an effective voluntary scheme.

More seriously, many small quarrying companies declined to participate, and made it clear that they totally opposed the voluntary package. In my view, one cannot have a voluntary package to which a significant number of players in the industry—albeit small ones—have not signed up. That creates competition distortions between those who are prepared to pay a voluntary levy and those who are not. That factor led my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to decide that a voluntary scheme was not feasible, and that it was necessary to move towards an aggregates levy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Crosby rightly highlighted the problems associated with excess regulation, and the important work of the better regulation task force. I am pleased to say that we are working on those themes in a number of areas, including building regulations and certain aspects of planning policy. We are trying to establish proper safeguards to ensure compliance with requirements that are essential to safety and good performance. However, we do not intend to produce unnecessary red tape or impose unreasonable burdens on industry. There is a balance to be struck, but we believe that there is further scope for improvement in the regulatory framework, enabling us to achieve what is necessary while avoiding the imposition of an unreasonable burden on business.

I introduce comments on the speech of the hon. Member for Banbury with such remarks because he is an advocate of a statutory scheme to deal with cowboy builders. I put it to him that trying to regulate an industry consisting of 160,000 separate companies gives rise to problems of red tape. There is a tension between statutory regulation and the argument—which has been voiced widely in this Chamber—for reducing the regulatory burden. I say to the hon. Gentleman, as I have said to others, that if it became clear that a voluntary scheme could not work, we would not hesitate to look at the matter again. There would be no question of pride about our previous commitment to a voluntary scheme; we would be prepared to review the need for a statutory scheme.

Nevertheless, the Merricks committee recommended a voluntary scheme and that is what we are pursuing. We believe that it can work, and the evidence from Birmingham is encouraging. I have great respect for Building, but the hon. Gentleman should not believe everything that he reads in it. The figure of 250 is ours, and I hope that he will read my letter, which will correct the figures that he quoted from the most recent issue. We believe that the voluntary approach should be pursued, and we are keen to do so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Angela Smith) gave a warm welcome to the "By Design" document that was published at the beginning of this week, and highlighted some specific issues in her constituency, where planning-for-real exercises can put right some past mistakes and create a better environment. She used that as an ingenious way to promote a single regeneration budget bid, but she will understand that I cannot comment on that.

The hon. Member for Eddisbury, who has great expertise in the construction field, made a number of useful points. He highlighted the conflict between land use, planning issues, quality of life and competitiveness, and used Twyford down as an example, although many others could be given. I agree wholeheartedly that those are difficult challenges which must be met intelligently. We must strike the best possible balance between competing claims. He emphasised the importance of trust and confidence to the future of the industry, and I wholeheartedly agree.

My hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East (Dr. Kumar) talked about the importance of attracting young people into the industry and the negative messages that are sent by poor site conditions and other discouraging factors. We must do more to encourage an active interest in the industry, so that more young people with talent and skills will enter it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough and Whitby, who also has great expertise in this field, talked about the importance of construction as a team game. He is right, and this afternoon's debate has been a team exercise. It has also been a credit to Parliament and the industry—the future success of which we want to promote.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Five o'clock.

Tuesday 23 May 2000

[SIR ALAN HASELHURST in the Chair]

Sierra Leone

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mrs. McGuire.]

10 am

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Yesterday, the Minister gave evidence to the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs and this morning, I tried to obtain an uncorrected transcript of his evidence. In so doing, I have spoken to and been helped by the Clerk of the Select Committee.

I understand that the contract that the House has with the organisation that transcribes the evidence prevents the House from having more than one expedited transcript of evidence in any one parliamentary Session. Therefore, the transcript is not available to the House today, even though a debate is taking place on the same subject and the transcript would have been a great help to hon. Members. Might I, through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, ask whether there is a possibility of having the contract changed so that hon. Members are not impeded in their deliberations on subjects as sensitive and important as those that we are to discuss with regard to Sierra Leone?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As I am sure the hon. Lady will recognise, I cannot rule on the matter from the Chair although I have sympathy with the fact that the juxtaposition of the two events is such that it would have been helpful for the transcript to have been available. However, the control of such matters lies primarily with the Select Committee, which cannot be overruled unless new procedures are devised. Perhaps this is a matter for the Liaison Committee. I thank the hon. Lady for giving me an opportunity to respond and for putting the point on the record, but there is nothing that we can do to assist us during the debate.

10.2 am

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): I am pleased to have the opportunity of introducing this morning's debate because of a personal, long-term interest in west Africa. My interest has arisen from visits to Sierra Leone, Nigeria, Ghana and Liberia, and because of the importance of the issue in terms of the future of the United Nations, which is surely of concern to us all.

The Government have been too diffident in justifying our role in Sierra Leone since the paratroopers landed there about a fortnight ago. We have constantly sought to say that our involvement is short term and will soon be over. Our involvement is just and necessary. We must be wary of over-involvement and devote a great deal of attention to achieving a greater contribution from others. However, we must not open ourselves to accusations of misleading the British public, as in some respects, a longer-term involvement is needed.

Sir Peter Emery (East Devon): I thank the hon. Gentleman for allowing me the impertinence of intervening at the start of his speech. I endorse what he is saying with regard to this important subject. Members of the Foreign Affairs Committee, who are considering Sierra Leone, would normally wish to be here for the debate. However, this morning and this afternoon they are working on the final report of the Kosovo inquiry, which has been running for four or five months. I thought it right for this Chamber to know why the members of the Foreign Affairs Committee were not present.

Mr. Worthington: I appreciate the right hon. Gentleman's contribution. I am pleased that the Foreign Affairs Committee is conducting an inquiry into Sierra Leone. I hope that my speech today will be considered as my evidence to it.

Sir Peter Emery: Thank you very much.

Mr. Worthington: We need to consider the full dimensions of the Sierra Leone crisis. I am delighted that the days of Tory policies—or non-policies—on Africa are at an end. I draw attention to previous crises in Africa and to the way in which the House dealt with the issues involved. First, let us consider the previous Government's response to the Rwanda crisis. I remember the shame of Rwanda when this country and so many others turned their back on the most appalling genocide to have occurred since the second world war. We still do not know how many people were slaughtered during that crisis but the figure of 500,000 is often used. When the Security Council of the United Nations, with our support, pulled the United Nations out of Rwanda, the innocent were left to be slaughtered. The Government made no statement to the House about Rwanda and there was no parliamentary activity.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Does he agree that as a result of the then Government's failure to act when genocide was occurring in Rwanda there is now the most appalling instability in the Great Lakes region, and it is threatening to spread across Africa?

Mr. Worthington: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for that comment. Our past inactivity in that area is one reason for our present position. We made no political response to Rwanda; the British Government ignored it. However, we are not ignoring Sierra Leone, and that is an important step forward.

Secondly, let us consider Liberia, which is next door to Sierra Leone and contributes enormously to its problems. What did the United Nations do about Liberia? Nothing. After the American debacle in Somalia–an intervention that provided too little, too late and that was able to cope only with a war without casualties–the United Nations coined the idea of African solutions to African problems, which meant, in other words, "It's nothing to do with us, guv."

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): Does the hon. Gentleman believe that the United Kingdom has the same national responsibility for Sierra Leone and Rwanda, or does he think that it has a different responsibility in the light of its interests in particular regions and because it has to act sometimes in the international community and sometimes on its own?

Mr. Worthington: The hon. Gentleman raises an important issue. In considering the way in which the Security Council operates, we must take into account where lead responsibilities lie. I do not have the slightest doubt that the lead responsibility in the case of Sierra Leone lies with us, although that is not the case in respect of Rwanda. Countries that have been most associated with African nations in the past have sometimes been the least appropriate to take a lead.

Mrs. Gillan: What was the policy of the Labour party on Rwanda? Did the then Opposition call for Government intervention and, more especially, military intervention? Did the hon. Gentleman expect our troops to be deployed in Rwanda?

Mr. Worthington: I am not proud of our role with regard to Rwanda. Nor am I proud that Rwanda was not debated in the House and there was no statement on it. Indeed, there was no parliamentary activity in respect of Rwanda, apart from two Adjournment debates that I initiated. That is to the shame of this country. I am glad that we have moved on to acknowledge Sierra Leone.

I was talking about Liberia and the idea of African solutions to African problems, which meant that we excused ourselves from any involvement. That led us to the absurdity of a pariah state–I am speaking of Nigeria, which was thrown out of the Commonwealth–ruled by corrupt military thugs, who robbed their own country, being encouraged to lead forces in Liberia and Sierra Leone on behalf of the world community to try to end the turmoil there. That approach had many problems, one of which was that the Nigerians did not pay their troops, who were forced to live off the country that they were protecting. I remember the exasperation of the non-governmental organisations in Liberia when they found their food warehouses empty having been guarded by the Nigerian army. Eventually, however, the Nigerians turned up trumps; they drove out the Revolutionary United Front from Freetown to an extent that made it possible to draw up a flawed peace deal.

My most recent experience of Sierra Leone was at the end of March when I went there on behalf of the Westminster Foundation for Democracy. I pay tribute to that organisation which was established by the previous Government with all-party support and has allowed many hon. Members to play a valuable role in supporting and establishing multiparty democracy throughout the world. The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), asked the Westminster Foundation for Democracy what could be done to support the democratic process in Sierra Leone.

The Lomé peace deal includes plans to hold three elections and it is the job of the Westminster Foundation for Democracy to provide help, training and support for the political parties so that those elections are free and fair. That is not an easy task. Parliamentarians have not been able to return to their rebel-held constituencies for a long time and all forms of communication in Sierra Leone, which has become the poorest country in the world, are appalling. I assume that the elections are on hold.

The press took it for granted that the UN peace effort was hopeless. That was unfair. The atmosphere in the country in March was one of optimism, although there was uncertainty about Foday Sankoh's intentions. Although disarmament was slow, it was estimated that about 15,000 of the combatants had disarmed. Progress was being made, but it depended on the integrity of Foday Sankoh, who had signed the Lomé agreement. The UN was asked to oversee a peace agreement and forces were being assembled for that purpose; it was not its intention to prosecute a war. Foday Sankoh changed all that. Despite having received an amnesty for his crimes, the rank of vice president and responsibility for the mines commission, he failed to honour his word.

The peacekeeping force—although of a varied quality—was being assembled. The camps for disarmament were being set up and a disarmament, demobilisation and reintegration programme was being introduced. The British effort was considerable. We were—and are—contributing enormously. However, the society was in total collapse. There was no army to speak of because it had rebelled against the Government and sections of it had formed militia groups. The police were in disarray. British aid did not concentrate simply on food and medicines—humanitarian aid—but on how Sierra Leone could be rebuilt from the bottom. It is relatively easy to construct buildings, rebuild roads, repair radio masts and reopen schools and health services; it is much harder to rebuild a society's social institutions and the rule of law, and to construct a shared understanding between opponents who have accepted that peace is better than war. That is painfully difficult work.

The conduct of the public debate on Sierra Leone has been seriously flawed. It has been wrong to concentrate on how quickly we can get out. I know that the debate has focused on frontline troops, but we must be honest and admit that it will take years rather than days or months to achieve a better future for Sierra Leone. A working democracy must be established. Earlier this year, we said that we were interested in reconstructing the Sierra Leonean army and the police force. In Freetown, I met the Ministry of Defence advisory team, which had decided to use our strategic defence review as a basis for a similar review of Sierra Leone. It was starting from scratch and had to consider the security risks and the country's defence needs. It started with the police, and is also concerned with political parties there. The country has been destroyed by nine years of war and many more years of corruption.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford): Does my hon. Friend agree that the evidence of the post-second world war era is that whenever an international organisation such as the United Nations goes in and comes out quickly the long-term result is instability, but that when it goes in and stays in, there is at least a chance that stability, order and democracy can be restored—often at a lower price than a quick operation?

Mr. Worthington: I agree, but there has to be a quality input, which is what is happening in Sierra Leone.

There are positives in Sierra Leone. It has hung on to some of the traditions of the legal system established by the British. Until recently, it had a good university. Civil society has some strong elements; a non-governmental organisation called the Centre for Good Governance would rank with many of the best NGOs. It is a small country with between 4 million and 5 million people. It has no huge regional, ethnic or religious tensions such as one finds in Nigeria or Sudan and there is a huge lust for peace.

If the United Nations cannot cope with Sierra Leone, it cannot cope with anything. It is important that it does cope, because many other tasks await it—for instance, next door in the Congo. We must make Sierra Leone succeed; if we cannot, the consequences for the world will be appalling. The message will be that the Foday Sankoh style of thug can run riot, and the UN will have to shut up shop as a peacemaker—and as an enforcer of peace.

The United Nations includes us, but that does not mean that we should always take the lead. However, UN forces should not include the appallingly trained and ill-equipped forces of parts of the developing world. There must be some first-world involvement because of our logistics and strategy.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): My hon. Friend, who knows about such matters, will recall that "An Agenda for Peace", the report produced in 1992 by Boutros Boutros-Ghali, set out exactly what the United Nations needed to do to build up its ability to deal with regional conflicts and the subsequent peace-building process. Regrettably, the implementation of that report has been sabotaged, particularly by the United States. Does my hon. Friend agree that that report suggests some of the solutions that the UN needs today?

Mr. Worthington: We have to revisit those issues. The United Kingdom is a member of the Security Council. If we are to respond appropriately to such crises, we must learn the lessons of the past; we must then move forward. It is obvious that we are leading in Sierra Leone; the shortest of visits confirms Britain's pre-eminence there. However, in response to the point raised by my hon. Friend, our actions are a role model for other Security Council member states.

I welcome the fact that our response was so thorough and committed. However, it is unsatisfactory in the long term that the UN force and our forces should act separately and distinctively, as they are doing in Sierra Leone. A job needs to be done there, and I am confident that the Ministry of Defence and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office realise that and are looking for a solution.

The Government's policy is to end world poverty, but there is not the slightest chance of doing that unless we face up to the conflict. The vast majority of the poorest countries in the world are in conflict or emerging from it. To end their poverty, those countries must rebuild their social infrastructure, which has been destroyed because most of those wars were the result of internal conflict—although, as in the case of Sierra Leone, some of them were stimulated from abroad. In facing that task, we must consider how the international community should respond. We must consider the co-ordination of actions and the funding of peace efforts.

It is crucial that the UN's response should be quick and appropriate. The forces of the United Nations mission in Sierra Leone built up painfully slowly, which resulted in limbo after the peace deal. NATO, the world's pre-eminent military alliance, was unable to respond timeously, whether with relief and helicopters for Mozambique or the transport of soldiers to Sierra Leone. The Canadians have recently transported other nations' peacekeepers, but why is every peacekeeping initiative involving third-world forces bedevilled by the inadequacy of the means of getting them to the site, when NATO could do that?

Communications is another issue that needs to be examined. The country virtually no longer has a telephone system outside Freetown. Therefore, it needs first-world communications systems to be brought in. The absence of radio transmission for the whole country makes it fertile territory for the rebels. We can tackle that. However, we cannot go back to the Tory days of blaming the United Nations for failure when the main reason for that was our failure to provide the necessary support and team work.

Dr. Tonge: The hon. Gentleman has been extremely generous over interventions. Does he think that not seeking control of the diamond mines in Sierra Leone was one of the fatal mistakes? They were allowed to remain in the control of Sankoh and continue to fuel the war.

Mr. Worthington: I am coming to the diamonds, which are a crucial issue.

We have done very well with respect to our present commitment. We recognised, first, through the scale of our commitment, that humanitarian aid was not enough—the high commission, the Ministry of Defence and the Department for International Development have responded well—and, secondly, by the quality of our military response, that we were right to do as we have done. It is foolish of the Opposition to demand withdrawal dates or published limitations of action. Have they not learned from Kosovo that when we state that we shall not take certain military action, only the enemy benefits?

Mrs. Gillan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Worthington: I would rather not, because I am conscious that other hon. Members are waiting to speak, and I have been generous in giving way.

We must give quality support and work with countries such as the newly democratic Nigeria, to ensure that the UN peacekeepers do their job effectively, but we must be deeply sceptical about other countries such as Liberia, which has been involved in stimulating trouble in Sierra Leone and which has a considerable diamond trade, although few diamonds. The killing of a high-ranking Liberian officer alongside rebel forces in

[Mr. Worthington]

Sierra Leone suggests that President Taylor may well be up to his old tricks. The capture of Foday Sankoh is tremendous news but there will be difficult days ahead in trying to ensure the safety of the hostages and we must be careful what we say in those circumstances. However, I am confident that with skilled management at the heart of the UN response the rebels can be driven back.

Enormous skill will be needed to tackle a central problem of Sierra Leone—control of the diamond industry, which remains in rebel hands. For a long time, politics in Sierra Leone has been corrupted by diamonds. Sierra Leone cannot become healthy until that wealth is honestly administered. In the words used by Graham Greene for the title of his novel, they are the heart of the matter. A report on the diamond industry, also called "The Heart of the Matter", by Smillie, Gberie and Hazleton, states that until the 1980s the legendary, mystical firm of De Beers, with its virtual monopoly of diamond marketing, had an office in Freetown. Now it maintains a diamond trading company in Liberia and a buying office in Guinea, but nothing in Sierra Leone. It is difficult to believe anything other than that many of the Liberian diamonds are of Sierra Leonean origin.

It is estimated that the annual Liberian production of diamonds is between 100,000 and 150,000 carats. However, Belgium imported more than 6 million carats from Liberia, although De Beers claims not to purchase Sierra Leone diamonds. There will not be peace until the diamond trade is controlled and that cannot be done by Sierra Leone alone. The same also applies in Angola and the Congo. The control of diamonds will have to be achieved through the setting up of control mechanisms by the developed world; otherwise, mayhem and thuggery will continue in Sierra Leone with assistance from outside the country.

The refugee and internal displacement problems are further reasons why a quick fix is not possible in Sierra Leone. About 500,000 people are refugees–10 per cent. of the population live outside the country–and about half the population has been internally displaced by the conflict. Mayhem has been rife in large parts of the country. That is graphically demonstrated by the amputations, the torture, the child soldiers and the total collapse of any ordered society in the regions, where the rebels have ruled by terror. Sierra Leone has become the poorest country in the world, a large proportion of the population being illiterate because a generation has missed out on schooling. A quick fix and rapid departure is not possible. An ordered response is required from the donor countries of the world, which must include help to build up Sierra Leone's civil society. Support must be given to local democrats, non-governmental organisations, lawyers and academics, who have kept the faith throughout these years and who need liberating from the thugs and the terror. The United Kingdom's role is crucial.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): First, I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) for introducing the debate. The hon. Gentleman has an honourable record of raising important African issues. It is a disgrace that it fell to him to raise the issue in this Chamber; there should have been a debate on the Floor of the House on the commitment of British servicemen overseas. Two Government statements are not sufficient, particularly on a complicated issue such as Sierra Leone, which has so many facets. A single question to the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs or the Secretary of State for Defence following their statements does not allow hon. Members enough time to make their views known. Both Ministers were disingenuous in their statements. They sought to obfuscate the true nature of the mission–if it had any when they began the military commitment.

I intervened on the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie about the United Kingdom's responsibility for Sierra Leone compared with our position on Rwanda. The hon. Gentleman was unnecessarily harsh on the previous Government's policy on Rwanda, which, from my recollection, was supported by the then Labour Opposition. The United Kingdom does not have a particular responsibility for Rwanda and the previous Government's policy was in line with that of the rest of the international community. With hindsight, the international community should have acted differently, but we do not have the benefit of hindsight when we make such decisions. When the international community decided to send a UN mission to Rwanda, the United Kingdom committed troops to the operation.

Dr. Tonge: The issue is not whose responsibility it is to intervene in any particular country. Those countries do not stand alone. The problem in Rwanda arose from the mutual antipathy of the Hutu and Tutsi people. They are spread throughout the Great Lakes region of Africa and any conflict between them was bound to intensify. Intervention in a particular country is not the responsibility of solely one country, but of the world.

Mr. Blunt: The hon. Lady has identified one of the complications in the Great Lakes region. The fact that the two ethnic groups have a long history of hostility makes military intervention on one side or the other and trying to establish peace difficult. That is not the situation in Sierra Leone with the RUF. Sierra Leone is different because ethnic conflict is not present as it is in the Great Lakes region. We should not be distracted by the question of international intervention in the Great Lakes region.

Dr. Tonge: The Great Lakes region illustrates how a problem in one country can affect the entire region. We have been discussing the diamond trade. Wars may be triggered by ethnic conflict and fuelled by the diamond, oil or gold industry. They affect the whole region and Sierra Leone is another example of that.

Mr. Blunt: Certainly, the gold and diamond industries were not issues in the Great Lakes region.

Speaking of west Africa as a whole, the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie drew attention to the very uncomfortable choice that faced the international community in respect of Nigeria leading regional intervention into Liberia. He drew attention to the nature of the Nigerian regime at the time. Nigeria was subject to sanctions from the Commonwealth and elsewhere for the execution of Ken Sarawiwa and the oppression of the Ogone people. However, the international community welcomed the Nigerian leadership of the intervention in Liberia. Foreign ministries throughout the world, and not least the members of the Security Council, have to make uncomfortable choices.

I take issue with the hon. Gentleman's comments on the Lomé agreement, which he endorsed. Making Corporal Sankoh Vice-President of Sierra Leone and Minister for Natural Resources turned out to be a disaster, which should have been predicted. It is the latest stage of British responsibility for what has happened in Sierra Leone, which is why we have a special responsibility now to take the lead in trying to re-establish a decent civil society there.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Peter Hain): Is the hon. Gentleman implying that the Lomé agreement was a British-negotiated agreement? If so, he is wrong and other Conservative Back Benchers are similarly mistaken. It was an African-brokered agreement by ECOWAS, the Economic Community of West African States, backed by the Commonwealth and the United Nations with Britain and the United States as observers. However imperfect it was, it must be remembered that there was no Sierra Leonean army, the RUF had thousands of troops and President Kabbah believed that he should obtain the best possible negotiated deal, however imperfect.

Mr. Blunt: The unfortunate truth is that President Kabbah believed that he had to agree to that deal because his only source of income was aid from the first world. He did not have control of the diamond fields or receive royalties from diamond production. It was made clear to him that if he did not sign the Lomé agreement, he would not receive further development assistance.

Mr. Gapes: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that President Kabbah should have said, "OK, I don't want a deal. I'll let Mr. Sankoh take over Freetown and massacre intellectuals, lawyers and everyone else"?

Mr. Blunt: Corporal Sankoh would have had difficulty doing that because he was under sentence of death in a Nigerian jail. He was released to conduct the negotiations leading to the Lomé agreement. It was clear from the specialist African press and the personalities involved that the agreement was forced on the Nigerians and President Kabbah against their better judgment. As the hon. Gentleman said, the production figures show that 90 per cent. of the diamonds sold through Liberia come from Sierra Leone and RUF areas. The RUF is a bunch of terrorist gangsters, so it is hardly surprising that, given its relationship with Liberia and having been left in control of the diamond-producing areas, it would not easily give up its source of wealth. That is precisely how it turned out.

If the United Nations force that was sent to implement the Lomé agreement had been robust and led by a first-world power with a strong mandate, it might have been possible by force of arms to have persuaded the RUF to surrender and to have forced the current confrontation with the RUF. The United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone, UNAMSIL, was made up of nations that are militarily reasonable, such as the Indians and Jordanians, and of those that have proven in the field to be, absolutely lamentable, such as the Zambian contingent, which got into frightful trouble in Sierra Leone during the past six months and acted as a trigger–many Zambians were taken hostage. The next phase of operations with the RUF began to move away from the agreement, and the RUF thought that it might have a chance to turn over the operations of the United Nations and of the Sierra Leonean Government.

Our responsibility in the Sierra Leonean saga goes back to the arms to Africa affair. The Government display what appears to be an ethical reluctance to have anything to do with companies such as Sandline International and Executive Outcomes, which worked for the Sierra Leonean Government and the diamond producers. The Government's reactions in public and private make a rather interesting contrast. In public, they display enormous concern about appearances and presentation. That is why they were so anxious to secure an agreement at Lomé. The Sierra Leonean Government and the Nigerians–the other major power that was involved–were, in effect, forced to come to an agreement, although their instinct was to crush and eliminate the RUF, which they would have done if they had had the appropriate support and opportunities. That could have been achieved if President Kabbah had been given realistic support in the first place from companies such as Sandline International and Executive Outcomes.

The Government have made clear their great distaste for private-sector military companies, but if such companies had been used in Sierra Leone, they would have realised the objective, which we share, of ensuring victory for the democratically elected Government of Sierra Leone and they would have secured the country's wealth-creation area–the diamond mines–which could have been handed over to a major mining corporation. That company could have helped to secure the area in exactly the same way that that has been done in other difficult parts of the world, such as Colombia. Royalties would have flowed to the Sierra Leonean Government–they would have had a source of income that would have enabled them to rebuild civil society in that country.

Dr. Tonge: The hon. Gentleman's comments make a good advertisement for arms brokers and for illegal arms sales. Does he agree that arms brokers should be registered and that their exports should be licensed on an organised basis?

Mr. Blunt: I agree with that absolutely. Transparency in this difficult area is extremely important. However, when one is trying to secure effective military intervention but, for understandable reasons, one does not want one's armed forces to be sucked into someone else's war, a strong case can be made for paying companies to take the necessary action. If one says that the public image of private arms companies is so unattractive that one wants to have absolutely nothing to do with them, one ties one's hands and takes away a tool that can be used to achieve one's foreign policy goals.

Mr. Keetch: I want to be clear about what the hon. Gentleman is saying. He knows, for various reasons, that there are many security companies in my constituency. Would he have preferred it if British mercenaries rather than a United Nations, or a British, force had gone into Sierra Leone?

Mr. Blunt: Each situation is unique, but it would have been better if the democratically elected Government of Sierra Leone had sorted out their own internal problem in the first place, with the assistance of companies such as Sandline International and Executive Outcomes and on the promise of future revenue from royalties from the diamond mines, than if, after two or three years of butchery by Corporal Sankoh's forces and the RUF, the whole international community had been d awn in.

Given the United Kingdom's responsibility for Sierra Leone, the Government should see the action through to its proper conclusion. They were faced with a choice when they decided to deploy military forces. At first, the operation was intended simply to evacuate British nationals. Then another aim was added—to secure Lungi airport to get a United Nations force into the country. The main objective should be to return Sierra Leone to the control of its democratically elected president and restore civil society and security for its people.

The RUF is a bunch of terrorist gangsters, which supports itself in power through the supply of money that it gets from Sierra Leone's diamond mines and its relationship with Liberia, where the diamonds are marketed. The key military objective is to destroy the RUF by taking control of the ground that is vital to it—that is, the diamond-producing area. I believe that that is achievable, given that the RUF has no cultural basis of support and commands no tribal loyalty. I hope that the Minister will correct me if I am wrong about that. The operation should be properly followed up with the kinds of commitment that the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie described—retraining the Sierra Leone army, training the police force and the civil service and putting in place civil institutions.

Following the achievement of that military objective, the mining areas could be held by UN forces, and, in due course, handed over to a civil mining company that would look after their security. Meanwhile, the local police force and army could be built up with the help of companies such as Executive Outcomes and Sandline International, which provide such services in similar difficult circumstances.

Dr. Tonge: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Blunt: I have taken too long already, if the hon. Lady will forgive me.

The hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie drew attention to the relative levels of involvement of UN and British forces. I agree with him that it would be infinitely better if it were a UN operation, under one flag, with a clear mandate to destroy the RUF through military action.

That raises the problem of who is to command and organise the UN operation. The hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie said that first-world forces would have to be involved. Britain is the only first-world country on the ground, so the Minister would have the difficult task of achieving British leadership and control of the operation so as to ensure its success. Given their previous leadership role, the Nigerians may resent the United Kingdom entering an area in which they are the main regional power. Another important factor may be the position of the current Indian commander of the UN force.

While difficult sensitivities will have to be addressed, the military objectives can be achieved with the forces that are on the ground in Sierra Leone. Given our country's responsibility for the situation, that is the course of action that we should pursue. It would be a crying shame if Government reluctance to establish control over the key wealth-producing area of the diamond mines—which is central to the restoration of civil society in Sierra Leone—led to a softly, softly approach based on the hope that the RUF would crumble in the face of a static British presence in Lungi and Freetown, and that the UN forces would gradually be beefed up to carry out that operation. The RUF might well collapse and victory might fall into our lap. However, we should not take the risk.

We have the opportunity to take firm action to restore a level of stability to Sierra Leone that it has not experienced for far too long. I hope that the Government will grasp that nettle. My hon. Friends on the Opposition Front Bench have made it clear that that is also their view. I hope that the Government will discharge their responsibilities to Sierra Leone in a way that can be admired and held up as an example of resolute action being used to achieve the proper outcome in that unhappy part of the world.

10.45 am

Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): I am here not to make my own speech but to represent my constituents. I am no expert in foreign affairs, and rarely engage in debates on the subject, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) for raising the matter.

A third of my constituents is of ethnic minority origin, and among that group is a significant number from west Africa. I have received representations from three organisations. First, the National League for Human Rights and Democracy is a non-profit international human rights organisation that is a recognised non-governmental organisation within the UN. It monitors and promotes issues of human rights and democratic values in west Africa. It is working on long-term solutions to the problems in Sierra Leone and examining models that have been adopted in Northern Ireland, for example. I hope to encourage it to make submissions to the Select Committee during its inquiry.

Secondly, I have received representations from the Lewisham Racial Equality Council, which feels that the status and concerns of people here need to be connected to their concerns about the countries from which they came. Finally, I have received representations from the South London African Organisation and I want to read its submissions into the record today. It believes that the present chaos in the west African sub-region is a consequence of the premature exit of the Nigerian-led west African peacekeeping force and the deployment of what it regards as an ill-equipped, under-resourced and badly trained UN peacekeeping force.

According to the organisation, most Sierra Leoneans argue that a weakness undermining the UN force is its rules of engagement, and that proactive engagement is the only suitable remedy for the complexity and severity of the conflict there. As one would expect, it condemns unequivocally the disruption of the UN forces and the peacekeeping mission. It appreciates the efforts of western Governments and the international community to secure peace and political stability, but it argues, as others have done this morning, for a much more proactive approach.

Prompted by recent developments, concerned Sierra Leoneans and other African nationals met on 8 and 9 May under the auspices of the South London African Organisation to put forward a number of proposals, which have been sent to me to convey to the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain). The organisation categorically condemns the killings and abduction of the UN peacekeeping troops by Foday Sankoh's Revolutionary United Front rebels. It asks western Governments—especially Britain and the United States—and the international community to support the Government and the people of Sierra Leone to secure sustainable peace and political stability by contributing rapid reaction troops. The organisation urges that this be treated as a matter of urgency.

The Nigerian-led west African peacekeeping force should, the organisation believes, be redeployed in Sierra Leone, as part of a well resourced, well trained and well equipped peacekeeping contingent. It believes that the current Lomé peace deal should be reviewed urgently, and that investigations into the shooting of peaceful protestors by RUF rebels at the residence of their leader, Foday Sankoh, in the capital, Freetown, should be part of such a wider review. The Sierra Leonean army and civil defence force should be strengthened, and the hitherto disputed status of the former resolved urgently.

The group does not want to engage in polemics about the rationale for a western contribution to a rapid reaction force, but it believes that the trustees of the Lomé peace accord—Britain, the United States and the international community—share an obligation to bring peace and political stability to war-torn Sierra Leone. My hon. Friend the Minister of State has clarified the position regarding the United Kingdom's role, but this organisation believes that the United Nations, including Britain and the United States, induced the Government and people of Sierra Leone to sign the Lomé peace deal with the RUF and its allies.

It is important that the Minister clarifies the position—he has done so today, and I shall make that point to the group. According to the group, there was a guarantee that the trustees would secure a sustainable peace through all humanly possible means. The group makes a contrast between the position of their country vis-à-vis the international community and that of Kosovo, where there are tens of thousands of NATO troops, including United States troops. Members of the group feel that there should be more international support, particularly from the United States, which recently agreed to extend operations by its troops in Kosovo, but still rules out sending a rapid reaction force to Sierra Leone. They say that the west and the international community should have learned by now that simple logistical support will not be a long-term solution to the problems faced by Sierra Leone.

Finally, on behalf of the Sierra Leoneans and under the umbrella of the South London African Organisation, I have been asked to appeal to the Government to react positively to the situation in Sierra Leone. The group appreciates what has been done, but feels strongly—the letter is signed by 71 constituents—that more must be done and that there must be longer-term, sustained support to find a peaceful solution and allow a return to full democracy.

10.53 am

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): I want to make three points, but I shall be brief.

First, I appreciate what my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock) said. A number of my constituents are refugees or have come from west Africa to study in this country. Two years ago, I made representations to the Government about why it was taking them so long to resolve the status of the Sierra Leoneans in my constituency. One of the leading lawyers involved in the prosecution of the people who carried out the previous coup had had to flee to this country. Her children were in Guinea, but she did not know where they were and was desperately worried. In the end, she went to Guinea to find her children, before her status in this country had been resolved. That was regrettable, and we should look at such matters, because they affect many people who flee to this country. Perhaps the Daily Mail and The Sun could carry stories about the way in which people have fled Sierra Leone and elsewhere to come to this country.

I want to comment on what the hon. Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) said. He talked about national interest, which is a difficult question. Obviously, it is not possible for this country, despite being a permanent member of the Security Council, to be involved in all attempts to resolve conflicts throughout the world. However, it would be regrettable if politicians in this country gave the impression—as some Opposition Mems have—that we are interested in saving the lives of white Europeans only, and could not care less about black Africans. I welcome the comments of the hon. Member for Reigate, who said that we should see the job through and continue to offer support. Given our involvement in the Lomé process, the diamond trade and other activities, and given our colonial history, we have a responsibility to the region.

What will happen in the long term if we succeed in liberating diamond production areas through the international community? Financially, personally and in terms of his surrogate army, the RUF, it is clear that President Charles Taylor of Liberia has a significant interest in the region. We must demonstrate foresight in respect of events in Liberia. Will it host continuing RUF incursions? Will there be guerrilla warfare? How secure will the region ultimately prove? That raises the wider question of stability and democracy not just in Sierra Leone, but in neighbouring countries.

I mentioned the UN report "An Agenda for Peace", which was produced by former UN Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali. We must reconsider that report, as well as how to establish effective regional security organisations. As a north Atlantic, European security organisation, NATO should not be the world's policeman. That would give rise to political problems, and it is difficult to see how it could work in strategic and logistical terms. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) said, NATO is the only regional security organisation that can begin to offer assistance, given the absence of effective organisations elsewhere.

The UN should consider the matter further. We have a role to play in building such structures because of the respect in which British military personnel are held throughout the world.

Mr. Blunt: The hon. Gentleman's last comment implied that he believes that NATO has a role to play south of the Tropic of Cancer and I am sure that he will not want to leave that impression. Given his experience of defence, he will want to make it clear that it would be wholly improper for NATO to play such a role outside Europe. Moreover, the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie has misunderstood the nature of NATO. His comments were naive—NATO members may have a responsibility in the region, but the institution does not.

Mr. Gapes: I agree. I know what is stated in article 6 of the North Atlantic treaty, but we shall not go into that now. NATO member states—particularly the United States, but also the United Kingdom and France—have military assets and capabilities that can be deployed globally. Such assets would have to be deployed in certain contexts, but to do so would raise the question whether the prime function—maintaining security in the north Atlantic—was being fulfilled. I have reservations about that approach, because there are implications that must be considered by NATO, the NATO alliance and our partners. Ultimately, we need regional security organisations, so we should do our best to support them.

Finally, I pay tribute to the Nigerians and the work that they have done in this region. I understand that 1,000 Nigerians have been killed in the Sierra Leone conflict. Such a loss would be an enormous burden for any society, and it is not surprising that the democratic candidate in the presidential election gave a commitment to get out of the situation because of it. The President's decision to re-enter the conflict required political courage and must be supported by other countries. We should be working closely with democratic Nigeria to do whatever we can, collectively and with others, to find a solution and to restore to the Sierra Leone Government control of their whole territory.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford): I congratulate the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) on securing this timely debate. He is right to have brought the matter to this Chamber. I congratulate also the hon. Members for Reigate (Mr. Blunt), for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock) and for Ilford, South (Mr. Gapes) on their important speeches.

I shall keep my remarks short, as I want to give the Minister time to answer the questions that have been asked. First, I should ask him whether there is any further information on the bodies bearing United Nations uniforms that were found yesterday and on whether they are those of UN personnel. We would be grateful for any information.

I offer my support and that of the Liberal Democrats to the British mission in Sierra Leone. The arrival of British troops could not have been timelier, and it provided an immediate and much-needed boost to the morale of the UN forces. It is increasingly clear that the presence of British troops is now essential to the success of the UN mission. Since British troops have been present, the UN force has been able to move deeper into the country, secure in the knowledge that its lines of supply, reinforcement and communication are covered. It is right that we should pay tribute not only to the Army presence—in the form of the Parachute Regiment and the Gurkhas—but to the support of the Royal Navy and Royal Air Force helicopter personnel who are flying from HMS Illustrious. The operation is an example of the deployment that the Government rightly identified three years ago in their strategic defence review.

In the past few days, pro-Government soldiers have been able to make significant headway in digging deep into Sierra Leone, assisted by British forces. With the arrest of the rebel leader, Foday Sankoh, and the news that more UN peacekeepers have been freed, the military signs are encouraging. However, the humanitarian implications are still not so. The new refugee crisis to which the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie referred is a strong possibility. We should remember what happened in Kosovo. Of course, the rains are coming, and the whole environment will change much in the next few weeks.

It has become clear that a week is a long time in Sierra Leone. The original mission of British troops was to evacuate British, Commonwealth and European nationals, but that has now advanced to another stage: Royal Navy and Royal Air Force Harriers have been undertaking reconnaissance missions, heavy artillery is being taken off HMS Ocean and deployed ashore to protect our troops at Lungi and Special Air Services and Pathfinder patrols are operating in the front line and exchanging fire with rebel forces. That shift in emphasis has allowed the UN to buy time for additional reinforcements to arrive. What is the Minister's impression of the new UN forces?

We urge the Government to accept that British forces are now central to the UN mission in Sierra Leone and that the premature withdrawal of our troops would have a devastating effect on that mission and on the UN's credibility in peacekeeping missions in general. We must keep some of our forces in Sierra Leone until UN troops have established their authority throughout the country. The hon. Member for Reigate called for one flag, one control and one force. There are good reasons why that should happen. Should not Britain continue to contribute to the reinforcement of the UN force and not merely enable that reinforcement to occur?

The UN cannot be expected to keep a peace that is not there in the first place. There is a stark difference between the mandates of peacekeeping and peace enforcement. Fundamentally, the UN needs a new and robust mandate that the troops can enforce. We must not forget that the UN constitutes nothing more than the will of its individual members. There has been much talk about the lack of suitable training, the ability to cope and the poor equipment of some UN units. However, if nations that have the capacity to support UN peacekeepers, whether financially, logistically or by providing high-quality equipment, choose to turn our backs, a UN failure will be our failure. It will not be the failure of nations of lesser economic or military capability, which none the less dedicate men where others fear to tread.

Some have argued that African nations should find an African solution to the problem. However, we have a moral responsibility as a permanent member of the Security Council, as the former colonial power and as the leader of the Commonwealth to provide a solution when others cannot. The Government are floating plans to train and arm the Sierra Leonean army and to ensure that 6,000 UN troops are available to secure SLA advances. We also welcome the announcement by the Secretary of State for Defence that military help to UN peacekeepers would continue even after the Parachute Regiment had been withdrawn. That support must be conditional—it must go to the right forces. There are now six separate armed command structures in a country of between 4 million and 5 million people, plus the RUF. We must ensure that British military assistance in terms of weapons or training is directed at the right location.

I pay tribute to the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) on the diamond trade, which is central to the problem. I welcome the reply that the Minister gave my hon. Friend on 18 May, when he said that he had had discussions with the G8, with Belgium and with De Beers. That was helpful and we will support Government moves to ensure that diamonds are part of the answer.

It is the Government's responsibility to ensure that the United Kingdom does not carry the can for the west's unwillingness to connect in Africa. To withdraw prematurely would mean that our intervention had been in vain. By sending our troops to Sierra Leone and by assisting the UN peacekeepers, we have created a responsibility to the United Nations. We must ensure that we live up to that responsibility in the times ahead.

11.6 am

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham): I welcome you, Mr. Gale, to the Chair for the first time in this Chamber. I am delighted to see you presiding over our deliberations. I congratulate the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) on initiating the debate and I echo the concerns expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) that it is taking place in this Chamber and not on the Floor of the House, where more hon. Members could participate.

I would like to add the Opposition's tribute to those already paid to our troops deployed in a hostile environment in Sierra Leone and also to their families back in this country, many of whom will be concerned until the troops return home safely. I am sure that our troops there will rise to the challenge of active service, not least because they are some of our finest service personnel. We all know that they will do a first-class job no matter what is required of them. I would like to express our concerns for the hostages being held by the RUF and for the aid workers still missing. We all hope for their safe return. We heard this morning of the RUF's demands for Foday Sankoh's release in return for the hostages. While appreciating the restrictions under which the Minister operates, we hope that in his reply to the debate he will reassure us about the Government's reaction to those demands.

We have a long historic connection with Sierra Leone, which has been maintained through the Commonwealth and our old colonial responsibilities. Freetown began as a destination for slaves freed by the Royal Navy. Believe it or not, at the end of the 19th century the level of education in Sierra Leone was higher than in this country. Today, however, it is one of the poorest countries in the world, with a derisory gross domestic product per head and a male life expectancy of a mere 37 years of age. However, that disguises the fact that its diamond mines are a major source of wealth. They are at the heart of the current round of killing and fighting, I am afraid. With great sadness we are again discussing Sierra Leone and the parlous state of affairs there.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): I apologise for not having been in the Chamber for the whole debate, but I have been in a Standing Committee. That is a problem for hon. Members serving on Committees who wish to attend debates in this Chamber.

Do hon. Members agree that De Beers has a responsibility? As was said earlier in the debate, diamonds are coming out of Sierra Leone through Liberia and De Beers should close its purchasing offices there. Diamonds appear to be fuelling the conflict. Will Opposition Members add to what has been said about that?

Mrs. Gillan: I thank my hon. Friend, who saves me from having to cover the point later in my speech. Yesterday, the Minister gave evidence to the Foreign Affairs Committee saying that he was taking action over diamond sales and blood diamonds and the Opposition will of course support him.

Mr. Blunt: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Gillan: I am very short of time and hope my hon. Friend will forgive me if I do not give way.

I want to discuss some of the issues that were raised in the Select Committee because the Minister's evidence caused more confusion, with serious implications. I should like the Minister to clarify his evidence about requests from President Kabbah for Brigadier Richards to stay on in Sierra Leone, for an officer to train the Sierra Leonean army and for an official to be transferred into the office of the chief of defence staff. It was revealed that the decisions were taken by officials without reference to the Minister. Does he think, with hindsight, that that was wise? Can he confirm the date of President Kabbah's request, the date of the refusal and the date on which the Minister or his predecessor was informed that the requests—apart from the one for an official to be transferred to the office of the chief of defence staff—had been denied? Does the Minister consider that he has proper control of officials in his Department—particularly if they think that such decisions should be taken without bothering Ministers?

Surely there can be no doubt, after the Foreign Affairs Committee's previous investigation on Sierra Leone, when it adjudged what had gone on to be disastrous, that Ministers should be involved. Yesterday the Minister intimated that the issue was covered in Peter Penfold's briefings, particularly the final telegram, which the Minister said he would reveal in confidence to the Committee. If everything were in order, would the Minister place all the telegrams from Mr. Penfold in the Library of the House, including the valedictory dispatch? Anything less would lead us to believe the worst. He seemed very willing to provide them to the Select Committee yesterday, so I see no reason why they should be denied to other hon. Members.

Mr. Keetch: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Gillan: No. There is not enough time and there is a lot of ground to cover.

I hope that the Minister will provide explanations of the involvement of Air Foyle, following his replies to the Select Committee yesterday. I understand from reports that Air Foyle flew surface-to-air missiles, Kalashnikovs and rocket-propelled grenade launchers from the Ukraine to Burkina Faso last year. The Select Committee has asked the Minister to provide the dates on which officials and Ministers were informed about the flights and the date when the MOD contracts were awarded to Air Foyle. I hope that the Minister has those dates to hand.

The Lomé peace accord has been mentioned by other hon. Members this morning. Will the Minister expand on his evidence yesterday and confirm his and the Government's role? For example, how often did he meet Foday Sankoh? Obviously he spent a great deal of time with him, because he told the Committee yesterday that he repeatedly told him, "You have signed this agreement and you are going to stick to it." Did the Minister have any discussions with Mr. Sankoh about controlling the diamond-producing area of Sierra Leone and what was said on both sides? Can the Minister say categorically that no British official or Minister, or any other agent from the United Kingdom, brought any pressure to bear on President Kabbah to give Mr. Sankoh control of the lucrative diamond area? That matter was raised by the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock). There is some concern that inducements were given. During the Lomé negotiations did any party raise the subject of British aid and were any conditions attached to the aid? Were aid payments linked to the outcome of the Lomé agreement, and if so, how?

Why did the Minister acquiesce to the appointment to high office, and to the control of the country's finances, of a man who has raped, pillaged, maimed, tortured and cannibalised his people and murdered his family? Is the Minister happy to have done business with him on behalf of the United Kingdom?

Finally, I raise the military issues mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate. Two weeks ago, we were told that our troops had a clear mandate to organise the evacuation of British citizens and ensure their safety. It is clear that that was not the whole truth; following the Minister's frankness in evidence to the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, we are now closer to the truth. The Minister told us that the troops' mandate was to evacuate British citizens, to secure Lungi airport, to facilitate the entry of UN peacekeepers via that secure airport, to provide logistical support to the UN force, to carry out searches for the hostages and to assist in any way that is considered desirable. That sounds like a mission brief. I believe that the Minister said yesterday—I could have checked his words had the transcript been available—that nothing is outside its mandate. If that is so, he should clear up the uncertainty and confusion about the deployment of forces. The remarks of a British officer with detailed knowledge of the operation demonstrate that confusion. He said that one of the problems in putting the mission together was that > the Government blows hot and cold on this issue, especially Robin Cook.

British forces continue to receive our support in whatever they are called on to do. However, the nature of our commitment is changing and Ministers have still not provided enough clarity. We read reports about the possibility that the United Kingdom might supply arms. The subject is being considered at a meeting today. The mission now appears to be an open-ended commitment, with the Minister giving the impression that our troops could be tied up in Sierra Leone for months. Despite the Foreign Secretary's assurances at the beginning of the month that British troops would not be committed as a combat force, they are taking on a combat role. The longer the mission lasts, the more likelihood there is of troops being drawn deeper into the conflict.

The Government's record on Sierra Leone has not been a happy one. British marines and paratroopers are doing a great job there. They will have the support of the Opposition in whatever they are asked to do. However, the Government's activities—and, in some cases, the inactivity of Ministers—will continue to be the subject of close scrutiny. I hope that the Minister will have enough time to answer the many questions that are being repeatedly raised about the Government's involvement in Sierra Leone.

11.18 am

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Peter Hain): Frankly, I doubt that I shall have time to do so.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) on securing this important debate at such a critical time. I pay tribute to his long commitment to foreign policy, especially in Africa. His remarks were thoughtful and well informed, which contrasted favourably with many of the debates on the issue in recent weeks. I agree with him that the debate has been flawed—the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) made a similar point—in that it has focused on how fast we can depart rather than on what we are seeking to achieve.

Mrs. Gillan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hain: No, I am sorry, but I do not have time.

Mrs. Gillan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Order. It is clear that the Minister is not giving way.

Mr. Hain: The remarks of other hon. Members were equally important, especially those by my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Gapes).

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie that control of the diamond trade is crucial. That is true for Angola, the Congo and especially Sierra Leone. The hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) made the same point. He and other h Ms raised important issues concerning diamonds and the role of Liberia. Although De Beers has pulled out of Sierra Leone, it retains an office in Liberia. As all Sierra Leone's diamonds go across the Liberian border, De Beers should give the matter some attention. However, I must acknowledge that De Beers has co-operated with us in developing pioneering work to regulate the international diamond trade.

As the hon. Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) described his plans for the use of private armies to solve every conflict in the world, I had an image of Commander Blunt, the hero of "Wild Geese", the sequel, intervening in conflicts.

Mr. Blunt: Will the Minister give way? He has misrepresented me.

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Order. The hon. Gentleman has been in the House long enough to know that he cannot accuse a Minister of misrepresenting facts in this Chamber.

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman made one good point about how important it is to get control of diamond areas, but we must bear in mind that the diamonds are alluvial diamonds. They come from a vast area of bandit country and the terrain is difficult. The logistics must be considered.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock) made many well-argued points on behalf of her constituents. I hope that they will be reassured. I understand the African anger about the apparent readiness of the west to intervene in Kosovo but not in Africa. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South said in his well-informed speech, Africa needs regional security and peacekeeping. It needs to use the Southern African Development Community, ECOWAS in west Africa and the EAC—the East African Community—in east Africa to develop its own peacekeeping conflict-prevention capacity to provide the sockets into which a UN and western plug could fit. The absence of such a socket has been a problem in Africa for many years. I agree that NATO cannot do everything.

The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham referred to the big fuss that was made yesterday and what the high commissioner did or did not say. On 11 April, President Kabbah called the high commissioner, Peter Penfold, to say that he had decided to appoint a temporary Sierra Leonean chief of defence staff to replace the seriously ill Nigerian, General Khobe. He was concerned that General Khobe's departure would lead to a collapse of morale and would boost the RUF rebels. He asked us to move one of the British advisers who was working on the reform of the Sierra Leonean army into the defence headquarters with the new chief of defence staff. We did that, as the hon. Lady acknowledged. The president also asked us to advance the arrival of the new British commander of the military assistance and training team, which we agreed to do.

His third request, however, was to delay the departure of Brigadier Richards, who had been on a tour of duty, so that he could take over as the Sierra Leonean chief of defence staff. However, as there is no Sierra Leonean army to speak of, how could a senior British soldier—I hope that the hon. Lady is not advocating this—be catapulted into that position? We replied that our objectives are to strengthen the UN mission—we gave instructions to Peter Penfold to that effect—and to increase and stiffen the operation so that it is deployed further across the territory. We received no complaint about that. On the contrary, Peter Penfold reported that President Kabbah was content with our response and that UN forces were following our suggestion and deployment had begun.

As for ministerial involvement, the response was a routine operational matter. I saw the telegrams and there was no need to invite a submission or interfere with the decision. It was a perfectly straightforward operational matter within ministerial policy guidelines. It had nothing to do with the recent collapse of the peace process. The collapse was triggered not by that exchange—it would not have had an influence—but by the deployment of UN forces in the Makeni diamond producing area, which was controlled by the RUF. The UN forces asked the RUF to disarm, but they refused and took some of the UN forces captive because they feared that they would lose control of the diamond producing areas. That triggered Foday Sankoh's reneging on the Lomé peace agreement and the subsequent troubles. It had nothing to do with the exchange of telegrams. I am glad to have had the opportunity to put that on the record.

As for the Lomé agreement, I answered that point earlier. There were no inducements. There was no pressure. There was no bargaining over aid and development assistance. President Kabbah negotiated that deal. It should be remembered that he was besieged by thousands of RUF soldiers—the most belligerent and well-armed force in the country—and he had no forces of his own. There was no United Nations peacekeeping mandate; that would have taken months to achieve. One of the problems is the slowness of the UN's reaction to such matters. There was no alternative to that least-worst, imperfect deal. We will have to live with that fact, but there was no British pressure on the president to sign that agreement.

I have answered the question about Air Foyle. In March 1999, it apparently transported some arms from the Ukraine to Burkina Faso. We referred the matter to the UN sanctions committee, but there is no evidence that Air Foyle knew that those arms would be transported separately by another carrier to the RUF.

[Mr. Hain]

Violence and instability are not new to Sierra Leone. They have plagued it for more than 30 years. During the past nine years, since the RUF launched its war against the people of Sierra Leone, the country has been afflicted by unimaginable brutality. The people have seen their hopes and their prospects for peace repeatedly denied. The only time the RUF was repelled was in January 1999, when it besieged Freetown and 6,000 people were killed there. The Nigerian-led ECOWAS force repelled the RUF, which created the circumstances for the Lomé agreement. I echo the tribute paid by my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South to the extremely important role played by the Nigerians—and the sacrifices that they made.

After nine years of brutal, bestial war, considerable progress has been made in the search for stability, security and peace. The UK and the international community have sustained President Kabbah, the elected leader, in power. The level of violence and the number of atrocities have been drastically reduced. We have supported the Lomé peace agreement, which offered the people of Sierra Leone a chance of lasting peace and stability. A large UN peacekeeping force has been deployed to help implement it; 2,000 more UN peacekeepers have come to Sierra Leone since British forces arrived, and another 2,000 will follow.

The reconstruction of the country has begun. We are building new and effective armed forces for Sierra Leone, accountable to a civilian ministry of defence. More than half of the former combatants have been disarmed—a considerable achievement—and led away from violence towards a new civilian life. Preparations for democratic elections early next year have begun. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie for leading a visit by the Westminster Foundation for Democracy in March 2000. Substantial progress has been made, but the RUF's actions in the past few weeks have posed a challenge to that progress.

The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham asked about the RUF demand that Sankoh be released in exchange for the release of hostages. Let me make it absolutely clear that we do not negotiate deals with hostage takers. That has consistently been British Government policy. Sankoh and his followers must understand that they are in defiance of the United Nations and the international community. The hostages must be released safely and in good health. We will not trade Sankoh's freedom. He must face justice. He has a lot to answer for and he must be held fully accountable for his actions. I had a half-hour meeting with him, and challenged him about the diamonds. He became extremely unhappy and frustrated when pressed on the subject.

Our response has been swift and decisive. Our first priority was, and is, to protect British lives. Within days, we deployed the spearhead battalion with back-up forces, which enabled us to mount a swift and efficient evacuation of British and other entitled citizens. We have helped to secure the situation and we deserve praise, not continual sniping. The entire international community is praising us, and I invite the Opposition to do so as well.

Pension Rights (Married Women)

11.30 am

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): I wish to raise an issue of justice that affects thousands, perhaps millions, of married women throughout Britain. Much of my speech will consist of short excerpts from letters that I have received from married women, because I want the debate to consist not of a politician from one party criticising a politician from another party, but of the authentic voice and anger of married women pensioners and those approaching pensionable age.

I shall begin with a letter from a Mrs. R. of Chingford, who says:

> I am 54 years now...I have worked since I was 17 except for 3 years when I had my son, and am only entitled to 99p per week...It looks as though a lifetime of work and paying NI will leave me a very poor pensioner.

That is typical of the sense of injustice and anger in the 40 or 50 letters that I have received—a further four arrived this morning—on this issue.

As word gets around, I receive new letters expressing happiness at the fact that someone is taking up this issue, and I hope that the Minister will respond positively and constructively to the debate. I cannot hold the present Government responsible for these problems, many of which occurred decades ago, so I hope that the Minister will not adopt a defensive posture, but will join me instead in trying to right an historic injustice.

As the Minister will know, married women were initially allowed to pay a reduced rate of national insurance contributions in return for forgoing pension and certain other benefit rights. From 1977, no new cases were allowed, but 4 million women—about one in 10 of the then adult population—were allowed to continue with such payments, so the scale of the problem is large. In 1989, national insurance for the low paid was restructured, so that many married women on the reduced rate paid no more—perhaps even less—in opting instead for full national insurance. It is the initial system, the 1977 reforms and the 1989 reforms that I want to examine today.

The Department may have believed that married women who paid reduced national insurance contributions knew what they were doing, given that they signed a form stating that they had read the booklet and had made an informed trade-off. However, the reality is very different. Many married women have written to me saying that they had no idea how the system worked. Mrs. R. of Oldham said:

> I recently wrote for a pension forecast and was appalled to find that I am only entitled to a pension of £22 when I reach the age of 60 in two years time...Absolutely no information was given to the fact that we would receive such a derisory pension. Had this been made clear at the time, I would immediately have elected to pay the full contribution.

There is also ignorance about the home responsibilities protection provisions. Mrs. S. of Weston said:

> I was advised to pay a reduced stamp. I was not made aware at the time that I would not receive HRP credits for the time bringing up my children.

That issue has been raised by a number of women. Mrs. S. says that > thousands of women like myself...did not fully understand the implications of being on a reduced NI stamp until it was too late.

In other words, people genuinely did not understand the way in which this complex system worked. In many cases, married women did not make an informed and considered choice to save money now and pay in future—it was not like that.

Not only did many people not understand the system; some were given no choice. Mrs. S. of Morecambe writes:

> In 1975 I got a small part-time job and told my then employer that I wished to pay full NI contributions. I was informed that this was not possible as all married women in part-time jobs had to pay reduced contributions.

She continues by emphasising:

> At no time did I elect to pay reduced rate.

The Minister may say, "That is not possible: she must have signed a form." Perhaps she did, or perhaps the employer added her name to it—who knows. However, her perception is that she did not choose to pay reduced rate and would not have chosen to do so, had she known what was going on.

Some married women were given duff advice by their employers. One of my constituents, Mrs. H. of Compton Greenfield, who went back to work part time in 1972, was given no choice. She says:

> My employer at that time employed an accountant who automatically deducted the reduced rate, and the implications were not explained to me. At no time was I informed about pension rights.

Some women asked their employers and got duff advice. Perhaps more worryingly, some also got duff advice from the Department of Social Security. For example, Mrs. J. of Billericay says:

> I reached retirement age in October 1999 and filled in the form. The amount was £19.65 per week...I elected to pay married women's stamps when I got married in 1964—

this is the key element in this case—

> because the Social Security said this would secure a full pension in my own right at 60 years, topping up my husband's contribution.

She went to the DSS and got duff advice. Similarly, Mrs. M. of Yeovil states:

> A work colleague and myself were informed by the DSS office at Yeovil that, regardless of the stamp amount paid...our pensions would not be affected.

The Minister will have seen The Daily Telegraph on Saturday, which carried a story about a lady who had contacted me. When she asked, she was told that she had asked the wrong questions. That is the problem. People do not know how the system works. When they ask questions, they are given duff information; they are told that they have asked the wrong questions. If only they had known the right question to ask, they might have been given the right answer. That is the backdrop to the issue.

The 1977 rule change prevented newly married women from opting in. Married women at that time were contacted. I am not saying that the relevant information was not in the forms, nor that letters did not go out. I am aware that contact was made. However, I am querying the nature and the effects of the contact. Mrs. K. of Oldham says:

> In 1977 when the law changed, I along with many others asked for advice either from our employers or the local social security office. The advice I got was "don't bother, you'll not get a pension, you won't have enough stamps on when you retire."

That woman is now receiving a pension of £29 a week. She says:

> Just think what it could have been if I had started paying when I was 40.

That was when the issue arose. The advice given may have been right for some people, but I guarantee that it was not right for all.

Similarly misleading advice from the DSS can be found in the case of Mrs. M. from Wotton-under-Edge, who says:

> In the 1980s—

after the rule change—

> I telephoned the national insurance office to ask if this would affect my full pension at 60, and was told emphatically that it would make no difference whatsoever to my full pension at 60.

That was very clear.

A further example, relating to home responsibility protection and to the contents of the paperwork, is that of Mrs. C. of Dursley, who used to work for the DSS. She says:

> When the election had to be confirmed, we were not issued with any paperwork or guidance. The certificate of election does not give any details—the implications on HRP do not get mentioned.

With regard to home responsibility protection, women who did not work at all would receive credits on their pension. Women paying full-rate national insurance would receive a pension entitlement. However, women who worked and paid some national insurance would receive no home responsibility protection. They would have been better off from the point of view of their pension if they had paid no national insurance at all. That is a crazy situation, and it is not surprising that no one understood it.

In 1989, we reach the key point in this saga. The Government reformed national insurance so that low-paid workers who did not pay much national insurance would have the right to a full pension. However, married women went on paying what was still called the reduced rate, which, by comparison, was pretty similar by then. Many women would have been well advised to go back in at that stage: all those who could have saved on national insurance by so doing, and those who might have paid a few pence more but started to build up pension rights. However, there were again problems with publicity. Mrs. K. of Oldham says:

> I don't remember a major publicity campaign in the late 80s. How would people know about leaflets at the local Benefits Agency? It wouldn't have been difficult to get in touch with those concerned...[they] don't seem to have any problem when it's an underpayment, do they?

That lady knew nothing about the change in 1989.

[Mr. Steve Webb]

Likewise, Mrs. Y. of Bath says that she did hear from the Department but could not make head nor tail of what she was told. She says:

> I can remember having a letter many years ago...saying something about paying the higher rate National Insurance, but it was written in the usual official jargon which few understand and it certainly was not drawn to one's attention as being of major importance...the DHSS must have realised from the lack of response that thousands like me had not understood the full implications and should have issued something in "normal English" which spelt out the advantages a little better.

That is a key point. The change in 1989 should have prompted many married women to opt back in to the full rate and the number of women on the reduced rate should have dropped correspondingly, but that did not happen. The Department of Social Security should have noticed that few people had responded to the change and realised that it needed to try harder.

Two groups have been particularly affected. The first of those is women with much younger husbands; I refer to this as the toy boy problem. One woman said in her letter:

> My husband is 15 years younger than me.

That means that she will be 80 before she receives a pension on his contributions to the age of 65. She might be dead by then, having had 20 years of retirement with no pension in her own right. The Minister may say that for many women it will not matter, because they will get a pension on their husband's entitlement and could not have made as much on their own contributions. However, for the woman that I quoted, and others like her, it matters a great deal.

The second group comprises women who worked on a full stamp before they were married. Mrs. C of Guildford states:

> We were advised verbally that it was a waste of time paying a full stamp, but not told of the implications. The eight years I worked before marriage paying full stamp were wiped out.

In a couple more years, she would have had a 25 per cent. pension, but all those years were wiped out because she did not quite make the threshold. She probably could have got a pension, but was wrongly advised.

Pensioners from around the country have been telling me of the disgust that they feel when they receive their pension forecast, which is often the first time that they realise—at the age of 58 or 59—that they are expecting a pension that will not materialise. Mrs. M. of Wotton-under-Edge said:

> I was 60 in 1995 and ... had written to ask for a printout of my pension rights. I was totally shocked when it came back stating my pension would be 8p per week.

She had only seven years' worth of full stamps but, when she offered to make it up to 10 years, was told that she had left it too late. She continued:

> I asked why I had not been advised but was given a curt answer. I have always been totally disgusted with the way the pension blunder has been handled by the government—that is, the previous Government. In practical terms, some married women cannot retire; they have to carry on working because they do not have enough money to live on. Mr. Y. of Tyne and Wear wrote:

> My wife receives the princely sum of 65p per week pension ... she still works although she would like to retire—why can't she?—because the pension would not let her.

Married women all over the country who are just below, or above, pension age are disgusted, appalled and shocked when they receive such forecasts, because they had no idea how the system worked or they were given bad advice. Some are having to carry on working, and most feel that this is another case of women getting a raw deal out of the pensions system.

What should be done? I sought to give the Department advance warning of some of the points that I wanted to raise, and hope to receive recognition that the matter needs serious, long-term investigation. I ask the Minister to deal with three aspects in his response. First, married women deserve an apology—not from him, but on behalf of successive Governments—for the way in which they have been let down by the pensions system. One can argue that the forms gave the necessary information, and that if people had known the right questions to ask and had been aware of how the system worked there would have been no problem. However, many were not in that position and they continue to write to me every day to tell me so. They deserve an apology.

Secondly, the matter deserves serious consideration by the Government. I was treated somewhat dismissively by the Secretary of State when I raised it during Social Security questions a few weeks ago. The cases that I have mentioned, and others, require independent investigation, perhaps in association with Age Concern or another organisation that has contact with pensioners' groups. People must have confidence that a root-and-branch investigation into what went on and what went wrong is being undertaken.

Thirdly, redress must be given. That may be different in every case and inappropriate in some. Nevertheless, where people have been misled by officialdom, or if the Government have failed to contact them to tell them how the system works and what to do about it, the Government—even the successor Government—have a duty to respond to those cases, perhaps by reconsidering the home responsibility protection rules, or by allowing people to buy back years, even some years later. There may be other forms of necessary redress, but redress must be made.

The 40 or 50 letters that I have received are the tip of a large iceberg. I am grateful for the chance to bring the matter to the attention of the Chamber, and I look forward to a constructive response from the Minister.

11.45 am

The Minister of State, Department of Social Security (Mr. Jeff Rooker): I hope that I will be able to give the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) a response that will be at least partially satisfactory. No Minister could ever give a totally satisfactory response in a half-hour debate such as this.

What is perceived to have gone wrong in the cases mentioned by the hon. Gentleman—although I note that the ages of the individuals vary—was a long time ago; in a bygone age, as far as my Department is concerned. To refresh my memory of the issues, I have checked parliamentary questions that I asked and comments that I made in the 1970s. In the late 1970s, changes were made which prevented married women from opting out if they were new to the work force. There was also the abolition of the half-test rule. At one time, I had a file 6 in thick, and I remember writing to those constituents for whom we were unable to put matters right, saying that we had put them right for the future and that the next generation would not be in the same mess.

I remember asking my noble Friend Lord Orme, who was a Social Security Minister at the time, why the Department could not give advice. It was as if there was an ordinance that Departments did not give advice—they were not in the advice business. All we could say to constituents was, "Make a claim and you will get a decision", when what they really needed was an advice shop in the Department. I can assure hon. Members that, in the 1940s, '50s, '60s, '70s and most of the '80s, no such thing existed.

The culture has changed since then, although I do not say that the future is completely rosy. The women whose cases the hon. Gentleman has raised are, rightly, aggrieved about the way in which they have been treated. However, most people in this country have not got a clue about how the national insurance system works. I must be careful about my language; it seems to me that most people do not fully appreciate the starkness of the position. Single men pay the same rate of national insurance as married men. The stark reality is that married couples who rely on the pension of the man are subsidised by the contributions of single people. Although no one puts it quite like that, that is how the system works. There is no differential between the rate for single people and married men. A married man will collect 160 per cent. of pension, including 60 per cent. for his wife, if she is not contributing.

There are many quirky bits such as that in the national insurance system and, occasionally, they come up and bite us. I remember the married women's option, as it was called; I dealt with it when I was a junior manager in the engineering industry in the 1960s. It was a flat rate of one shilling. Everyone knew that the only thing that it covered was industrial injury. The women on the production line at Salter's in West Bromwich knew that—it was common knowledge. That was all they got for their shilling. Of course, their wages were so low that they could not have contemplated paying the full rate. More women were coming into the work force, but they were, predominantly, on low pay. That is why there were campaigns about equal pay and related issues at that time.

There was an informed choice. The hon. Gentleman may know of someone who claims that they did not sign a form. However, we still have tons and tons of paper records around. There was a form that had to be signed. I admit freely, having read it again this morning, that the form was not brilliantly clear, and I can guarantee that it would not pass the plain English test. Nevertheless, a signature was required before someone could opt out of the full rate of national insurance.

To that extent, it had to be an informed choice, and leaflet NI1 did explain the situation in relation to pensions. By the 1970s, many more women were working, which was the reason for the change in 1977. The option was withdrawn in the 1978-79 tax year because 3.6 million women had opted out of the full rate of national insurance contributions. That figure is now 175,000. We stopped that unfairness for the next generation, and that reduction over 20 years means that we are on the way to eliminating it. That may not solve the problems of the examples given by the hon. Gentleman this morning, but reducing the number of women who opt out means that more will collect a lifetime's national insurance contributions because, by and large, women are working longer and the difference in wage rates is closing.

I do not suggest that everything was hunky dory under the previous Labour Government, but things started to go wrong in 1989 when the structure of national insurance contributions changed and gave rise to an anomaly in which someone who opted out might end up paying more national insurance than someone who was paying the full rate. The change in 1989 was for the good reason that, unlike tax, a £1 rise in wages might result in a £3 rise in national insurance contributions. That was barmy and the then Chancellor, Lord Lawson, introduced the change to deal with that.

In August 1989, a mail shot to the women concerned advised them to examine their position before the structural changes were introduced. The Government wrote to those women in a form that would probably not pass the plain English test—that is a bold statement, but the wording of the document does not look like plain English to me. A warning bell was rung and a light flashed to warn women to take action, but not many seem to have done so. I do not know why.

Further changes have been introduced more recently so that many women on low earnings do not pay contributions, but will be credited to the level of the basic state pension. It is beneficial for married women on low earnings to revoke the reduced rate election if they have continued to work and have remained opted out since 1978. The Inland Revenue now administers national insurance assessment and collection and is planning a mail shot later in the year to target those women.

I have seen some of the hon. Gentleman's questions, most of which go to the Treasury, which deals with national insurance matters, but I may not have seen all of them. Any Government mail shot in 2000 should be checked for plain English and it should be clear and explicit about what to do if people have questions. The Government would fail if they sent out a mail shot that was not consumer friendly. We estimate that some 6,000 women will receive it.

When the Labour Government made the changes in 1977, we did not want married women to lose out later in life and, in a leaflet, we gave a full explanation of the changes. However, not everyone, particularly if they are working shifts, checks with the Benefits Agency. In those days, it was impossible to get through on the telephone and letters were not answered for weeks, even letters from Members of Parliament. The system for responding to the public has been vastly transformed, but in the 1970s and 1980s it was not a customer-friendly service.

The hon. Gentleman was unfair to say that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security was dismissive when the hon. Gentleman asked a question on the Floor of the House last Monday. My right hon. Friend said that the hon. Gentleman had asked the question before, but had not given sufficient information. I repeat that now. I require more information than the hon. Gentleman has provided when he has written to me in the past.

I have some correspondence in which I was given only the name of the lady in question. It contains no address, date of birth or national insurance details, yet I was asked to say that she should be eligible for an increase in her pension because she had worked in a Royal Ordnance factory during the war. I had to write back and ask for more information. If we have the basic information to enable us to check the files—date of birth, national insurance number, maiden name and so on—we will check every case submitted to us.

In cases in which someone has made a genuine inquiry—perhaps in the form of an early forecast requirement—and has been misdirected, there remains the option to buy back in. We must be careful that that would not constitute a one-way bet against the taxpayer. Every case would have to be individually assessed. However, I do not believe that there is any need for a large-scale inquiry. This is not like the issues surrounding SERPS.

However, if it appears after evidence has been submitted and we have checked our files that someone has been misdirected or misinformed by my Department, we will consider allowing her to buy back in the contributions that she has missed. In that way, she would be able to regularise her benefits. Successful applicants would be given the opportunity to pay arrears at the rate in force at the time that the payment was due. For some women on low incomes, that could even lead to a refund.

Mr. Webb: Would the Minister include in that category the people who, since 1989, could have saved money by going back into full-rate contributions?

Mr. Rooker: I am not sure about that. It would not be possible, once one had elected to come out, to swap over again. We are quite prepared to look at each case on its individual merits. We do not have any such cases before us at present, although from time to time, people make individual inquiries of the Department. The situation is not unique.

In 2002, we shall start to operate the pension forecast. It will be phased in over a number of years, and will mean that everyone who is working will receive a pension forecast every year. It will include information on their state pension and their occupational pension. Women and men in their 20s and 30s, among others, will receive a P60 and a pension forecast every year. They might respond by saying, "I thought it would be more than that. What can I do about it?" The time to ask such questions is earlier, rather than later when one cannot do anything about it.

I have heard from constituents who have discovered at the last minute that their pension entitlement was 24 per cent. If one's pension entitlement is less than 25 per cent., it will be zero. Unfortunately, some people find out about such things at the last minute, when it is too late to make up the shortfall. They will get zero. That is an aspect of the workings of the national insurance system that has been in place since it started. Nothing is being reinvented here.

However, I take on board the points raised by the hon. Gentleman and, if we have evidence of misinformation or misdirection in individual cases, we shall do our best to check the files and, if need be, regularise the situation. We are not asking people to turn the clock back, but we shall need evidence in these cases. I hope that, in 20 years, there will be no need for a Social Security Minister to stand up and answer this kind of question.

Mr. Webb: The Minister mentioned evidence. Obviously, it is very difficult to obtain evidence from 10 or 20 years ago. What sort of evidence does he have in mind? Does it have to be documents?

Mr. Rooker: I suspect that it will have to be. Unlike in the circumstances relating to SERPS, the burden of proof will not be on the Department. When the changes were made, mailshots were carried out. The publicity was adequate in the sense that leaflets were sent out by the Department and debates were held in the House. I realise that the media now tend to ignore the House but, in those days, they used to report the House more thoroughly, so there is less excuse for people being ignorant of this matter. However, we will look at every individual case that is put to us.

12 noon

Ms Jenny Jones (Wolverhampton, South-West): I begin by thanking Madam Speaker for allowing me this debate. When I made the request last week, the decision on Mike Tyson's application to enter the country had not been made. Since then, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has made his ruling. Regrettably, it is not the one that I would have liked. The issue is attracting a lot of public attention and it is therefore still relevant.

Last year, the Government published an important document, "Living without fear: an integrated approach to tackling violence against women". Its opening statement was that violence against women is a serious crime with serious consequences. The document stated that one in four women in the United Kingdom experience domestic violence at some time in their lives and that the number of reported rapes has nearly doubled in the past 10 years, a steeper rise than for any other crime. At the same time, the conviction rate for rape has dropped from 24 per cent. to 9 per cent. Seven out of 10 women aged between 16 and 29 fear rape. They fear rape and personal attack more than any other crime.

In my opinion, and that of many others, the document set out in an intelligent and coherent fashion how the Government would tackle violence against women. It was welcomed by all sectors of society. Many felt at last that we had a Government who would give the issue priority. The document was followed by a review of sex offences legislation. The newspapers anticipate a paper being published later this month by the working body reviewing sex offences. Changes to rape trials to try to increase the conviction rate have been trailed by the papers.

People's expectations of the Government have been raised. However, a high-profile convicted rapist has been allowed into the country for the sole purpose of commercial gain—not once, but twice—and under an immigration rule that I believed was designed to prevent people convicted of serious offences from entry. Mike Tyson is not only a convicted rapist. His violence towards women is well documented. I shall not mention every story that the national press has printed about him. One, however, does sum up his attitude towards women and the evident problem he has controlling his violence towards women. A national paper in America once asked him what was the greatest punch he had ever thrown. He joked that it was the punch he gave his ex-wife.

In allowing Mike Tyson into the country, the Home Secretary exercised the discretion given him by our immigration rules. What signals does that decision send out? I feel that it has weakened the Government's determination to deal with violence against women. The fact that Tyson has been let in mainly for economic benefit sends out the message that tackling violence against women may be less important than making as much money as quickly as possible. Is rape to be taken seriously, or is it only to be taken seriously provided it does not cost too much? What weight was given to the Government's policy on violence against women when the Home Secretary made his decision?

I turn to the Home Secretary's reasons for allowing Tyson entry, which were printed in the written answer to the House on 18 May. The Home Secretary said that Mr. Tyson's behaviour on his previous visit to the United Kingdom was satisfactory and asserted that > any risk to the public...would be minimised by...his high media profile, the presence of his trainers and other supporting entourage, and the limited duration of his visit.—[Official Report, 18 May 2000; Vol. 350, c. 210W.]

What happens if a member or members of that supporting entourage have committed or been convicted of worse offences than those committed by Mike Tyson? On 18 January, The Express published an article on Mike Tyson's first visit. It stated that one member of his team, Steve Fitch, had served a five-year term for manslaughter, which is a more serious offence than rape.

Will the Minister tell us what steps immigration officers will take to examine every member of Mike Tyson's entourage and to establish whether any of them have been convicted of a serious offence, as Steve Fitch was? If it is discovered that a member of the entourage has been convicted of such an offence, will that person be allowed into the country under the discretion that the Home Office has exercised under rule 103?

I am fairly certain that Mike Tyson would not set out to harm anybody on his first few visits to the United Kingdom. After all, he is trying to impress on people here that there is another side to his character. Last time, he turned up with a formidable public relations machine, which set out to give an impression of him that was slightly different from that which had previously prevailed. As he has twice been given permission to enter this country, it seems likely that he will able to travel here with impunity.

Having said yes twice, it is most unlikely that the Home Secretary will say no on a third or fourth occasion. The risk of the mask slipping on Mike Tyson's behaviour in Britain will increase with every visit that he makes. It is likely that he will at some time in the future start to demonstrate here the behaviour for which he is infamous in the United States. It will be interesting to see how the Home Office reacts when that happens.

As to satisfactory behaviour, it is true that Mike Tyson did not engage in any violence outside the ring when he was in Britain. He did, however, climb over the gates of the royal parks to go running. I am told that that was technically an offence but that the police chose to exercise discretion and did not arrest him. His offensive remarks about the women's groups and women parliamentarians—hon. Members who sit in the House—who criticised his entry into Britain were slightly more concerning.

I remind hon. Members that he described us as a bunch of frustrated women who wanted to be men, and he went on to express an opinion about the men to whom these women might be married. I am told that the phrase that he used is a colloquial obscenity, so I am loth to repeat it. If I did so, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am sure that you would tell me that I was using unparliamentary language. Mike Tyson did not attack anybody while he was here, but does the Minister agree that making derogatory and offensive remarks about women Members of Parliament is not the sort of behaviour that we expect of somebody who is a guest in this country?

[Ms Jenny Jones]

The final reason for allowing entry was that not permitting it would result in a loss of economic benefit to the United Kingdom and would not enhance the UK's standing as a venue for a major sporting event. It is interesting to consider where the economic benefits of the bouts lie. I asked the Library to research some figures in relation to the Manchester fight with Julius Francis. Mike Tyson made £4 million in a two-round fight that lasted four minutes and three seconds. That means that he earned £16,460 per second. His opponent, Julius Francis, received £350,000 for managing to stand on his feet for just more than four minutes. The boxing promoters made a lot of money and, as we know, the sole broadcasting rights went to Rupert Murdoch's Sky television, which broadcasted the event on a pay-to-view basis; I think that these matches can be watched at a cost of £13 a fight. There is certainly a lot of money to be made, but the extent to which it was distributed around Manchester and United Kingdom is questionable.

Sheffield Hallam university estimated that the predicted loss to the Manchester economy of £12 million had the fight not gone ahead was highly exaggerated. The faculty's researchers calculated that the losses would probably only have been about £1.5 million. No evidence was ever produced to show that any business would be bankrupted had the fight not gone ahead. That casts doubt on who gets the economic benefits.

With regard to the UK's standing as a venue for major sporting events, I must tell the Minister that there are mixed views in the boxing fraternity about the Tyson fights, especially the one held in January. It might be wondered why I know about boxing. I have never before expressed views on the sport, which in itself is not the subject of the debate. However, I have two close relatives who were champion amateur boxers in their youth, so I might know a bit more about the subject than some hon. Members have given me credit for.

The view held is that the previous Tyson fight was not of the gladiatorial standards that we used to see with the fights of Muhammad Ali. The same might be true of this fight. One amateur boxer told me at the weekend that such fights are not so much gladiatorial as like a sick circus. Many in the boxing fraternity consider the Tyson fights to be an exercise in making as much money as easily as possible for a few people. We must ask whether the UK really wants to get a reputation as a sporting venue for such events.

I want to consider the point that I raised during Prime Minster's questions last week. Like many hon. Members, I represent a multicultural constituency. A significant part of my caseload is helping constituents who are trying to get close relatives into the country for weddings, funerals or visiting sick relations. We are not always terribly successful at that. It can be difficult to explain to a constituent why a close family member cannot be brought into the country, especially for something such as a funeral. The situation can be distressing. After Mike Tyson was allowed into the country in January, I found myself being asked why, for example, constituents could not get their mother, who had never committed an offence, into the country, when Tyson—rich, famous and convicted of a serious offence—could enter.

Our immigration rules are complex, and different rules apply to people coming from America from those that apply to people coming from the Indian sub-continent. However, the public perception is that it does not matter what crime people commit if they are rich and famous because they can circumvent UK immigration rules. That is an unfortunate message to send out.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) wishes to make a short contribution. I am grateful to the Minister and to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for having kindly agreed to that. There is much public disquiet about the decision second time around. On the first occasion, many people who were unhappy with the decision might have gone along with it because many seats for the fight had already been booked and because we had been told that a lot of money was at stake.

Circumstances second time around are different. Many Members of Parliament are less than happy. When I checked last night, the number of signatories to early-day motion 741 on the matter was 81 and climbing. The total could reach more than 100 by the end of the week. I had never seen some colleagues as furious as they were last Thursday when the decision was made. There was real fury and anger at the decision having been made for a second time. Public opinion and the impressions of Back Benchers must be considered—that is why we are here.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Ms Jones) on gaining the debate and on her excellent work to further the issue. Her seeking the debate and her other activities demonstrate that the affair is not of interest to Scotland alone. Like others, I supported those protesting in England last January, and I warmly welcome the support shown by English colleagues and friends regarding Mike Tyson's coming to Scotland. The United Kingdom Government have retained responsibility for the matter, which is therefore a UK issue. Equally, however, I welcome the many voices in the Scottish Parliament that have stuck to the real issue, which is about violence against women. We must not lose sight of that. Before I deal with that problem, I want to raise a matter that arose from the process by which the Home Secretary's decision was made.

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, Central): My hon. Friend mentioned the Scottish dimension, which is important. Will she comment on the cynical attempts of the Scottish National party to exploit the issue, in particular its attempt to undermine the devolution settlement that, just two years ago, it fought side by side with other political parties in Scotland to achieve?

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Order. I would be grateful if the hon. Lady would confine her remarks to the subject of the debate.

Mrs. Fyfe: Thank you, Mr. Gale. My hon. Friend made his point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Baillieston (Mr. Wray) met the Home Secretary on 3 May. On 12 May, triumphant quotations in the Scottish press from the organisers of the bout said that Mike Tyson's visa was waiting for him. I immediately sought a meeting with the Home Secretary. On 17 May, my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West and I met the Minister of State with responsibility for immigration and asylum. At 4.30 pm, we were told that no decision had been made and that Ministers had not seen the paperwork. However, in a written response to a parliamentary question tabled that day for answer the following day, it was clear that the decision had been made sooner than we thought. At what time on Wednesday was the parliamentary question planted? What consultations did the Home Secretary have between 3 and 17 May? What was the hurry to reach a decision on 17 May in light of the emerging protest in the Scottish Parliament and in Westminster, on which he was fully informed? The decision is inexplicable. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West on that matter.

The reasons for granting the visa that were given on 18 May were greeted with incredulity and derision in Glasgow. We were told in January that the visa was granted because of exceptional circumstances—tickets had been sold and businesses would go bankrupt if the event was cancelled. Exceptional circumstances means not routine, but because the first visit created a precedent, it appears that Tyson must be allowed entry on the second application and, presumably, again and again. Did the Home Secretary realise in January that a legal precedent would be set for a second application? If so, why did he not tell us? The House of Commons and Labour Members of Parliament played fair with the Home Secretary in January. We thought that we understood the position; evidently, we did not.

The Home Secretary said yesterday that he was worried about public order on the streets and was satisfied that there was no danger of that being a problem. That is an outdated attitude. What about private disorder? What about beatings, batteries and rapes behind closed doors? What about the women who hope that their man's team wins on Saturday because they will be battered if it does not? What message does the feting and lionising of this man, whose has a string of violent actions against women and men, send to young men who are growing up? Plenty of other famous boxers must be more credible role models. It has been denied that Mike Tyson committed the crime of rape against Deirdre Washington but, as my hon. Friend said, there is a string of other violent incidents in his adult life, which is too long for me to recount. Were those all based on false allegations?

I am sorry that many women and men will be saddened and sickened by the decision. People are already saying that money talks. The only way to convince them otherwise is to introduce fair legislation that lets people without wealth and influence get into the country for family funerals and weddings and to visit the sick. The current message is that that is a lot less important than a boxing match.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mrs. Barbara Roche): I am grateful for the opportunity to debate this issue. I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Ms Jones) for securing the debate. She and my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) set out a strong and resolute case. I do not expect them to agree with what I am about to say, but I want to explain the circumstances that led to the debate.

I completely understand the strong feelings that have been expressed in the House, in Scotland and in the United Kingdom generally, which is why I welcome the opportunity to discuss the matter.

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): Would the Minister care to say what consideration she gave to the representations made by the representative of the Scottish Parliament, the Deputy First Minister, who I believe contacted her on the matter? Will she say how those representations were considered by the Department, and whether that could have influenced the Home Secretary's decision?

Mrs. Roche: If the hon. Gentleman is patient, I shall deal with that aspect.

My hon. Friends have set out clearly their arguments against agreeing to Mike Tyson's wish to enter to the United Kingdom. In dealing with the application for entry clearance, it was necessary for us to weigh all the relevant arguments for and against his admission. In his statement to the House, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary explained the basis on which we reached the decision to allow him entry. We did not reach that decision lightly, but did so after a careful assessment based on the history of the application and the need for fairness and consistency.

We were strongly aware of the objections that were raised to Mike Tyson's being admitted when he last visited the UK, in January, and of the immediate reaction to the news of his intended return. It is understandable that concerns should be expressed about his well-publicised criminal record. I have strong sympathy with those concerns. As I said last week, like all right-minded people, I consider the offences of which Mike Tyson has been convicted to be deplorable.

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North): Does my hon. Friend recognise the concerns about the criminal records of some of Mike Tyson's entourage, and of others associated with the event?

Mrs. Roche: That point was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West. Anyone who seeks to enter the United Kingdom will be considered under the immigration rules.

It was necessary for us to base our entry clearance decision not on Mike Tyson's previous convictions alone but on a careful assessment of the relevant circumstances in accordance with the immigration rules. The primary purpose of the immigration rule that allows entry to be refused to those with criminal convictions is to protect the public from the risk of serious crime. In this case, we were bound to take account of the fact that Tyson's behaviour during his previous visit in January was satisfactory. As on that occasion, he will be subject to close media attention throughout his visit and surrounded by his supporting team. As a result, the opportunity to reoffend will be minimal. It was therefore decided to grant entry clearance for a brief period that will be focused entirely on the fight.

[Mrs. Roche]

Mike Tyson's case has been dealt with on the basis of its exceptional circumstances. Given that there would be no significant risk to the public in allowing him to enter, the benefits of allowing the fight to proceed appear to outweigh the arguments for preventing it.

Consultation was raised. We consulted the Administration in Scotland and took account of their views in reaching a decision. I spoke to Jim Wallace, the acting First Minister, before the decision was taken.

Mrs. Fyfe: Did that discussion with Jim Wallace take place because he telephoned the Minister of State, or did she get in touch with him first?

Mrs. Roche: I am trying to remember; I think that I telephoned him. Certainly, we knew that he was anxious to talk to us, but we placed the call because I wanted the Administration's view, particularly about the implications for public safety. My recollection is that I placed the call to Jim Wallace on the Thursday.

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Order. I appreciate that the hon. and learned Gentleman is a Member of the Scottish Parliament, where personal names are used, but we are still in the House of Commons, where we refer to Members by constituency. The acting First Minister is the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland.

Mrs. Roche: That is certainly correct, Mr. Gale, although I cannot promise to remember his constituency precisely. I think that I have been affected by the refreshing informality of the new Parliament, something that I warmly welcome.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): On the matter of precision, will the Minister tell us the exact date and time of her conversation with the acting First Minister?

Mrs. Roche: Yes, I can be precise. It was on the Thursday—[Interruption.] I spoke to him twice. The first occasion was on the Wednesday, from my office in the Home Office. On the Thursday, I was on a visit and I spoke to the hon. and learned Gentleman that morning after he had obtained some information from me.

Mr. Connarty: I am looking for the date, not the day. There are many Wednesdays in the month.

Mrs. Roche: Last Wednesday was the first time I spoke to him and I did so again on the Thursday morning.

Mr. Connarty: When exactly did the Home Secretary take the decision?

Mrs. Roche: If my hon. Friend can contain his impatience, seeing that I have about three minutes left, I shall deal with that point, which was raised earlier.

I saw my hon. Friends the Members for Wolverhampton, South-West and for Maryhill on the Wednesday afternoon. I told them that a decision was imminent and that neither the Home Secretary nor I had seen the papers. Those came up in the early evening and a decision was taken. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary personally advised the acting First Minister and the Secretary of State for Scotland of his decision.

I emphasise that Mike Tyson's entry clearance is strictly for the purpose of the proposed fight and for a single entry only. He will come here to prepare for that fight and leave once it is over. We have made it clear to him that there is no automatic presumption that he will be allowed entry again. If he wants to return, any application will be considered on its merits at the time. As we said, we are considering the rule again. My right hon. Friend published a consultation paper on the subject.

Our decision to admit Mike Tyson had no bearing on the abhorrence with which we regard violence against women. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West was kind enough to point out activities undertaken by the Government, and our commitment to combating violence against women remains resolute. She also raised the important question of family visits, and will know that the Government—

Mr. Gale (in the Chair): Order.

Electoral Malpractice

12.30 pm

Mr. William Thompson (West Tyrone): I am privileged to have the opportunity to debate electoral malpractice in Northern Ireland.

When voting recently in the London mayoral election, I visited a mainland polling station for the first time. Only one man was standing outside; no Labour, Liberal Democrat or other party representative was present. The man was wearing a blue rosette, which I assume showed his membership of the Conservative party, and he spoke nicely to everyone who arrived. On my entering the polling station, there was no sign of the polling agents, as we call them, who mark off voters as they arrive. I was asked simply for my name and number—no one tried to check my identity beyond that. The atmosphere was calm and quiet, and I said to myself, "How different elections on the mainland are from those in Northern Ireland."

In Northern Ireland, every vote counts, so parties must work extremely hard to ensure maximum turnout, and there is always the temptation to indulge in electoral malpractice. Indeed, after the 1997 local government elections and general election, the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee issued a report that accepted the existence of electoral malpractice in Northern Ireland and the need to do something about it. The Government also established a committee to consider the matter, which published a report on administering elections in Northern Ireland. It, too, acknowledged the existence of, and need to address, such malpractice.

Both committees recommended an enhanced household form, a postal vote and proxy vote application forms. Significantly, they established that electoral smart cards using signature verification are the most effective way to prevent fraud and malpractice in Northern Ireland.

The latter report was published in October 1998. In replying to the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee's report, the Secretary of State said:

> Although it has not been possible for me to give any firm commitment to the introduction of select proposals at this time, this should not in any way indicate that I do not take the issue of electoral malpractice in Northern Ireland seriously.

He went on to say:

> The Elections Review will be submitting its final report in the summer of 1998, and I am intending to publish its findings at the earliest possible opportunity. However, as you acknowledged in your report, it is unlikely that any substantial changes will take place before the elections to the European Parliament in 1999.

Those elections have long since passed, and we in Northern Ireland want to know what has happened to the report and what progress is being made. There is a general feeling that the Government are dragging their feet. In a letter dated 15 May to my right hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble), the Prime Minister stated:

> We will bring forward early legislation on electoral fraud. I would hope to find parliamentary time for this before the general election.

I welcome that.

In Northern Ireland, local government elections are held every four years. The next elections are due to take place in May 2001, and it is possible that there will be a Westminster election at the same time. Under Northern Ireland's system of proportional representation, which nowadays is not much liked on the mainland, it is possible for results to be very close—in fact, close in decimal figures. Any malpractice or fraud is therefore liable to have extremely serious consequences, in that it may lead to a result that is not true to the views of the electorate.

The problem must be dealt with before the local government elections—and, potentially, the Westminster election—in May 2001. The history of Westminster elections in Northern Ireland reveals that some constituencies are very closely contested, especially those in the west of the Province. That often results in an extremely high number of postal votes. In the 1997 Westminster election, the total number of absent vote applications was 38,885, which would be unheard of over here on the mainland. In my constituency, the figure was 4,372. Postal vote applications rose by 38 per cent. in Mid-Ulster, 37 per cent. in Belfast, North, 43 per cent. in Belfast, East and 45.84 per cent. in Belfast, West. It is believed that up to 10 per cent. of postal vote and proxy vote applications are fraudulent. It is vital to try to ensure that such malpractice does not happen, because malpractice may seriously affect election results, especially in closely fought constituencies.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): The hon. Gentleman may recollect from the report of the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee that the chief returning officer told the Committee that he had received four applications for postal votes from people who had died. Information about deaths from the Registrar of Births, Deaths and Marriages in Northern Ireland is passed to the chief returning officer, but he could not legally refrain from issuing the papers for postal votes.

Mr. Thompson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention.

The presiding officer, electoral officer or deputy electoral officer may not be notified of a death that occurred, and he could not refuse a ballot paper even if it was known on election day that the person had died before the election. That shows the necessity for a legal change.

The recommendation for an electoral smart card utilising signature verification is an expensive solution and could not be introduced for some time. It is unlikely to be available for the elections next year, so I shall suggest some changes that could be made immediately to reduce malpractice next year.

At the beginning of October, every household in Northern Ireland receives a form on which to state the number of electors in that household. Those forms are not satisfactory because some people include all their family, although some members of that may not be resident in the household. Objections can be made to a court, but it is almost impossible to prove that someone is not resident if the household form states that he is. Names remain on the register when they should not be there, with the result that the register is not as accurate as it should be. I suggest that changes should be made to the form this year and there should be time to do that. The form should ask for the date of birth and national insurance number of each elector, the elector's mother's maiden name and the number of rooms in the dwelling. There should also be a little box in which each elector states whether he possesses a driver's licence. The majority of electors in Northern Ireland hold a driver's licence with a photograph and they could be required to use that as identification at the polling station.

The application forms for postal votes and proxy votes at next year's elections should reflect the changes on the household form. They should ask similar questions so that, when the form is returned to the electoral office, a check can be made on whether it accurately reflects the records held in the electoral office. That would help to prevent people from submitting proxy vote or postal vote application forms for those who are unlikely to vote.

I also recommend that the marked register be done away with. Surprisingly, it is possible to buy in Northern Ireland a set of registers naming all the people who voted at the last election. One can normally do that, but such registers are not cheap. Although normal political parties do not have the money to pay for marked registers, Sinn Fein seems not to be short of money and can readily avail itself of them.

When one accumulates a number of registers over time, it becomes clear that those people who never bother to vote and have never visited a polling station can be identified. As a result, false proxy votes can be cast or false postal vote applications made on their behalf. A large number of applications arrive on the chief electoral officer's desk a few days before an election, and it is virtually impossible for him to sift through 38,000 votes to establish which applications are legitimate and which should not be upheld. If the marked register were done away with, it would be harder for someone to discover the identity of a person who had never voted. It would then be difficult to vote in that person's stead through proxy voting or postal voting or through voting at a polling station by pretending to be someone else.

Changes should be made at the polling station itself. The presiding officer should be empowered to refuse a ballot paper if he, his staff or a polling agent have reason to suspect malpractice of any kind. As I understand it, a ballot paper cannot be refused unless a polling agent objects. A polling agent sits in a booth and must be sure of his facts before making such an objection. He does not see the identification documents, and it is difficult for him to object, so it is the presiding officer who should be so empowered. If, according to his judgment and good offices, he suspects malpractice, and if his staff or a polling agent objects to a vote, he should be empowered to intervene and suggest that the police make an arrest.

The polling station electoral register should state whether a voter holds a driving licence, so that it could be used for identification purposes. The register should also show a voter's date of birth and mother's maiden name, so that relevant questions could be asked where an application for a ballot paper was suspect. A ballot paper would then be provided only when satisfactory answers were given.

Throughout the United Kingdom, the police seem to have forgotten that their duty is to prevent, as well as solve, crime. Voting twice, or voting in an election in which one should not vote, is a criminal offence, so it is the duty of the police to make an arrest if they suspect that a criminal offence has taken place or is likely to take place. In Northern Ireland at the moment, the police say that it is nothing to do with them and that they cannot intervene. That is contrary to the rules that govern the conduct of police constables. The police should act if they think that a crime is about to take place.

We should consider the possibility of giving each elector a personal identification number. Such numbers are in common use with Visa cards and smart cards. Electors would receive a PIN, which they would bring to the polling station. There, they would have to state their number, which could be checked against the electoral register. There are difficulties with such a system: PINs might not be delivered or people might say that they had not received a number. None the less, such possibilities should be considered.

Local government elections will take place in Northern Ireland in 2001 and are likely to be followed by a general election. Malpractice must be reduced to the lowest possible level, and the Government have a duty to act expeditiously to see that that happens before the next election.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. George Howarth): I congratulate the hon. Member for West Tyrone (Mr. Thompson) on his choice of subject. It is an important subject, as was illustrated by what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland said during his recent appearance before the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee. We are in regular contact with the chief electoral officer, Mr. Pat Bradley, who is widely respected throughout Northern Ireland. I have every confidence in him. He is about to retire, but the process of appointing his successor is under way.

We share some of the hon. Gentleman's concerns, but I do not think that it is fair to say—normally, he is a fair man—that we are dragging our feet on the issue. The hon. Gentleman put forward ideas that he would like us to consider. I do not intend to go through each in sequence—for one thing, there is not enough time—but I will carefully consider his points. We are committed to having a Bill on the subject, but the question is whether there is sufficient time; I shall return to that. The Bill may cover some of the points raised by the hon. Gentleman. However, I give a warning: although we agree that it is important that electoral procedures should be robust enough to prevent them from being abused too easily, we do not want to make access to the vote so difficult that it puts legitimate voters off. That is a difficult balance to strike, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman will agree, but we must strike it, none the less.

Both the report by the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee, which has been mentioned, and the Northern Ireland Office report "Administering Elections in Northern Ireland" noted that there have long been concerns about electoral malpractice in Northern Ireland. However, the Northern Ireland Office review concluded that > elections in Northern Ireland are efficiently and fairly administered, often in very difficult circumstances.

What I am unable to do—the hon. Gentleman had a stab at it—is quantify the problem. There are very few arrests for electoral malpractice, but not, frankly, because the police do not take the matter seriously. I entirely accept that that is not a sign that all is well or that there is no need for change—far from it. Electoral abuse is difficult to prove, not least because many people who appear to have had their votes stolen may be afraid to speak out or to give evidence, or they may not know that their vote has been stolen.

Whatever the difficulties of attaining evidence, it is important to ensure that we act in a way that is proportionate to the problem. Electoral abuse is an affront to democracy, but we do not want to introduce measures that would deny innocent people their vote or make them feel that the system was so oppressive or off-putting that they would not go to a polling station, bother to apply for an absent vote or register in the first place.

The fact that the Government have recognised the difficult circumstances in Northern Ireland means that the measures that had been introduced in pilot schemes elsewhere in the United Kingdom—they are designed to facilitate and encourage absent voting, and may use more flexible voting times—will not be extended to Northern Ireland. We recognise that moves that are intended to encourage and assist voters in Great Britain may serve only to aid those who are intent on electoral abuse in Northern Ireland.

It is important that we have extended the legislative provisions on rolling registration to Northern Ireland—it means that people can put their name on the register throughout the year rather than during a narrow time frame. That should ensure that the register is more accurate.

We hope to introduce early legislation on electoral fraud. Many of the measures that we want to introduce, including those that were recommended by the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee and in our review, will require legislation through a Bill. The hon. Member for West Tyrone referred to the letter that passed between my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble), who is the leader of the hon. Gentleman's party. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman accepts that we hope to find parliamentary time for such a Bill before the next general election. However, no Minister would give a firm commitment about the contents of Her Majesty's Loyal Address before it was delivered.

Mr. Thompson: Could not the Government introduce such measures through an Order in Council?

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman spends much time urging me not to use Orders in Council, and I am sure that he will forgive me if I do not readily accede to his request on this occasion.

I want to discuss some of the recommendations of the Select Committee and of our report. Electoral cards remain, as the hon. Gentleman conceded, our long-term objective but, frankly, current technology is unlikely to provide a satisfactory system at a reasonable cost. In the meantime—before the eventual introduction of electoral smart cards—we hope to develop measures that will help to combat electoral abuse.

Signature verification, as the hon. Gentleman conceded, would be an important means of providing authentication of absent vote applications and it could possibly be used to provide additional identification at polling stations. The necessary process is under consideration and the approach is technically possible. I shall not discuss that in detail because time is short. We are also considering the investigatory powers of the chief electoral officer. We should have detailed consultations in that regard.

There are various steps to be taken, and there is the prospect of introducing legislation before the next general election. We take the matter seriously and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising it in this debate.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to One o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 24 May 2000

[MR. MICHAEL LORD in the Chair]

Public Employees (London Weighting)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Betts.]

9.30 am

Mr. Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington): I am pleased to have secured this important debate. I wish that more London Members were present; perhaps they will arrive shortly. The debate will interest anyone who is concerned about the continually falling number of police officers in the Metropolitan police, the recruitment crisis in the national health service and the recruitment and retention of teachers. Those are, of course, national issues, but the problems in London are much more acute, because of the cost of living there.

One difficulty affecting our consideration of the problem is that, although many of us are aware of the issues facing public sector workers in London, much of our evidence is anecdotal, being drawn from friends, family and constituents who contact us through our constituency offices or surgeries. Without a cost of living index for London, the scale of the problem is unknown.

In 1974, the Labour Government's pay board introduced a London weighting index, which was published regularly until the Conservatives abolished it in 1982. Since then, no official measure of the cost of living and working in London has been collected or published. An unofficial London weighting index has been published privately, but although the pay board recommended that the formula should be revised every five years, that revision has never taken place. There has been no adjustment to take into account greater travel-to-work distances and the changes to relative house prices. The retail prices index is adjusted every year to reflect changes in products and consumer tastes, but the weighting index presupposes that we live in the London of 30 years ago. As a result, according to Bargaining Report:

> it seriously underestimates the extra costs it is supposed to measure.

The unofficial London weighting index, produced by the London research department, shows that, from an index of 100 in 1974, London's cost of living had risen by last year to 768.1 in inner London and 515.7 in outer London. The value of the index is more than £3,000 for inner London and more than £1,000 for an area such as Carshalton and Wallington, where I live. Despite that, the London allowance received by nurses, teachers and police officers is well below those levels.

Recruitment to public services has suffered all over the country and has been widely reported in the past few years. Nowhere has it suffered more than in London. In its recruitment report issued in October last year, the Metropolitan police reported that it faced > an increasingly difficult job market, in which the Service is not a first choice career for many and one in which the pay and conditions offered are not competitive with those of other employers.

That description could equally be applied to the teaching and nursing professions. Recruitment has deteriorated in London in recent years because of lower unemployment, faster growth, greater earnings growth and longer travel-to-work times than those in the rest of the United Kingdom. In particular, rising house prices in London have made a bad situation worse. According to Tony Travers of the London School of Economics, the result has been > both long distance commuting and London employees who are of a lower quality than they would be elsewhere, in both the public and private sector...No teacher in their right mind would stay in London when property costs 80 per cent. more than in Gloucester or Carlisle.

The most recent figures on house prices—the Halifax housing prices index—support that view. House prices in London are now 76 per cent. above the UK average. That is the biggest differential since the Halifax index began in 1983. London is now the only region in the United Kingdom where prices are currently above their 15-year average in relation to earnings. In Greater London, the Halifax housing prices index records a 54.5 per cent. increase in house prices since 1990, whereas the increase in South Yorkshire is 5.71 per cent. A recent glance at the Homes Online website revealed that the cheapest one-bedroomed flat in east London costs £55,000 and that the cheapest one-bedroomed flat in south London costs £80,000, whereas a small three-bedroomed, terraced house in South Yorkshire costs between £25,000 and £35,000.

Such factors are taking their toll. Recruitment to the teaching profession is worse in London than elsewhere in the country, although, unfortunately, the lack of reliable statistics means that it is difficult to judge precisely how bad the situation is. Staff shortages are often bridged by the use of agency staff. The only statistics on the use of supply staff that are collected and published regularly by the Government are the occasional teacher figures: an occasional teacher is one who teaches in the same post for up to one month. Figures show that occasional staff are heavily concentrated in schools in London and the south-east. A teacher working for more than one month in post counts as a regular teacher, whether or not he or she is, in fact, a temporary supply teacher. I am sure that the Financial Secretary will correct me if I am wrong, but statistics are not published on the number and location of all supply staff, nor is there any independent means of assessing the whereabouts or the concentration of supply or overseas staff.

The school teacher review body has noted the lack of such data. It states:

> The DfEE vacancy figures do not include some posts that schools may have been forced to fill on a temporary basis and provide no indication of the quality of those appointed to vacant posts. Schools may have had to accept a candidate of poorer quality than they would have liked because, in words we often hear, "We must have a teacher in front of the class."

As a result of those concerns, the review body conducted its own survey last year and found that, nationally, one in 20 advertised teacher vacancies was not filled, but that in inner London, the figure was one in eight. Other figures also tell a sorry tale. In 1999, 39.5 per cent. of all teaching vacancies in English primary schools and 33.9 per cent. of all teaching vacancies in English secondary schools were in London. All that must be seen against the backdrop of teaching in London, which is certainly not easier than in other parts of the country and is often more challenging. Gareth Bevan, the head teacher at one school in my constituency, Carshalton high school for boys, was so worried about the situation that he considered buying a house locally to house the school's incoming young staff. However, the cost was too prohibitive for the school. Commenting on the current situation, Mr. Bevan said:

> In thirty years at this school, I can only remember one person who has come into a position of responsibility at the school from outside London. The outer London weighting of £1,524 is a paltry sum; it's nonsensical. Ten years ago, the LEA offered relocation packages. Now, I know of no school or local authority that could even contemplate relocation packages.

In their recent housing paper, the Government identified assistance that could be given to key workers. I hope that the Financial Secretary will put a little more flesh on the bones of that proposal today.

In recent months, the needs of the health service have had a higher profile than those of education; none the less, there is a similar tale to tell in the national health service. There are no longer any official figures giving the number of agency and overseas staff in different health trusts. While national vacancy rates are published regularly, local vacancy rates are not. However, approximately, one third of the 15,000 nursing vacancies in England are in London: a survey taken for the Evening Standard at the end of last year showed that there were nearly 5,000 vacancies. My local trust has had to look abroad for nursing staff and has told me, informally, that the vacancy rate could be up to 20 per cent.—although, on the record, it estimated the figure to be closer to 6 per cent. Clearly, there are local problems. The three-month vacancy rates obtained from the Library show that the vacancy rate in England for nursing and midwifery is 2.6 per cent.; in London, the rate is twice as high, at 5.1 per cent., and in my local health authority it is 4.9 per cent., close to the London average of 5.1 per cent.

I shall illustrate the difficulties that the NHS is experiencing in recruiting and retaining staff with an example of a hospital just across the river—St. Thomas's. St. Thomas's hospital relies heavily on biomedical scientists to carry out a range of screening tests. After five years of training and an honours degree, a graduate in that profession can expect to earn about £9,500 to £10,000; after qualification, he might earn a couple of thousand pounds more. Given those circumstances, it is hardly surprising that staff are leaving the profession. Yesterday, I spoke to Judy Copestake, a biomedical scientist with 40 years' experience as of yesterday. Until just a few days ago, she was a biomedical scientist grade 2; she had management responsibilities, but continued to supervise other biomedical scientists working on the bench in the laboratory. Her leaving salary was the princely sum of £22,000. She feels that her profession has been abandoned by the Government. She has been told by the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), that biomedical scientists cannot constitute a special case—but it would appear that nurses can. She has also been told that there is no chance of a pay increase until after "Agenda for Change" has been implemented. That means that, in all likelihood, there will be no change until 2002.

The same Health Minister said that 6,000 biomedical scientists have received a 7 per cent. pay increase. I should be grateful for confirmation in writing, from either that Minister or the Financial Secretary, of exactly how many of the 21,000 biomedical scientists have received that increase. Judy Copestake and her colleagues do not know of a single biomedical scientist, including colleagues at St. Thomas's hospital and others, who has received that 7 per cent. settlement. Their view is that, if the increase had been available to 6,000 biomedical scientists, they would know at least one person who had received it. They know of many who have received a 3 per cent. increase and a small number of trainees who have received a more substantial increase, but none who have received a 7 per cent. increase.

Perhaps the Government calculate that the impact on public services—in this case, the testing of medical samples—will be minimal. However, unfortunately it is not. I have a press release that speaks of an accident and emergency service; it is not in London, but if Llandudno is experiencing problems, I am sure that the problems in London are just as acute. Apparently, Llandudno hospital has been forced to close its accident and emergency service at 4 pm each day, owing to insufficient biomedical scientists to carry out important laboratory tests on patients. That is obviously a source of concern, for if those circumstances were to be replicated in London, I am sure that my constituents would contact me in large numbers.

The problems are no different in relation to the Metropolitan police. We know that finding new recruits is hard work and that the Macpherson report, rightly, put further pressure on the Met to recruit more ethnic minority police officers. Higher academic and health standards now apply to entry to the force. Police numbers are continuing to fall due to a combination of recruitment and retention problems. I ask Conservative Members, who talk vociferously about the need to recruit more police officers, to consider the effect on recruitment and retention of the Conservative Government's decision to stop the police housing allowance. The Financial Times recently reported that pay talks between the Home Office and police representatives, which are regarded as a critical component of the Government's pledge to boost recruitment by the next general election, have broken down. There are clear signs of an impending crisis in the police service as well.

I have focused on the problems of three key groups of public sector worker—teachers, nurses and police officers—but they are not the only public sector workers in London who experience difficulties. If the Government cannot recruit and retain key public sector workers in our capital city, it is clear that they cannot hope to achieve the improvements in public services that, during the general election, they promised to Londoners and others.

I hope that the Minister will agree that the first thing that must be done is to assess accurately the scale of the problem. The London Research Centre, now under the control of the Greater London Authority, should be given the task of compiling a new index to measure the cost of working and living in London. Such an index should be published annually and presented to the teaching and nursing pay review bodies, the police negotiating board and other relevant Government Departments and public sector bodies. New research into all aspects of recruitment and retention of public sector staff in London is needed urgently: we need estimates of the number and net cost of supply and agency staff in schools and hospitals, and accurate figures on the cost of failing to retain trained staff and of recruitment to the Metropolitan police. That key research that is not available at the moment.

Does the Minister agree that it is time for an annual report to be produced on the state of public services in London, and that its contents should be debated by the House of Commons? If that were done, today's Adjournment debate could be the first of many.

9.46 am

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Brake) on securing this important debate. I am not a London Member of Parliament, but I want to contribute because events in London have a ripple effect on the home counties, and in my county, Essex, that effect is significant.

I shall concentrate on the subject of police officers. As the hon. Gentleman said, there is a significant problem regarding recruitment and retention of police officers in the Met. I do not think that he would disagree if I said that figures show that the Metropolitan police is 1,000 officers understaffed. That is a considerable problem. When talking to the Essex police last week, I discovered that, if a Member of Parliament tables a question to the Home Secretary asking, for example, how many officers the Metropolitan police had on 31 March 2000, the answer given is not the number of officers employed by the Met on that day, but the number for which it has been funded. Those are very different figures. The answer to the same question about the Essex force would be 60 officers more than the real number.

Police officers in the Met receive a London allowance of approximately £3,000, because London is clearly far more expensive to live in than Somerset, the west country or parts of the north of England, especially in terms of housing costs. I understand that the Home Secretary proposes to increase that allowance to £6,000, and that the Police Federation believes that even that figure is too low and should be slightly higher. As the Home Secretary told the hon. Member for Watford (Ms Ward) at Home Office questions on Monday, the figure is currently at arbitration. We shall have to await the results of that process.

So that my comments cannot be misinterpreted, I should say that I do not question the need to acknowledge and make provision for problems specific to London, which is infinitely more expensive to live in than other parts of the country; nor do I question that those problems have had an impact on recruitment in public services. I am not saying that the London allowance should be cut out entirely. However, unless other measures are taken, a London allowance is itself a problem that has a significant impact on counties that adjoin London, such as Essex.

I shall use the example of the police to make my point. With a London allowance, a police officer working in London earns approximately £3,000 more than a police officer working across the boundary in Essex. The allowance does not significantly affect the employment of police officers in Essex, as, depending on where those officers live, the commuting costs of getting to London diminish the attractiveness of that £3,000. However, if the London allowance increases to £6,000 as the Home Secretary wants—or if it is increased further as a result of arbitration—the impact will become significant. Many people in Essex who want a career in the police service will find it more financially beneficial to get a job in the Metropolitan police, where their income will be £6,000 more, than in the Essex constabulary.

There is a double whammy. Many police officers who currently serve in the Essex constabulary—especially those living in Epping, Loughton or elsewhere in the south of the county, who would have to travel only a few miles into London—on suddenly discovering that their colleagues in the Met are being paid an additional £6,000 will resign from the Essex police and seek a job in the Metropolitan police, which is crying out for new recruits. Therefore, any distortion of pay structures in the Metropolitan police has serious implications for the recruitment and retention of police officers in Essex.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton): The hon. Gentleman is worried that a higher London weighting for police officers would have that effect, but how would he solve the problem of the severe shortage of police officers in London, if not through the index approach?

Mr. Burns: I specifically said at the beginning of my remarks that I was not going to suggest the removal of the London allowance. If the hon. Gentleman will wait, I shall answer his question.

The problem is not exclusive to Essex. It affects all of the home counties surrounding London, as the hon. Member for Watford said when she questioned the Home Secretary. The Home Secretary acknowledged that three chief constables in the home counties had already been in touch with the Home Office because of the significant and adverse impact that a large increase in the allowance would have on home counties police establishments.

The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) asks how the problem could be solved without increasing or exacerbating recruitment problems in London. The answer is that serious consideration should be given to creating a home counties indexation. Although the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington rightly drew attention to the significant increases in housing costs in the capital, those costs do not drop away at the borders of the Greater London area. Housing in the home counties is also expensive compared with other parts of the country. In my constituency, house prices are relatively high and they have increased significantly during the past two years or so, with the result that, even in an area such as Chelmsford, people have found it difficult to buy or even rent private housing on the sort of salaries that they command if they work in Essex, rather than commute down to the City of London or the west end to work. There is a haemorrhage of the work force from Essex to London, of which one example is that of people who want to work for the Metropolitan police force, not for the Essex constabulary.

[Mr. Burns]

The problems caused by London's magnetism could be minimised by creating an outer-band allowance or a home counties allowance. We should not try to solve London's problems merely by enhancing the financial benefits for those who work there, because that simply shifts the problem away from the capital to the band of counties that surround it. Those counties have a diminishing standard of public services because they cannot recruit people—at least, not of the standard that they want—and they cannot retain those whom they have recruited.

I appreciate that the Financial Secretary is a London Member of Parliament, but his constituency is on the outer boundaries of the London area, so he will be familiar with what is happening in areas such as Essex, which adjoin his own local authority area. Will he consider the matter, draw it to the attention of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and ensure that the Government give it urgent consideration? If we wait and argue for too long and set up committees or working parties to find solutions, damage will continue to be done as those committees drag on and politicians and others talk. The matter is one of urgency and grave concern, and it needs to be seriously and swiftly addressed.

9.57 am

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Brake) on obtaining this debate. Liberal Democrat Members have sought such a debate for some time, because we believe that the issue is one of the most important that affects public services in our London constituencies. We want to make it clear to the Financial Secretary that, like the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), we believe that this urgent problem requires instant Government attention.

My hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington put well the argument that we need more information about the problem. One of the concerns expressed by the hon. Member for West Chelmsford was that we do not know about the effects of measures outside London, as well as inside the capital city. If we had better information about relative staff shortages in various public sector professions, not only in London, but outside it and in its environs, we could sensibly judge correct relative weightings. However, we do not have that information.

Mr. Burns: The hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington are right to make the point about the lack of information. However, we have information about the scale of the problem for police forces: we know the funded numbers for each constabulary, and if individual constabularies keep records, as they often do, they can tell us how many officers are actually serving at a given time.

Mr. Davey: I am grateful for that intervention. We know some of the funded numbers, but it takes time to discover the actual numbers serving. As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, the figures can be obtained, but they are not easily got. When conducting research for today's debate, I found that information is not available about many professions in the public sector. Many statistics held by Departments are inaccurate, being based on funding and expectations rather than on what is happening. In addition, with such high staff turnover in hospitals, police stations and schools, figures change quickly.

I shall highlight the significant turnover problem affecting London schools. My hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington referred to vacancy rates, which provide an important indicator of the supply of employees not meeting the demand. High turnover is another such indicator—on that, in many ways, shows the damage done to the quality of service that our constituents receive. However, turnover figures are not readily available. My hon. Friend mentioned anecdotal figures and surveys such as those carried out by institutions such as the Royal College of Nursing.

When trying to build a picture from anecdotal evidence, I found that there are large potential costs for the taxpayer arising from the problems that we are discussing, because of the extra costs of more frequent recruitment and of management in integrating new employees into the work force, whether on a hospital ward, in a police division or in a classroom. Extra costs also result from having to pay premium rates for short-term placements, such as supply teachers, bank or agency nurses. Therefore costs are incurred not only as a result of recruitment, but by plugging the gaps and putting a finger in the dyke. If we estimate those costs just for the health service, we come up with a figure that easily exceeds £100 million. We could radically improve the situation by redirecting the money that is currently spent on short-term solutions; rather than spend excessive sums treating the symptoms, we should deal with the causes of the problem and put the money into decent salaries for public sector employees. That is the solution, but how quickly will the Government reach it?

The vacancy rate in Kingston hospital in my constituency is more than the average for England, but it probably slightly less than the London average; nevertheless, turnover is high. Management tried their best to deal with the problem, but ended up going to Manila in the Philippines, where they recruited nearly 100 nurses to work in the hospital on two-year contracts. We welcome those Philippine nurses; they are exceedingly talented and have undergone a rigorous recruitment programme. However, it is ludicrous that we went to a relatively poor country on the other side of the world to recruit huge numbers of staff to work in Kingston hospital—I cannot believe that that makes economic or social sense. Two-year contracts mean that the turnover problem will be dealt with for a short time, but the overall long-term sustainable capacity of the London health service is not enhanced by having to resort to such measures.

In my constituency, I meet former nurses who had worked in the health service for many years and for whose training the taxpayer paid. They left the NHS because in the private sector, in retail and in office jobs, they receive higher salaries and enjoy more flexible working conditions, which can help them to meet family commitments, for example. The NHS competes in that market, and I do not believe that recruiting on the other side of the world can provide a solution. We should encourage those whom the taxpayer trained to return to the health service and work in their local hospitals. In my example, it would not be a case of poaching nurses from West Chelmsford; we must encourage people to work in public services provided to the communities in which they live.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): My hon. Friend eloquently describes a problem that many suburban hospitals have in common. West Middlesex university hospital faces an almost identical situation. Does he agree that the problem is, in part, caused by a chronic shortage of nurses' accommodation? Perhaps the Government could provide on-site facilities. A related problem is the difference between inner and outer London weighting, which does not reflect the current realities of the labour and housing markets.

Mr. Davey: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention, partly because he has anticipated two of my points. Clearly, we think alike.

Reserved housing for nurses, police and teachers is a potential solution, but only a partial one; people in those professions do not want to receive their salary only or mainly in the form of housing because of the inflexibility of such an arrangement. However, such provision could be useful, especially for new entrants. Cuts in funding for public services have meant that much of the accommodation that was once used has been sold to supply a short-term solution to a funding gap elsewhere in public services in health and education. Many local education authorities used to have houses for teachers, and my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington mentioned that a head teacher in his constituency considered bringing back such provision.

The Government should examine reserved housing as a solution and consider reforming outer London weighting. The chief executive of Kingston hospital told me about the problem that that has caused in his hospital. When Queen Mary's university hospital in Roehampton closed, many of its staff moved to Kingston hospital to allow it to take on those patients who had formerly gone to Queen Mary's. However, the London weighting received by staff at Queen Mary's was higher than that received by staff at Kingston hospital, just down the road. A difficult agreement had to be reached to enable staff to work side by side with different London weightings, and the situation will have to be sorted out later. As my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) implied, the differences between inner and outer London weighting do not reflect financial realities. It can be more expensive to live in Surbiton or in Kingston than it is to live in parts of Roehampton and Putney. The old system no longer works.

In many respects, I do not blame the current Government for the difficulties. They inherited a huge political problem. As my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington said, the Conservative Government's abolition in 1982 of the London weighting index that the Labour Government had introduced in 1974 was one of the longer-term causes of the problem. We have also heard about the Conservatives' abolition of the police housing scheme in 1994, which contributed to the increasing scale of the problem.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): To what extent does the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that more money being given to public sector employees in London increases the problems of retaining people in the public service in the area outside London, to which my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) referred?

Mr. Davey: I thought that I had dealt with that matter earlier, when the hon. Member for West Chelmsford intervened. My point is that we need information, not only about London, but about other parts of the country: information on shortages, retention, recruitment and turnover in the public sector is limited, which is absurd given the avalanche of requests from the Government for huge amounts of information on services, outputs, waiting lists, absenteeism, qualification league tables and examination results from schools, local education authorities, police authorities and NHS trusts. The point is that the information that will help us to plan services more effectively is not requested. Public services depend on their employees: the health service, the police service and the education service are only as good as the people who work for them. If we really care about the quality of services in London and the surrounding counties, we must demand high-quality information on inflows, outflows and quality of staff.

If the Government sent questionnaires to the chief superintendent of Kingston police, Alan Given, to the chief executive of Kingston hospital, John Langan, and to the director of education in the royal borough of Kingston, John Braithwaite, they would provide the requested information because they know how important it is. They want the Government to acknowledge a major problem facing our public services. Armed with high-quality information, Government policy would be so much better informed. In addition, points made by Conservative Members about the difficulty of making fine judgments between London and areas outside London, and of reforming outer and inner London weightings, could be informed by data, not by anecdote and prejudice. That must be the way forward. If the Minister takes note of only one point from my speech, it should be that work force planning in public services must be better informed by gathering the relevant statistics.

My final point relates, of course, to my constituency. People who work in public services in London should be congratulated on the fantastic job that they do for our constituents. The quality of life in London is far higher because of their hard and dedicated work. We should take note of the work of temporary staff from Australia, New Zealand and South Africa in our schools and hospitals and thank them for it.

Mr. Burns: They have not got a vote here.

Mr. Davey: The hon. Gentleman misses the point. The nurses from the Philippines who work in Kingston hospital do not have a vote, but I still want to put on record my thanks to them.

Mr. Burns: I was trying to help the hon. Gentleman. He already has the press release for his local papers congratulating those workers in his constituency who have a vote; I was warning him that, having congratulated them, he need not go on for too long about the Australians and others who do not have a vote.

Mr. Davey: The hon. Gentleman is clearly ground down by cynicism. Some of us are value the quality of public services, not only for those who work in them, but for those who require their services. The people being served by the Philippine nurses are grateful for the work that they do. At the end of day, the issue is as much about the people who need the services as it is about those who provide them: constituents who need hospital services and who need the police to answer their 999 calls quickly, and parents who want their children to have the best start in life and the best teachers are asking us to improve public services. They also want us to ensure that those who provide those services are properly recompensed and can afford to live and work in our communities.

I hope that the Minister will take note of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington and me, and that he will treat the issue with the seriousness and urgency that it demands.

10.15 am

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): I congratulate the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Brake) on instigating the debate. It is an important subject and, as he will have learned from my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), it has ramifications well beyond London. As a Surrey Member of Parliament representing Guildford, which is similar to my hon. Friend's constituency, I have much sympathy with his argument.

London weighting for public sector workers is part of the wider issue of the range of formulae that the Government use to allocate funding. However, paying public sector workers is not just about funding, but about how much flexibility the system allows for decisions to be taken locally. For example, within the same central funding constraints, one police service might decide to employ fewer police officers, but to pay them more, than another. Those formulae include London weighting, the area cost adjustment—described by Sir John Banham, when he was a member of the Audit Commission, as 42 pages of regression equations—and the market forces factor in the health service, which drives much of the funding for the nurses and other health services workers mentioned this morning.

When I was a councillor in London, there was something called the equalisation fund; it was absorbed into the new way of funding local authorities after the introduction of the new local taxation system and the withdrawal of the local councils' ability directly to collect business rates. The longest-running star of the scene was the Barnett formula, which throws up discrepancies affecting everyone who lives south of the Scottish border. The Financial Secretary has had his ear bent on many occasions by representatives of those living in the north-east of England, who feel most strongly about the way in which the Barnett formula affects them.

Whether we live in London, Surrey, Essex or north-east England, we can hold up our hands and say, "Excuse me, but such-and-such a formula is unfair to our region." Of course, there is a circularity about the application of these formulae, because the more people who are employed in the public sector, the more the weightings for living costs are increased for their area, and the more that feeds through into higher local demands and costs. If public service workers in London have a large pay rise, there is a knock-on effect on the cost of housing; it is unfair to treat one substantial group of workers more beneficially than another; they all compete for the same limited housing stock.

It is important to consider flexibility as well as funding. I heard with interest that there is a 6 per cent. vacancy rate for nurses at the hospital in Carshalton; it might interest the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington to learn that, in Guildford, there is a vacancy rate for nurses of up to 30 per cent. and staff turnover of nearly as much in a single year. That is because people living in towns such as Guildford face the same cost pressures as those in central and outer London, but have none of the allowances. Someone who has the opportunity of catching a train to Waterloo every 15 minutes can come into London and obtain the allowance by working in a hospital—perhaps even one on the way to central London, in Carshalton, Richmond or other outer London areas. That is a way of obtaining extra allowance while living in Surrey.

Mr. Edward Davey: How much of the allowance would be taken up in the travel costs?

Mr. St. Aubyn: There are indeed travel costs and many employees might be tempted to use a small car and share the transport with someone else working at the same place. That would add to the traffic burden on the roads into London, so the hon. Gentleman is right to raise that issue.

However, let us address the real world. Already, 15 per cent. or more—one in seven—of my constituents commute into London, and a similar number commute every day from other parts of the south-east into my constituency, so there is a massive crossover of commuters. The cost of commuting does not stop people moving to where the opportunities and the jobs are the greatest. If, because of a massive increase in the weighting allowance, opportunities and jobs are concentrated in London, there will be a detrimental effect on services in towns such as Guildford, which already face deep problems.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford for mentioning the police force. Surrey Members of Parliament met the county police authority only a week ago. At that meeting, the allowance given to police officers in London was raised as a potential problem. If it is increased to £6,000 a year, we could face increased pressure on retention of officers in the Surrey force, as in the Essex and other forces around London. If we reflect on the reason why the Home Secretary is considering additional funding for police officers in London, we see that it is not all about money: it is also about morale. One of the reasons why the Metropolitan police is pushing so hard for an additional financial incentive is that morale has taken a major blow since the publication of the Macpherson report.

Mr. Davey: Before the hon. Gentleman launches into an analysis based on morale, is he aware that newly recruited police men and women living in Kingston and Surbiton have to rely on housing benefit and family credit to supplement their salaries? That is why they need a housing allowance, which was abolished by the Conservative Government.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for demonstrating that, when the housing allowance was abolished, police officers had access to other forms of support. The rug was not completely pulled from under their feet.

Mr. Burns: I was slightly confused by the comments of the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey). A police constable's starting salary is £16,000, so even if family credit regime were still in existence, someone earning that amount would not qualify for it.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. A police officer in the London area faces the same housing cost pressures as an officer living in the area that I represent. The difference is that the London officer already has a £3,000 salary differential over officers based in the home counties.

To expand my argument, I draw hon. Members' attention to the way in which the private sector deals with these matters. I was interested to discover that Eagle Star, which has offices in London, Chelmsford and Guildford, not only pays a London allowance of £3,200 a year, but pays an allowance in Chelmsford, Guildford, Reading and Slough of £1,100 a year—not as much as a London allowance, but a significant sum none the less. That may reflect the fact that we have the same commuter factors and that living costs are high. Many police officers who work in Surrey live across the border in Sussex, because they find that they cannot afford to live in the area where they work.

The morale of the Surrey police force, which I know well, is high. It has the best success rate in the country on fighting crime—officers there are part of a winning team. That counts for something when someone is deciding where to develop a career. We have a young police force, but, as they get older and their financial responsibilities and commitments grow, there is a strong temptation for police officers in Surrey to say, "I now need extra money, so I will make the move to the Met, or to a part of the country where living costs are lower." Our young police force is dynamic, effective and successful, but there is a hidden cost in the lack of experience that we could suffer if the additional money being given to the Metropolitan police—as is now being contemplated—results in a further influx of police officers into the Met from areas such as Surrey. We could be left facing a serious shortage of officers and, more importantly, a shortage of officers who are experienced in tackling crime in our area.

The subject of nurses from the Philippines was raised and I was glad when Kingston hospital took that initiative. We learned from that experience: bringing in nurses from the Philippines helped us to solve the much greater crisis at the Royal Surrey hospital in my constituency. We can vouch for the quality of training that those nurses were given and the contribution that they have made to our local health service in tackling the enormous increase in waiting lists in the past two to three years.

London weighting is part of the wider issue of the way in which we measure costs from one area to another. The critical factor in the health service is the market forces index. When the Government came to power they inherited two key indices: the index of need and the index of market forces, both of which were applied to about three quarters of the cost of each health authority. It was recognised that the other quarter of health authorities' costs was either not subject to, or not measurable in terms of either social need or market forces. Without any research, the Health Secretary at the time, the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), decided to increase the weighting of the health needs index to 100 per cent. of cost, while doing nothing about the market forces index. That meant that more prosperous areas of the country, such as the one that I represent were discriminated against and suffered a genuine cut in funding of 2 or 3 per cent.

In some areas, people are, on the whole, healthy and wealthy. However, the NHS is there to serve all the community. The old, the poor and the very sick, who do not have access to private health care or other means, are the ones now being made to suffer as we struggle with the longest waiting list in the country. Yesterday, I had to apologise for coming late to a Committee meeting attended by the Secretary of State for Education and Employment. I had just received a telephone call from the chairman of my health authority outlining the latest cuts in health provision that are having to be forced through because of the budget cuts imposed after election of the Labour Government. I am sorry to say that the Secretary of State laughed when I told him that—he thought that it was a fantastic joke, because he believes that people living in Chelmsford and Guildford and parts of London are so well off that they have ready access to alternative health provision, so they need not worry. He forgot about those who cannot afford those alternatives, just as he forgot about the nurses whom we cannot afford to pay a proper going rate for doing their job so well.

I agree with the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington that we urgently need research on and a radical review of all the formulae. The London weighting, and also the area cost adjustment and the market forces index, need to be considered clearly and dispassionately. It is unfortunate that the Government have proposed a review of health service funding that is deliberately weighted towards areas of high social need at the expense of areas such as the one that I represent. I hold no grudge against places such as Gateshead, where there are health problems. However, without being justified by any research, there has been an increase in funding in Gateshead of 30 per cent. relative to Guildford over the past few years. That makes one question whether the formulae, including the London weighting formula, are being applied fairly and equitably.

[Mr. St. Aubyn]

For a heart test that in our area used to be taken within three months of being needed, there is now a waiting period of up to a year. Not long ago, I heard about a young man of 29 dying of a heart attack because of that wait. One realises that the human cost of applying the formulae inequitably is incalculable. That heart test would have cost £80. The young man was an extremely successful employee in a major company: he had his future ahead of him and was much loved by everyone who worked with him. He was a loss to his community as well as to his family.

I have wandered a little way from the subject of debate, but I have tried to show that one cannot stop at saying, "£100 million here, £100 million there and we'll crack the problem of staff recruitment in London." We know from experiences in our constituencies that that will only open up problems in the areas surrounding London. We need services in which morale is high and people want to work. There must be flexibility so that decisions within funding packages can be made locally about whether money should go on more numbers, or on higher pay for fewer numbers with more experience and expertise.

Our debate is not only about money. In our education system, it is instructive that the unit cost per pupil in the past five years has gone down by 2 per cent. The output—the performance of our children achieving at least five passes at GCSE—has gone up by 3 per cent. The productive use of resources is as important as their allocation. I congratulate the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington on securing the debate because it is unfortunate that, under the Government, the allocation and application have suffered in areas such as the one that I represent. He told us that he has problems in his constituency as well. There is a tremendous burden on the Financial Secretary to tell us how he will ensure fairer allocation of resources, and how he will give the greater flexibility on the ground that is desperately needed.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Brake) on securing this interesting debate, in which important issues have been raised. As the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) said, my experience in an east London constituency has made me familiar with some of those issues.

I begin by setting the debate in the wider economic context. After the election, our first economic aim was to achieve a new platform of stability after the decades of boom and bust that we had endured. In our commitment to stability and prudence over the past three years, we have had a single purpose: to build a Britain that is decent as well as modern. Our primary economic priority of building a sound platform of stability and steady growth has been achieved to a remarkable extent. For the third year running, inflation is in line with our target; it is at historically low levels, and is also low compared with rates in other European countries. The economy will grow steadily by between 2¾ and 3¼ per cent. this year, and it will continue to follow that trend. Long-term interest rates, once 2 per cent. or more above rates in Germany, are now the same as those in Germany. That shows that people have confidence in a low-inflation future for Britain, thus providing a platform from which we can all plan for the long term with greater confidence.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I do not want to destroy the Financial Secretary's confidence in that glowing report on the economy, but what does he have to say about the skills gap, or about the fact that vacancies are at their highest for more than 10 years, while in the three years of his Government being in office, the number of people taking courses in FE colleges has dropped cumulatively by more than 500,000?

Mr. Timms: The hon. Gentleman draws attention to a remarkable feature of the economy: more than 920,000 more people have a job than at the time of the last election—the highest number in our history—and the unemployment rate is at its lowest for 20 years. At the same time, there are 1 million vacancies on offer across the UK, many of them in London; we are in a remarkable situation in which many more opportunities are available for people. All of that contributes to the optimism that all of us can share about the future. The stability that we have achieved is the precondition for high employment, higher living standards and strong public services. By building on the platform of stability that we have achieved by meeting national economic ambitions, we can realise the security and opportunity for all that we want. That is also the context in which we can achieve our ambitions for the services provided by public employees, on whom the debate has focused.

I remind hon. Members of the ambitions for Britain in the coming decade that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor set out last November. There is the ambition of prosperity, so that in place of our historic under-performance against other countries, we have a faster rise in productivity than our competitors, closing the productivity gap that has opened up. There is our full employment ambition, in contrast to years of high unemployment. We want employment opportunity for all, with a higher percentage of people in work, on a durable basis, than ever before. There is our education ambition, so that instead of lagging behind other countries and suffering huge disparities in our educational attainments, we ensure educational opportunity for all with the aim that, for the first time, at least half of our school leavers go into higher education and achieve greater skills, to respond to the point made by the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn). There is our anti-poverty ambition, so that, in contrast to the rise in inequality and poverty in recent decades, we ensure that every child has the best start in life as we halve child poverty in the next 10 years.

Alongside those ambitions are our ambitions for the services provided by public employees. Instead of inadequate public services that fail to guarantee opportunity or security, we are now investing for the future in strong public services that are there when people need them. We need to secure long-term answers to the long-term challenges that we face—an approach that was set out clearly in the Budget, when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced the largest ever sustained increase in NHS funding, and in the intensive review of the NHS led by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. That approach is at the heart of this year's spending review as we match new investment in public services with further modernisation.

As part of our commitment to public services, we believe in a firm and fair approach to public sector pay that takes account especially of the need to retain, recruit and motivate staff. Those are the issues on which most hon. Members have concentrated today. Overall pay, like all other costs, must be contained within the framework of spending plans in the comprehensive spending review, supporting the service delivery targets set out in the public service agreements. Across the public sector, the delivery of high-quality services is the key priority. Public sector pay must continue to be set in a prudent, disciplined manner that is clearly focused on recruitment and service delivery objectives. Specific considerations, including recruitment and retention in London, must be taken into account as necessary.

I emphasise that this is not merely a question of pay. The initiatives in the "Modernising Government" White Paper recognise the importance of having the right structures. Pay systems must be flexible and provide the right rewards and incentives for those working in the public service. The initiatives being taken in the national health service and in teaching are on the right path: such reforms provide more flexible pay systems, which help to deliver high-quality public services with appropriate rewards.

We welcome pay reform that addresses the circumstances and requirements of individual groups and helps to deliver output targets. That benefits those who provide public services, and, therefore, those who use them. Such a targeted approach is right. In comparison, the hon. Members for Carshalton and Wallington and for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) implied—without making their view explicit—that the answer was simply to raise the pay of everybody who works in public service in London. However, it is better to recognise where there are difficulties and where change is needed, and to respond accordingly.

Mr. Burns: The Financial Secretary is, by implication, criticising the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington, whose remarks he paraphrases as implying that the only solution is to pay more in London. However, will the Financial Secretary not accept that that is his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary's sole solution to the problems of recruitment and retention in the Metropolitan police?

Mr. Timms: There are different issues facing different parts of the public service. My suggestion, with which the hon. Gentleman would probably agree, is that different solutions are appropriate to different circumstances in each of the public services. I shall speak in a moment about the issues facing the police.

Mr. Brake: I agree that different solutions are needed for different cases. However, the key issue that I raised in most of my remarks—I did not call for big increases in London allowances—is that no information is available on which the Financial Secretary can draw up different solutions for different scenarios.

Mr. Timms: It is not for me to draw up the solutions; it is a matter for those who are responsible for providing the health service, employing teachers and employing the police in London. It is important that such decisions are taken in the right place, by those who deal with problems of recruitment and retention where they arise. It would be wrong to impose a pan-London solution, irrespective of the particular circumstances in each case.

I was interested by the point that the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington made about biomedical science, although it is not a matter for which I am responsible. He seemed to suggest that a problem in a particular part of the health service in Llandudno must apply in London as well. I thought that that illustrated well the need to focus where on those difficulties are being experienced in the health service, rather than say that a problem affects everyone in London when, in fact, it is much more tightly defined.

Mr. Edward Davey: The Financial Secretary says that he does not have responsibility for these matters because it is up to other people to make employment decisions. Will he confirm that he and the Treasury have responsibility for statistics? Will he confirm that it is within either his remit, or that of his ministerial colleagues, to ask for the collection of the statistics needed to analyse the problem that we face in London with recruitment, retention and high turnover in the public sector? He could ask for those statistics to be collected.

Mr. Timms: The hon. Gentleman is right: the Office for National Statistics is indeed responsible to the Treasury. However, those matters need to be and can be dealt with much more effectively locally, service by service. He should not pin his hopes on some huge central data collection exercise to tackle the issues involved; rather, the problems should be dealt with in a more devolved way. I am sure that, on reflection, he would agree.

Mr. Davey: Will the Financial Secretary give way?

Mr. Timms: Not again—I should like to make a little more progress first.

Within the overall public spending allocations, responsibility for pay, including the payment of London weighting, rightly rests with the wide range of different public-sector employers. They include not only Government Departments but local authorities, which are independently elected, autonomous, and largely independent of central Government; we do not intervene in their day-to-day affairs or in negotiations on their employees' pay and conditions. The detail of terms and conditions is, rightly, a matter for local authorities to determine. Local authorities are also responsible for funding the pay agreements of teachers, the fire service and the police, although the agreement for teachers is determined by the school teachers pay review body, and arrangements covering firefighters and police are determined by formulae over which the authorities have no control.

The Government expect local authorities to take a responsible line on the pay bills that they control. We want a firm and fair approach to public and private sector pay alike. In the public sector, that means pay settlements that take account of the need to retain, recruit and motivate staff within the framework provided by the spending plans of the comprehensive spending review.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Is it not true that many public services' statutory responsibilities are so specific and so clearly defined and so much of their revenue comes from Government grant that they have little flexibility about the number of employees, and, therefore, over how much they can pay?

Mr. Timms: The hon. Gentleman asks several questions. A good deal of flexibility is available to local authorities over how many staff they employ. It is for them to make the difficult choices that face local councils in deciding how to tackle local problems. It is important that such decisions should continue to be made by those responsible for front-line services.

The NHS employs more than 100,000 staff in Greater London, and the cost of London allowances is approaching £250 million a year. The pay review body for nurses and associated groups in the NHS has recommended large increases in London allowances in the past two years—13.5 per cent. in 1999, because no national increase had been made since 1995, and 3.4 per cent. from April. The Government have accepted those recommendations. A qualified nurse working in central London will receive an allowance of £3,030 a year. Unions representing most non-review-body groups have agreed to an imaginative three-year pay deal that includes increases in London weighting allowances of 13 ½ per cent. for 1999 and 3¼ per cent. for 2000. Other public sector employers are similarly responsible for their own pay determination agreements. For example, London weighting allowance was consolidated into the salaries of London Underground employees in 1992, and the cost of living in London is one of the factors taken into account in annual pay settlements.

Some key public sector groups, such as doctors, nurses and school teachers, have an independent pay review body that make recommendations on their pay. The Government consider the recommendations of those pay review bodies. We have, I am glad to say, succeeded in moving away from the sequence of staged pay settlements that characterised the behaviour of the previous Administration. We have accepted the main pay recommendations for the past two years exactly as proposed by the pay review bodies. Public sector employers need to work within the resources available to them under public spending plans. Both public and private sectors must continue to be responsible about pay for the sake of our economic stability, which we need to secure for the longer term, if we are to build on our success. Existing spending allocations were agreed in the 1998 spending review; the review for 2000 is under way and will allocate resources to deliver the Government's objectives for public services over the next three years.

The cost of living and working in London is greater than in other parts of the country and systems of London weighting have developed in response. In practice, some organisations have specific London weighting allowances that reflect the distinction between inner and outer London; some have allowances intended to meet particular recruitment and retention requirements; and some have consolidated their weighting into basic rates of pay or pitched their rates of pay so that basic salaries reflect the situation. All those arrangements are intended to reflect the additional costs to both public and private sectors and to help the recruitment and retention of the staff needed to deliver services in London.

In the civil service, for example, weighting allowances were largely translated into recruitment and retention allowances some years ago. Since then, responsibility for pay and grading has been delegated from the centre to Departments, and many Departments and agencies have consolidated them into base pay. That has allowed a more flexible arrangement, so that it is possible to concentrate extra help on problem areas rather than having a blanket provision, which was a feature of past arrangements. Within available resources, public sector employers need to tailor their pay arrangements, including those for London, to meet their own circumstances and their particular recruitment and retention needs.

Mr. Burns: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Timms: I need to make headway, so I shall not give way now.

In the health service, regional offices are being asked to set out regional action proposals to reduce vacancies and turnover in all trusts, to expand the nursing work force across the region, and to target the worst performing trusts and improve their performance. We have allocated £4 million to consortiums for return-to-practice initiatives to follow up the recent successful nurse recruitment campaign that aimed to bring back into the health service the qualified nurses referred to by the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton. By last September, there were more than 5,000 more qualified nurses working in the health service than there had been a year earlier, so the initiative has been successful. London and the south-east have particular problems that account for one half of the three-month vacancies across the country. A small team that focuses on recruitment and retention will work across those two regions and link with the central recruitment and retention unit at the Department of Health. That will assist hospitals in the constituencies of those hon. Members from London and the south-east who have spoken in the debate.

In recognition of the Prime Minister's saying that teachers are the change makers in modern society, the latest report from the school teachers review body accepted that there are particular problems in London, but noted that recruitment and retention difficulties vary considerably between London boroughs, schools—I can personally confirm that from what happens in my constituency—and subjects. The review body is committed to finding out more about the problems in London, to gather some of the data for which hon. Members have been asking, and to establish why funding for London does not more often find its way into discretionary recruitment and retention payments. It will give details on the outcome of its findings in its next report. On 30 March, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment announced a training salary for post graduate trainee teachers of £6,000 a year, which will take effect from 1 September. It is hoped that it will attract more people into teacher training and a teaching career.

In response to the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington, I must say that retention in the police is not a major problem. According to data from the Confederation of British Industry, in 1998-99, the rate of turnover in the Metropolitan police was about 7 per cent. compared with 19.3 per cent. for the whole economy, but less for the public sector. However, there have been recruitment difficulties, which are being dealt with through the police negotiating board whose negotiations are under way. As was mentioned, there has been a referral to the police arbitration panel to take forward those negotiations. One of the particular problems facing people in London is, as the hon. Gentleman said, the high cost of housing.

Mr. Burns: Will the Financial Secretary deal with the London weighting allowance and say what impact it will have on police in the home counties?

Mr. Timms: As I said, discussions are under way with the police negotiating board, which covers salaries in the Metropolitan police and those outside London. I have no doubt that such issues will be a factor in the discussions.

The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington asked me to say more about the proposals of my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister. The housing Green Paper entitled "Quality and Choice: A decent home for all" proposes a new starter home initiative designed to help key workers and others on low incomes to buy their own homes in areas of high house prices and high demand. It is a consultative document: we have not defined which key workers should be helped, or the income thresholds of those who should benefit from it. I suspect that they are likely to vary from one locality to another. We are consulting on all such matters at present and asking for views on the help that should be offered, such as whether we should offer interest-free loans, cash grants or help with shared ownership, and which key workers should be the target of the initiative.

We shall be looking for innovative proposals that build on the range of existing low-cost, home ownership schemes. It is our intention that detailed proposals for the initiative, including the amount of funding available for it, will be announced later this year, in the light of responses to the consultation and decisions under the Government's spending review for the next three years. Proposals will be invited from registered social landlords and others. Hon. Members might be interested to know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health recently announced the appointment of a national nurse housing co-ordinator, to act on our intention to have more affordable homes for nurses throughout the country.

The Government are offering in the public sector something for something. We value public services and the people who provide them. We want our public services to thrive and we need to demonstrate the value that we place on them, inside and outside London, through the pay and conditions that we provide. Equally, we need those in public services to work with us to bring about the changes that will modernise the services, restore public confidence in them and equip them for the challenges of the future. In that way, we can provide confidence for the future for the users of those services in London and elsewhere, and for those who work in them, too.

Special Educational Needs

11 am

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): I have been assisted in my understanding of special educational needs and the issues surrounding them by the existence in my constituency of several centres for excellence. I should like to pick out for special attention Ashley junior school and its headmaster, Mr. Colin Williams, who is supported by his thoroughly professional staff. It is a very successful primary school, with a fully integrated special needs unit catering for pupils with simple learning difficulties through to those with autism.

The school's strength lies in the fully integrated nature of its special needs unit, which is managed by close contact with parents and with various professionals. The school's aim is to ensure that pupils with special needs are able to enter mainstream classes by the time that they enter secondary education. Although it is not always possible to achieve that aim, the school's success rate is high.

It is important that resourced, attached units such as the one at Ashley enable children with a variety of needs to enjoy their education within a mainstream setting, among other pupils who will act as good role models. Parents believe that their children's attendance at a mainstream school will help to meet their own aspirations of ensuring that their children are assimilated into society and can make a contribution to it.

I do not want to enter into the argument about the various merits of special schools against those of mainstream schools. My view is that there must be choice, because a mainstream school cannot always be the answer. However, I have neither expertise nor great knowledge in the sphere—unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson). I am sure that, if he is fortunate enough to catch the eye of the occupant of the Chair, he will share some of that knowledge with us.

Ashley junior school's growing reputation has brought with it some penalties. Although a recent report on the school by the Office for Standards in Education was full of superlatives and recognised it as a centre for excellence, a consequence has been that Ashley has become a magnet for referrals from outside agencies, particularly local paediatric consultants. Therefore, a growing proportion of children at Ashley have special educational needs, and the school has had to work harder to maintain its position in local and national league tables. Ashley must still cope with the pressures of meeting what must be, at least in some cases, unrealistic or non-achievable targets. Nevertheless, Ashley continues to insist that, regardless of any short-term effects on statistics and league tables, increasing children's self-esteem will reap long-term benefits.

If the Minister is interested in seeing a school that has such an excellent reputation for special needs teaching, she could visit Ashley, where I am sure she would be most welcome and learn much.

My main purpose in initiating this debate, however, is to draw attention to problems in acquiring statements of special educational need. I know that there are always two sides to a story. For many parents, the granting of a statement brings comfort and makes them feel more at ease. They believe that such a label seems to make their child's condition more socially acceptable. There is also a belief that a statement will ensure that the school provides a level of support that was not previously provided.

My view is that a statement should make no difference. In an ideal world, a statement would make no difference. At many schools, such as Ashley junior school, a statement does not make a difference. If a school provides support on a needs basis, rather than a resources-driven basis, it should not matter whether a child is statemented. If more schools were provided with sufficient resources and the freedom to deploy those resources according to their priorities—as they were under the grant-maintained regime; I assure the Minister that this is the only party political point that I shall make in the debate—the need for statements would be much reduced.

We do not, however, live in an ideal world, and not all schools are like Ashley. Schools have resource constraints, and different schools may have different priorities. Nevertheless, there is increasing demand among parents for statements. I believe, however, that that demand is capped by an artificial restriction.

The 1979 Warnock report, which formed the basis of the Education Act 1981, took the view that 20 per cent. of pupils have some special educational need, whereas, at any one time, no more than 2 per cent. of pupils should be statemented. My perception is that, despite the passage of time and hugely changed circumstances, those guidelines remain effectively in place. In the past 20 years, however, we have discovered a whole series of new conditions, such as attention deficit and hyperactive disorder.

To digress from my theme for a moment, I am concerned about the number of pupils who are being diagnosed with ADHD and prescribed Ritalin, which is being dispensed at school. The headmaster at Ashley junior school told me that he is concerned that he has 13 pupils to whom he dispenses daily doses of Ritalin, whereas he believes that, in 50 per cent. of those cases, Ritalin make little difference to the pupils' behaviour at school. He suggests that we should be looking for other explanations for children's behaviour, which is often well under control while at school.

As I said, a series of other conditions has recently been diagnosed, although such conditions were not prevalent in the late 1970s and early 1980s. Other than ADHD, they include organisational dyspraxia, motor dyspraxia, the autistic continuum and a variety of other disorders. I do not know the reason for the increased diagnoses, but suspect that we are only now noticing conditions that were always present, and not that something else has suddenly changed to cause them. Nevertheless, we should review the guidelines and criteria established by the Warnock committee.

I sought to initiate this debate because I perceive that there will be huge frustration if we maintain the resistance to statementing when there is an increased demand for it among parents. I am sure that I am not the only hon. Member who, at constituency advice sessions, faces parents at the end of their tether, filled with absolute frustration, because they feel that they are entirely on their own. They seem almost to be trying to wage war against the local education authority in an attempt to obtain a statement for their child. I have also had parents who were in tears, after succeeding in achieving a statement for their child, as they recalled the frustration of months and years in which they seemed to be banging their heads against a brick wall.

Parents who are resourceful and articulate, of course, win through. I am concerned about those who are less resourceful or articulate—many of them lone parents—because they often do not stay the course and do not achieve a statement. That is a serious problem.

I am fortunate in having in my constituency Mrs. Irene Sharman, an adviser who runs a telephone support line for the Independent Panel for Special Education Advice. IPSEA is the largest parent advice and advocacy organisation in the voluntary sector. Mrs. Sharman recently put me in touch with its director, Mr. John Wright. IPSEA does a tremendous job in supporting those parents who are able to access its services and gain support from them, but the statement achieved at the end of the frustrating process is often not worth the paper that it is written on.

In the Education Act 1981, a statement was envisaged as an enforceable contract under which a local education authority was bound to make provision to meet the child's needs. That aim has been frustrated over two decades by local authorities refusing to specify how much special help a child should receive. I have seen a number of examples, including the following shocking extract from a statement:

> This child requires provision suitable for a child with general learning difficulties.

What does that mean? How is it enforceable? How can parents be sure that their child is getting the support that he or she needs at school? I am told that such vagueness is not uncommon.

I am not the only one who says that. In 1992, the Audit Commission published a report entitled "Getting in on the Act: Provision for Pupils with Special Educational Needs. The National Picture". It said:

> Since most statements for pupils in ordinary schools are vague, they cannot protect a specific level of provision. The notion that statements protect resources is therefore a fallacy. The 1981 Education Act envisaged that a statement would be a guarantee that extra help would be provided consistently and for as long as required. In fact, there are numerous examples of LEAs changing provision. One LEA, facing a budget crisis, reduced the extra teaching hours by 50 per cent. for all pupils with statements issued because of learning difficulties. LEAs which ran their own teams of peripatetic teachers frequently changed the levels of support offered to pupils. Rarely was there any discussion of this with parents—but even if there had been, the parents could hardly have claimed that the provision specified was not being made since it was not usually made clear in the first place. . . .
> There is an incentive for LEAs not to specify what is to be provided because they thereby avoid a long-term financial commitment.

In response to that damning report, the Government issued a code of practice in 1993. It required that the statement should normally be quantified, specifying the number of lessons or hours of assistance per week that the child was to have. That was subsequently confirmed by a decision in the High Court. Notwithstanding that, I continue to receive a host of complaints about the vagueness of statements.

IPSEA has drawn to my attention the excuses that local education authorities give for failing to be specific in their statements, as they are required to be by the code of practice. For your amusement, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall regale you with a few. One says:

> The school timetable won't let us be precise on the Statement.

Another says:

> In our county there is a policy not to quantify provision on a Statement– this is done instead in the school's Statement Implementation Plan.

A further excuse runs:

> We like to keep it vague so that if we are able to give a little extra we are not prevented from doing so by the Statement.

How extraordinary!

The intention of the 1981 Act was to guarantee provision so that special needs would be given the resources that the statement called for. The 1992 Audit Commission report showed that the law had failed to deliver that. The 1993 code of practice has similarly failed to deliver. Parliament is still failing to deliver the guarantee promised two decades ago to some of our most vulnerable children. It would be out of order for me to call for legislation in an Adjournment debate, but I should like the Minister to answer two specific questions. First, does she still support the principle enunciated in the 1981 Act that there should be a legal guarantee that a child will receive the special education that his or her needs call for? Secondly, if she is still committed to that principle, what will she do to ensure that we start to deliver it in practice?

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I am pleased to be able to take part in this important debate. I have to disappear for a few minutes at 12 o'clock. I apologise to the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) and to my hon. Friend the Minister for that, but I shall be back to hear the concluding speeches.

I am pleased to see the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) here. I am sure that he will dwell on the issues as they affect Gloucestershire, and I make no apology for doing likewise. A long-overdue review of special educational needs provision is going on in Gloucestershire. It has concentrated on the moderate learning difficulty schools, but it will have an impact on severe learning difficulty provision and schools that cater for educational and behavioural difficulties.

The debate in Gloucestershire has become quite heated, to put it mildly. It has not always been handled as well as it might have been, but it is easy to speak from a distance and cast aspersions. I may disagree with some of what the hon. Member for Tewkesbury says. I agree that the review is needed and with the general direction in which it is going. I have always believed that to argue in extremis in favour of exclusion is as wrong as to argue that inclusion is neither possible nor reasonable.

Bownham Park special school is in my constituency. I have worked with the Special Schools Protection League, under the chairmanship of Mr. Graham Barton. It does not argue against inclusion in principle, but it is unhappy about some aspects, which I shall concentrate on.

The hon. Member for New Forest, West identified the essence of the problem. The fact that parents often have great difficulty with the statementing process and there is often a battle to get children statemented—or at least to have their special needs identified—flavours the way in which they regard their children's education. That often means that it is difficult to include the children later. In an ideal world, all children would be in mainstream education, but that will never be feasible or realistic. We must understand the background and try to overcome some of the difficulties.

Gloucestershire's review is ongoing and some proposals have been made. I am a great believer in the need for incremental change, but to carry out that change we must provide facilities to allow children to integrate for some of the time, but have support when necessary. The difficulty is that in carrying that through, some mainstream schools will have to provide some special provision—I do not like the idea of special units—where children can go when it is not appropriate for them to be in the mainstream.

There is a supposed problem of stigma for the schools that provide those facilities. More particularly, the parents of children in moderate learning difficulty schools essentially distrust the system because of the battles that they have had in the process of getting their children identified as needing either statementing or additional help. They believe that if their children go into the mainstream, support will be diluted—notwithstanding the fact that many children in the mainstream who are already identified as needing special help are not getting it, for all sorts of reasons. It is a question of resources—we cannot hide from that—but it is also a question of early identification and support.

I understand and support what the county is doing—even if I do not necessarily go along with all the findings and conclusions—because we have to take people along with us. Choice is something of a myth, but people need assurance that what is being provided for their children is right and as good as it can be.

We must understand that the debate on inclusion is approachable from the other side in the sense that, in our changing society, it is right to try to include people in whatever way we can. That must mean that we look at the balance of provision and whether it is right. That is why Gloucestershire has had difficulties. I know many other counties have been through this in the past, but Gloucestershire is something of a special case as we have had a high percentage of children in special schools. That may have been right historically—and it may be right now—but we must consider how best to move the picture forward.

The hon. Member for New Forest, West looked at some of the dilemmas that we face. In Gloucestershire, this has become a political issue, although not a party-political issue. Understandably, people will fight for their school and for their provision, and I have had some moving letters about this matter. However, we must argue the case, if it is right, and take people with us. I believe that that is possible. People at Bownham Park school understand and support the logic of integration, but not on all occasions and not at the cost of the educational provision for their children.

What we do must be right for the individual child. That is a wonderfully idealistic concept, but if my understanding of the 1981 Act is right, that should be happening now. For too long the battle lines have been drawn in terms of authorities seemingly trying not to provide the necessary education and, if they do, providing too little, too late. We must overcome that.

This is not a finance-led exercise, and too often we are taken along that road. We must also recognise that many children in the mainstream need additional support. Special schools will remain, although they may not stay on their existing sites. If integration is possible, we must identify how it can be achieved in practice.

I wholeheartedly believe that we need to engage in the debate. It is not easy, and I shall always argue for the provision of special needs education for all children who require it. I would be interested to hear what the hon. Member for Tewkesbury has to say in terms of taking the matter forward. Special educational needs is rightly a subject for debate, and I am grateful for this opportunity to debate it here this morning.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) on securing this debate. It is not easy to get these one-and-a-half hour debates, and I am sure that he has been persistent. There is a good reason for his persistence, and he eloquently went through the problems.

I do not know whether I ought to declare an interest, but I declare that my wife is a county councillor in Gloucestershire. She sits on the education committee and, for a year, she was the Conservative group's spokesman on that committee. One of the biggest items that she dealt with was the changes to the provision of special educational needs.

I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew). He said that I was not his hon. Friend but, away from the Chamber—and, quite often, in it—we work closely together for Gloucestershire. This may not help the hon. Gentleman's career, but he comes from an independent-minded position on many issues; I mean that as a compliment. I may not agree entirely with his comments, but I recognise that our opinions come from different, but genuine, standpoints.

On the question of money, I will make some accusations regarding the process in Gloucestershire, one of which relates to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West. He talked about statementing, of which there is a great shortage in Gloucestershire. We could query why that is; I suggest that it suits some people in the county to have a lack of statementing facilities. When there are a great many statemented children, that means that one must question whether special needs provision should be retained or expanded. If there are no statements, it is easy to pretend that there is no need for special educational needs provision.

The hon. Member for Stroud, who has been at the meetings with me, knows that Gloucestershire has had a funding problem in education generally, and we have done what we can to try to improve matters. However, I must refer to a comment, which was probably not intended, by the county's director of education when we were discussing the general problem of education funding. When it was pointed out that the county had quite a good provision for special educational needs and that money could be saved there, the director of education said that he was "doing his damnedest" to save money in that respect. That is a disgrace; it is supposed to be not a question of saving money, but of providing the right kind of education for children.

I recognise that many children with special needs are already integrated in schools across the country—certainly across Gloucestershire. If we can include children in mainstream schools, we should. That is an obvious statement with which most people would agree.

My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West and the hon. Member for Stroud recognised that there are many children who simply cannot be included in mainstream schools and who need the special care, education, treatment and facilities that only special schools can provide.

If we are agreed on that, what is the problem? Some authorities, including Gloucestershire, have taken the Green Paper as a green light for the wholesale closure of special schools. That is beginning to happen. The Minister will no doubt say that that was not the intention, and I would accept that, but that has certainly been the effect.

I have taken the matter as high as I can, to the Secretary of State and to the Prime Minister, who recently wrote to me to say that his concern was that parents should have a choice. That is a good, Conservative principle, but there will be no choice for any parent if the schools are closed.

I support the principle of inclusion, but I recognise that it is not always possible. A nephew and godson of mine has special needs, and he has been tried in both kinds of school. He is extremely bright, but he has one or two problems that caused disruption in the mainstream school. That was not fair on him or, equally importantly, on the other children. Because of his difficulties, the special needs school tended to provide a far better education for him.

It is important to recognise people's feelings on the issue. I have spoken to many parents in Gloucestershire and to heads and teachers at mainstream schools, as well as a great many pupils, and they are all in favour of retaining the special schools.

Alderman Knight school in my constituency provides education, care, treatment and facilities of the highest quality. If the Minister came to that school and saw the work that was being done there and the feeling that the pupils have, or if she saw the letters that I and my wife, as a then education spokesman, received from the pupils, or the petitions calling for us to do our utmost to save the school, I am sure that she would be persuaded that it is important to keep it open. Nobody who has seen that school's work would allow it to close.

It is not entirely down to the Minister whether such schools close, because responsibility has been handed down to regional or county level. One could argue that that is the right thing to do, in that people in the area should know what provision is needed and which schools are doing a good job, but it concerns me that the Department for Education and Employment seems to be washing its hands of the issue. If the special school is under threat, will I still be allowed to hold an Adjournment debate on the issue, or will I be told that it is not the Minister's responsibility?

Given that so many people who are involved in education do not want the wholesale closure of special schools to go ahead, who are we to engineer that closure? Who are we to say that inclusion has to be the right way? It may be the right way for many children, but for many others it is not.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West again on what he said about statementing, although I have confined my remarks to another issue, which concerns me and a great many other people in Gloucestershire. Somebody who came to see me yesterday, who is heavily involved in Alderman Knight school, asked why we should work to help the school if it is to be closed. It is not under immediate threat of closure, but, given Gloucestershire education authority's policy, neither I nor the parents have any doubt that it is under threat.

I end by making a plea for the very special pupils who attend special schools.

11.35 am

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon): I, too, pay tribute to the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne), who so eloquently introduced this subject—when we saw it on the Order Paper, we realised that it was a big subject—and who made an effective point about the vagueness of statements. We all recognise that problem. What he said about how authorities seem to want to keep their statements vague to give them more flexibility has many resonances in my local authority, although I question whether that is a matter of intentions or of the resources available.

I think that we all appreciated the contributions of the hon. Members for Stroud (Mr. Drew) and for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson), who identified some issues in Gloucestershire that have received national attention in the media. They brought out well the difficulties that local authorities face in dealing with integration.

It is helpful to analyse the pressures on local authorities by considering both the demand and the supply side and recognising that many factors create pressures that, sadly, are transmitted to parents and children and lead to inadequacy of provision, delay in identifying the need for provision, vagueness over what is to be provided and, sometimes, cuts. When cuts are needed, it is sometimes seen as a soft option to cut special needs provision.

Much of what the hon. Member for New Forest, West said about the demand side is true. He listed some of the reasons why there may be an increasing—and legitimate—demand for special educational needs provision and, as a subset of that, for statements. One is that more difficulty and disability in communication, behaviour and learning are recognised these days by educational psychologists, paediatricians and other experts. We would expect that to be the case in this, as in any, field of medicine and education.

It may be the case that, at the margins, advances in neo-natal care have led to a greater number of severely disabled children—of course, I make no judgment on that—and to a wider range of disabilities that, quite rightly, have to be catered for. That has certainly been observed in terms of health care provision and there will of course be a spillover to education. Physically or mentally disabled children have a right to education, and that can add an enormous amount to their and their families' quality of life.

There is probably more information available now—in the information age—to parents of children with needs, alerting them to the fact that there are services out there. Many patient organisations and organisations of the recipients of education do invaluable work in identifying best practice and alerting parents and teachers to what can be done. The National Autistic Society is but one. In the age of the internet, we would expect more parents to have a great deal of information about the best practice that is out there. There is also information about new practice, which will be portrayed as good by those who are promoting it, although there may be no evidence to back up the claims.

More can be done in schools, as the professionals become more expert and experienced. Both the legislative and the good practice approaches that have been taken over the past few decades to try to ensure that children with special needs get the attention that they need can be built on. Potentially, in certain areas, there may have been a shift from health service provision for some children with severe difficulties to the education service, and that raises the issue of whether that shift has been matched by a transfer of funds. Both sectors, of course, try to retain as much funding as possible, as demands increase.

Demands may increase for other reasons and the hon. Member for New Forest, West mentioned the increased diagnosis of conditions. It is unclear whether that is caused by new conditions emerging, new recognition of conditions or the labelling of conditions that were previously recognised but did not have a diagnostic label that enabled people to campaign more clearly on the issues. Attention deficit hyperactivity disorder is one example, and many of us will have had representations from people concerned about the recognition of that spectrum of problems and whether the drug treatment is appropriate.

On the supply side, it is inevitable that funding questions will arise. Even in the best-resourced education service, and even with a Government with the best will towards education, one would expect resource pressures, whether in terms of grants to local education authority or of the level of standard spending assessment. The two are not necessarily linked. Simply calling a school grant maintained does not suddenly magic up extra resources—they are taken from somewhere else in the system. The hon. Gentleman said that that was a party political point, but my response would be that it misses the point on funding issues.

Clear underfunding still exists in education, and the Government have recognised that in giving a big increase in funding this year. Many of us would note that the 8 per cent. real-terms increase in funding has come three years into this Parliament, and we should therefore ask what people receiving the service went through in that time, as well as under previous Governments.

There is a question—no more than that—about the danger of distorting priorities through target setting. I have not investigated the issue in detail, but I ask the Minister to recognise that the problem may exist and to investigate it. If more targets are set in an area other than special needs, or the Government or Ofsted decide that targets set in special needs must be more stringently adhered to, there is a danger that local politicians will put resources into ensuring that they meet the targets that they must meet. By default, resources would then be taken from areas with fewer targets or with targets that appear to have lesser political importance. That may be an issue for the media, because it seems that, if something is not capable of being measured by a league table, they are not interested in it. In asking the Minister that general question, I do not defend the use of targets as the answer. There may be merit in having fewer targets and allowing priorities to be set locally and letting teachers get on with their jobs within a Government-set framework.

A question arises from the Gloucestershire debate on integration and whether that creates pressures on funding. We want parents and children to have a choice, but it must be a funded choice. We must recognise that if a certain number of special schools have a certain number of pupils and slowly but surely those pupils are integrated into the mainstream without the closure of any special schools, the per capita cost of providing that special schooling increases. Overheads cannot be reduced as quickly as the number of pupils in the system. While the Government may have provided additional help for special needs, the question is whether that has been sufficient to cope with the additional cost in the special schools sector of providing the same service for a smaller number of pupils. It is also questionable whether full funding has been provided for the sort of support that statemented and non-statemented children and their parents wish for in the mainstream sector. Such support is not a cheap option.

Another area in which resource pressures may have been created by policy is the continued delegation of funding to schools. I do not oppose such delegation and. indeed, the early pilots of delegated budgets took place in Liberal Democrat-controlled authorities, for example—at the time—Cambridgeshire. It has been pointed out by schools receiving delegated budgets and by local education authorities that one loses economies of scale when some services are not provided centrally because of the following of the mantra of delegation. That has certainly happened in the case of school meals in my authority, and the Government have also recognised the problem in the provision of music education. We must also question the continuing drive to measure the efficiency and competence of local education authorities by the amount that they keep centrally, even if that is for effective and efficient provision for special educational needs.

Mr. Drew: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is a problem that, if we integrate more children, special schools will become smaller, which means that they will face a deteriorating budgetary situation? That is the double whammy facing Gloucestershire's special schools.

Dr. Harris: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for agreeing with my point. Without some closures, the cost per capita of educating children in special schools will increase because overheads cannot be reduced as quickly as school numbers are falling. If the number of children educated in special schools falls by 10 per cent., the logical answer is to close 10 per cent. of the schools to achieve the overhead savings, but that can be difficult for political reasons. It can also be difficult for practical reasons, if a school specialises in specific provision, whether for a disability group or a mode of delivery of education. That may make it counter-productive to seek to rationalise the buildings.

That issue must be recognised by those responsible for resource allocation, or the responsibility for taking difficult decisions that are unpopular should be taken by those who have control of the budget. As we know, 80 per cent. of control of LEA budgets rests with the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions and only around 20 per cent. rests with the democratically elected members of local authorities and their discretion to raise the council tax, where that is permitted under capping rules. Blame—if that is the right word—and responsibility should rest with those who set the budgets.

I have several specific suggestions on the issue of special needs, based on my experience of what Oxfordshire has done in the short time that I have been a Member of Parliament for the area. Parents feel genuine concern that targets in the form of league tables for attainment may make schools, perhaps irrationally, resist the inclusion of children with special educational needs, especially in large numbers, because of the effect that that may have—even marginally—on attainment levels. It is important for the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the hon. Member for Redditch (Jacqui Smith), to put on the record her position on that issue, if she has the opportunity to do so. My LEA is on record as saying that such discrimination in admission is unacceptable, especially for that reason, and I hope that the Minister can assure us that it is also unnecessary. The market that is being created by the publication of league tables in their current form—I recognise the changes the Government have made to reflect added value better—can be a disincentive to integration.

A second suggestion is that the Government should develop specialist mainstream schools dealing with certain disabilities. They may be doing that in certain areas, but in Abingdon in my constituency I recently visited the Larkmead school, the county specialist for the integration of deaf children and of children with hearing difficulties. It has an excellent reputation, and provides a supportive yet challenging culture for its children. It does not rely merely on sign language, but does a lot of other work with pupils.

The Minister must also accept that the additional cost of transport for special needs children has implications for funding. Large distances may be involved when children have to travel to specialist mainstream or special schools. In Oxfordshire, I am told that transport for SEN children costs £3.6 million year, compared to a total of £5.8 million for transport for mainstream children. The Minister will not want to get into a discussion about standard spending assessments, but there is a feeling that the cost of transport, especially in rural areas, is not covered adequately in SSA calculations. That problem may worsen as specialist mainstream schools become more common.

There is an argument for regional planning of special needs provision. That would ensure that each county or local education authority did not regard its area boundary as the limit of its responsibilities and of the requirement to share good practice. Provision must be shared between LEAs in a region, and they must work closely together. Clearly, it is easy for the Liberal Democrat party to call for that, given our attachment to a democratically elected tier of local government at regional level, but existing regional structures should also consider that suggestion.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): I am listening with interest to the hon. Gentleman's thoroughly constructive speech. Although I do not necessarily accept his regional agenda, will he join me in asking the Minister to say a little more about the regional co-ordinating committees for special educational needs provision? They have been established, but we have heard very little about them to date.

Dr. Harris: I look forward to the Minister's response to a joint quasi-delegation on that point.

The use of new technology provides an opportunity to integrate the delivery of education to some children with special educational needs. It allows them to integrate even better than they do in mainstream schools, as children with physical disabilities are at least as adept as others at using joysticks and computers. Do the Government have any plans to fund or encourage new initiatives in that area?

I end by thanking the hon. Member for New Forest, West for introducing the debate, which has given us an opportunity to hear his concerns about statementing, and to discuss the wider issues. The hon. Gentleman noted that statements are seen to be an end in themselves, rather than a means to provision. Parents tend to focus on statements because of the way in which the legislation and codes of practice are put together. The situation will improve when we concentrate more on the provision and less on the statement.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): I echo the congratulations extended to my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) on his good fortune in securing the debate, and on the way in which he introduced it. He tackled an important subject with the appropriate blend of passion and sensitivity.

As we consider these issues, we should all adopt the phrase "sensitivity matters" as our motto. I have no quarrel at all with what was said in the distinctive contributions from my hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) and from the hon. Members for Stroud (Mr. Drew) and for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris). The first two speakers explained and made more widely known some of the difficulties in their local education authorities, and the third contributor added to the mix some constructive points arising out of his experience of what is happening in his area.

I have no intention of spoiling the tone of the debate, and I am sure that the Minister has no such intention either. All hon. Members have different points to add to what I hope will remain a broad consensus on this matter. We are all aware, from our work as constituency Members of Parliament, of the immense effort expended and concern expressed by parents of children with special educational needs. Equally, we are aware of the frustration and hassle that they experience when they try to get from their local education authority the appropriate provision for the distinctive—and often unique—needs of individual children.

The debate has revealed a phenomenon that is evident in the wider spectrum of social policy. Better scientific knowledge, improved information among citizens and rising expectations blend together to make it difficult to provide appropriate resources for special needs education, and to resolve conflicts with respect to that provision. Parents have huge concerns about SEN provision, which Members of Parliament must loyally try to represent to the providing authorities. However, at the same time, we must accept the difficulties that LEAs face in balancing the allocation of resources between mainstream education and SEN provision. In that connection, the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon made some highly revealing comments about transport costs.

Moreover, overall SEN provision will vary between LEAs. Some authorities may make better provision for blind children than for children with hearing difficulties, for example, while others may do more for children with specialist conditions than for those with more familiar categories of disability. It is extremely difficult to treat all cases fairly and in the best possible way. We must also bear in mind the fact that special school provision will not always fit a changing pattern of presenting disabilities or needs, or the various transport and geographical requirements of a well scattered county authority.

As I have said in previous debates on disability issues in this Chamber, the right approach is not to play party political football with what has or has not been done in the past. Instead, we must accept that all parties want to achieve continuous improvement when it comes to disability matters, and a gradual raising of standards, expectation and provision.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury said, the Conservative Government made some contribution in the early 1990s, when they established the code on SEN, and the tribunal. I was a Minister at the time, and played a small legislative role in that process. However, I am happy to accept that the Government now want to move on to other matters, and I hope that we will spend some time today on those.

The new phase was ushered in by the Green Paper and the Government's welcome commitment to involving education in the disability rights agenda, which extends to all education in maintained schools, and to further and higher education. The Government have also promised that they will introduce a Bill on disability in education, and I hope that the Minister will say when that is expected to appear. It is an open secret—Ministers have admitted as much—that the Bill was agreed to at the very last minute and that it is being drafted.

That Bill is complex to draft, and it is another open secret that the Government are having some difficulty with their legislative timetable. Will the Bill appear this Session? If not, should not the Government make a clean breast of the matter and concentrate on getting a largely agreed Bill ready in good time for the next Session? Given the sensitivity of these issues, it is better to legislate properly than to legislate in haste. That should not, however, be seen as a blank cheque for sitting on such a measure indefinitely. There is a balance to be struck, and I should be grateful for the Minister's comments.

From the general tenor of the debate so far, I wish to identify two areas of particular sensitivity. The first, to which nearly everyone has referred, is the inclusion agenda. The Government's programme of action tells us quite eloquently:

> Inclusion is a process, not a fixed state. The term can be used to mean many things, including the placement of pupils with SEN in mainstream schools, the participation of all pupils in the curriculum and social life of mainstream schools, the participation of all pupils in learning which leads to the highest possible level of achievement and the participation of young people in the full range of social experiences and opportunities once they have left school.

Try as I might, I find it impossible to disagree with the spirit behind any of those sentiments. However, difficulties may arise in their delivery.

Philippa Russell, known to some of us as the director for the Council for Disabled Children, has said that increasing inclusion will be challenging—a word which the Minister will know is occasionally used by officials to indicate a task that will require a great deal of work in Whitehall, rows with the Treasury and difficulties with the lawyers; however, that does not mean that we should not attempt to increase inclusion.

Another point, which was made well in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury and implicit in the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West, is that inclusion policies cannot be implemented on the cheap. If inclusion is to be appropriate, it may cost more in resources than continuing special schools. The test ought to be whether it is appropriate.

That brings us back to some important concerns. There is concern at the suggestion by some local educational authorities that they see little future need for special schools. They would like to impose an element of compulsion on inclusion. Some parents—not many—are over-protective of their children and expect too little from them. They do not realise the opportunities that may be available in mainstream education. The Government have, on the whole, been encouraging about the principle, and local education authorities that are worried about resources need to be imbued with an element of pragmatism and to recognise that special provision is needed for children who might be lost or vulnerable in mainstream schools, and/or have a clear need for specialist support.

In certain cases, with a bit of ingenuity and lateral thinking, we may be able to break out from the simple concept of one or the other. We may be able to provide an element of inclusion alongside extra support or special provision, as is often done in mainstream schools, or by including children from special schools in some activities. I hope that local authorities and schools will be flexible, and that the Government will disseminate good practice.

I should value the Minister's comments on the interaction between the special educational needs regime with which we are broadly familiar, and which is based, at least in concept, on the educational appraisal of the individual child, and the new agenda that will take a civil rights-based approach to disability rights. We all acknowledge that disabled pupils have a right to appropriate education. The converse is that their schools have a duty to make reasonable adjustments to accommodate them. Some adjustments, which require capital investment, are quite do-able, and others require special arrangements in the classroom. The difficulty with joining the two concepts arises where a statement, particularly one on which it is difficult to put a specific value, does not fit in with the legal concept of a right or a disability right. The Government have made it easier for themselves by indicating that they intend to deliver the disability right in education for pupils through the tribunal. That is with the difficult exception of further and higher education where, as I understand it, the courts will be involved in adjudication, as they might be where other issues of disability rights are involved.

There are also interesting and important resource implications where local education authorities may look to the Government to meet contingent commitments. I need hardly mention the huge cost to the national health service of liability claims—it exceeds £600 million a year. We have only just started on the disability rights agenda and it could be very expensive if matters are not handled well. I tabled a parliamentary question to register my concern that the original approach would not even evaluate the impact costs of these moves on further and higher education.

As with inclusion, we cannot offer disability rights on the cheap. There will be further resource implications, of a capital and current nature. The Government must face those and work out, with the local authorities, how to deal with them.

My final points concern the awkward interface between SEN provision and the wider social issues that are relevant to any inclusion agenda. We really need to improve the transitional provision from school to further education and past that, wherever possible, into work experience and work. It is generally conceded that the current practice is not ideal because local authorities do not always do what they are obliged to do under previous legislation. The Government need to ensure that the existing law is properly implemented as well as taking forward into law any improvements, such as those in the Learning and Skills Bill. In no sense is that a cop-out. We need to ensure that local authorities are doing what they are obliged to do and that any new duties are properly carried out. A lot of value is added if people can be properly assessed and passed from one stage of their provision to another as part of a proper plan.

We need to consider families and family units as a proper framework, as part of our wider approach to inclusion. There needs to be proper consultation with all relevant agencies and with the family as a whole, given the interaction and relationships between family members. For example, one child may be in mainstream education and have a sibling who is in specialist education. We need to be more sensitive to such issues.

A Member of Parliament is often the holistic bit of the jigsaw. Constituents who come to our surgeries may have three or four needs. The Member of Parliament sometimes functions as the sole agency, drawing those needs together and referring to the various pieces of the jigsaw. Families, pupils and parents need an approach that is centred on meeting their needs.

In conclusion, local authorities may sometimes view local children with special needs in terms of problems, resource centres and costs, but there are also huge opportunities. These are very special children and they deserve, as I think they will receive, our firm, warm-hearted and generous support.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Jacqui Smith): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) on securing a debate on a topic which all hon. Members agree is most important. I join him in paying tribute to the good work that is obviously going on at Ashley junior school in his constituency. Since taking up my post, I have been fortunate enough to visit many schools where excellent work is being done on such matters, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will pass on my congratulations to schools in his constituency.

Education of children with special educational needs was one of the first issues that the Government tackled after the general election in 1997. Within months, we published the Green Paper "Excellence for all Children: Meeting Special Educational Needs". We followed that up with an action programme, through which we have continued to work hard to establish a system to enable children with special educational needs to receive the education they need and deserve. That forms part of our overall drive to improve standards for all children. I hope that I shall be able both to respond to the points made by hon. Members and to highlight how, in practice, we are delivering what we said we would.

The hon. Member for New Forest, West asked about the specificity of statements. There is no absolute requirement that the educational provision to be made for a child should be specified in hours per week. However, in most cases, it will be necessary to set out the hours of help needed in order to comply with the requirements of section 324 of the Education Act 1996 and with the Education (Special Educational Needs) Regulations 1994.

The code of practice to which hon. Members referred indicates that provision should normally be specific, detailed and quantified; for example, for the hours of ancillary or specialist teaching support. Although some flexibility should be retained in order to meet the child's changing needs, it will be necessary, in many cases, to specify the hours of ancillary or specialist teaching support required for a child with a statement.

If an authority does not specify the hours when making a statement, the child's parents have the right of appeal to the SEN tribunal. The Secretary of State is able to consider taking action against an authority which maintains a blanket policy of not specifying such provision in a child's statement.

Concerns were expressed about statementing and the code of practice. The Department is currently engaged in revising the SEN code of practice, in close consultation with a specially convened sub-group of our national advisory group on special educational needs. As we explained in the action plan, the revised code focuses on guidance for SEN school-based provision in each phase of education, with an emphasis on the roles and responsibilities of all teachers in relation to children and young people with special educational needs.

Alongside the new code, we plan to publish a good practice guide that will help schools, LEAs and other agencies to improve the ways in which they meet the needs of children and young people. We shall also publish guidance on thresholds for the identification of pupils with special educational needs and on the range of provision that would be appropriate to meet those needs.

I share the concerns expressed by hon. Members that the code should not be seen as a rush to statement, if parents and schools are worried about what support will be offered to their children. I shall refer later to other measures that we are taking to support those children and their schools and families.

The hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) and my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) rightly raised their concern about the review of special educational needs provision currently under way in Gloucestershire. The hon. Member for Tewkesbury and I have been in communication on the issue, and I understand his anxiety about a particular school in his constituency. However, changes will continue to be made to school provision, both special and mainstream, in accordance with local needs and circumstances. That has always been true and was reflected in the remarks of both hon. Members. All hon. Members who have experienced changes in school provision in their constituencies are aware that such changes will always be difficult; they always raise considerable local concern which needs to be addressed.

LEAs cannot, of course, summarily close a special school; they must publish statutory proposals and, before doing so, must ensure that they have consulted all interested parties. Under the new arrangements, they have to refer those plans to the school's organisation committee, whose members are drawn from local groups with an understanding about the decisions to be taken. They can include members of the LEA, governors of local schools—at least one of whom should be a special school governor—the Church of England, the Roman Catholic Church, the Further Education Funding Council and other groups deemed relevant in the LEA area. If that committee is unable to reach a unanimous decision, it will pass the case to an independent adjudicator for determination. Notwithstanding the difficult decisions that will be made in Gloucestershire, I hope that hon. Members feel that the process at least allows their concerns to be reflected.

The Government's position was spelt out in our Green Paper. We are firmly committed to promoting inclusion by choice. That is a cornerstone of our strategy for raising standards of achievement and for meeting the educational needs of all children. We are determined to maintain progress on that matter, so that more parents feel confident that their child's needs can and will be met in a mainstream school.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud made the important point that the inclusion of children with special needs in mainstream schools would be beneficial not only for them, but—socially and educationally—for the other children in the school. That was proved by the hon. Member for New Forest, West when he highlighted the good work in a school in his constituency.

Our approach has been practical. The objective must be to safeguard the interests of all children. When parents want a mainstream setting for their children, our policy is to try to provide one. However, it is equally important to respect the right of parents to specialist provision, if that is what they want. We have underlined the point that specialist provision continues to play a vital role.

Inclusion is not an agenda for the closure of all special schools; it creates a challenge for the education system—often to find new roles for special schools and for specialist provision. In particular, we want such schools to become outward-looking centres of excellence and to work with their mainstream colleagues to help to support pupils who would benefit from a mainstream place. We are acting to support such collaboration between schools.

The hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) is right to point out that we must not only outline our objectives but ensure that we can deliver improvements for children with special educational needs. The importance that we attach to promoting inclusion is emphasised by a range of initiatives designed to help schools to develop their practice so as to become more inclusive. The initiatives offer practical solutions to enable schools to meet the challenge of providing for the needs of a more diverse range of pupils. They will also ensure that we maintain high-quality provision for all children with special educational needs and the other children who are learning alongside them.

The first of the practical approaches relates, as hon. Members have suggested, to funding. I strongly agree with the sentiment that the move to inclusion and to improving provision for special educational needs is not about saving money. That is why the extra £219 million in funding to schools that was announced in the March Budget will give schools the flexibility to use it to support all children and children with special educational needs. In particular, the money provides an extra £15,000 to each of the 62 non-maintained special schools.

We also are allocating £15 million this year from the SEN standards fund to support 100 innovative local inclusion and emotional and behavioural difficulty projects. That is nearly double the money that was available last year. Overall, the SEN standards fund has been raised from £35 million last year to £55 million this year, and the money is being used to support training, parent partnerships, pilot speech and language therapy projects and to help schools to prepare to become more inclusive.

Since 1997, 3,300 schools have benefited from the schools access initiative and the capital support available to make schools and the curriculum accessible to all pupils. That money has been increased to £30 million this year as part of a £100 million package over three years. The Department is funding the distribution of the index for inclusion to all schools and local authorities. That is a practical review tool to enable schools to examine what they need to do to become more inclusive, to increase participation and to raise standards not just for pupils with special educational needs but, as I stressed, for all pupils in school.

A special mainstream links working group is producing an interactive CD-ROM package aimed at teachers, showing how we can, as I suggested earlier, develop in a practical way the links between the specialist provision that remains and the mainstream sector. The package will be launched later this year at a series of seminars.

There is nearly £1 million to support the network of 11 SEN regional co-ordination projects that were mentioned by the hon. Member for Daventry. Since this April, they have covered the whole of England and they bring together all the local partners—health, social services, education, employment and the voluntary and private sectors—and they help to promote inclusion.

The projects aim to redress through collaborative planning and working the variations in access to, and the quality of, provision for pupils with special needs. They go some way to dealing with the concerns expressed by the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) about the need to ensure that we do not allow different authorities and sources of funding to isolate themselves so that they do not work together in the way that they should to provide the best of the whole package to children with such needs. I am more than happy to send the hon. Member for Daventry details about the work that the regional co-ordination projects currently undertake.

Rightly, we heard about the importance of involving and helping parents and about the frustrations that they sometimes feel. The importance of an effective partnership with parents was one of the key themes in the SEN programme for action. All local education authorities have been expected to provide parent partnership services from 1999. LEAs do not necessarily have to provide the services themselves: they can, and in many cases do, arrange for the services to be delivered by the voluntary sector and by organisations such as those highlighted by the hon. Member for New Forest, West. I strongly believe that it is important that LEAs look for good supportive provision in the voluntary sector that will work with them to support parents.

The aim of parent partnership services is to ensure that parents of children with special educational needs have access to information, advice and guidance on their children's needs so that they can make appropriate and informed decisions, in what, as has been pointed out, can be a stressful, difficult and emotional time. In 1999-2000, the Department supported expenditure of £6 million through the SEN standards fund to develop and expand such services. This year, we have doubled that to £12 million.

In relation to the concerns expressed about statements and the code of practice, the parent partnership services will be expected to ensure that parents of any children identified as having special educational needs—not just those with statements—should have access to an independent parental supporter. That goes some way to meeting the concern expressed that parents think that their child must have a statement before they receive the advice and support that they want.

Mr. Boswell: I sense that the Minister is beginning to draw her remarks to a conclusion. Before she does, will she tell us what has befallen the promised legislation?

Jacqui Smith: The hon. Gentleman will be pleased to learn that I was coming to that point.

The Department also funds the national parent partnership network that is operated by the Council for Disabled Children. It plays an important part in encouraging positive partnerships by providing information on existing services, distributing newsletters, arranging meetings, sharing good practice and exchanging information. The draft revised SEN code of practice to which I referred will include a new chapter on effective partnership working with parents. We intend to legislate on that subject as part of the planned SEN disability Bill that is designed to ensure that LEAs provide parent partnerships services and to replace the current arrangements for named persons that operate only in relation to children with statements.

In reply to the hon. Gentleman's question about the Bill, regrettably, it is not for me to decide the timetable for legislation. However, he will be aware that we have carried out consultation on our proposals in the Bill, and he raised important questions about how we intend to take forward the disability measures in it. Following the results of the consultation, we are committed not only to implementing the Bill but to implementing it in a way that delivers the changes that we all want. I think that hon. Members will agree that we should reflect the views expressed in trying to ensure that the Bill works. We are committed to the changes, but, as I said, I am not responsible for the parliamentary timetable.

I hope that hon. Members will accept from what I have said that we recognise that parents, teachers and children need support and reassurance on these issues. We are providing the funding, the renewed structure to the system, the support for teachers, the support for schools and the examples of good practice that will be necessary to ensure—as all hon. Members have emphasised—that we provide the best possible opportunities for all our children, and particularly for the special children whom we have considered today.

Sitting suspended.

Consumer Protection (Uno plc and World of Leather)

12.30 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South): I am grateful to have secured time for this important debate and to have the opportunity to speak on behalf of many colleagues who, like me, have been inundated with pleas for help and requests for assistance from many angry and confused constituents. Numbers affected in my constituency are relatively small, but the overall effect on individuals is considerable. The administrators have confirmed that approximately 21,000 people have been affected throughout the United Kingdom. With so many people involved, justification for this debate is self-evident.

As I go through events, I hope that the Minister for Trade, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn), will agree that there is a case for a thorough investigation of the relevant issues which, if mismanagement is established, may lead to the introduction of legislation to protect consumers who find themselves in similar circumstances. Two of the furniture stores traded in Lanarkshire, and, like me, my colleagues in neighbouring constituencies, my hon. Friends the Members for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood) and for Motherwell and Wishaw (Mr. Roy), have constituents who ordered and paid for furniture in part or in full. Those people now find themselves with little chance of receiving either their furniture or a refund of their hard-earned cash, leaving them with substantially reduced bank balances. The vast majority have been told that they will not receive a penny of compensation as they have little or no protection under current consumer laws.

However, the problem is not confined to Lanarkshire. As hon. Members can confirm, approximately 21,000 consumers throughout Scotland, England and Wales are affected by the closures of Uno plc and World of Leather plc. World of Leather was acquired by Uno in April 1997, and, between them, the two companies traded in 58 stores throughout the UK, 19 under the name of Uno and 39 under the name of World of Leather. In November, both companies issued a profit warning and announced a £6.06 million loss for the previous 26 weeks in, I understand, the London Gazette, a well-read journal in my constituency.

It is safe to say that the customers who continued to shop at both stores were totally unaware of the companies' perilous financial position. Had they known, I believe that they would never have parted with their money. Unsuspecting customers continued to order furniture between November and 14 March, the date on which the decision was made to close all Uno and World of Leather stores. In fact, they were encouraged to pay in full to qualify for substantial discounts or early deliveries. On the advice of a colleague, I visited a Uno store, but, fortunately, did not place an order. I was totally unaware of the company's financial difficulties, and I sincerely hope that my colleague was, too.

It has come to light that both companies sold off all their freehold properties prior to the appointment of the administrator in an attempt to address their liquidity problems. It is possible that about £11 million was raised, but I have no idea what it was used for, where it went or, indeed, how long it was between the sell-off and the appointment of the administrator. I am sure that the Minister could use his good offices to inquire into that.

During that period, I believe that purchasers for the companies were being actively sought. It is thought that detailed negotiations began with interested parties in December 1999: one set of negotiations involved the companies' main supplier and the other a proposed management buy-out. Unfortunately, negotiations broke down in early March and subsequent efforts to find another buyer were unsuccessful.

I do not know why the negotiations failed. It appears that the directors considered their options carefully and discussed the way forward with their professional advisers. On 8 March 2000, a separate bank account, known as the trust account, was established for consumers' cash and cheque deposits. However, cash and cheque deposits paid prior to that date were paid into the companies' overdrawn bank account and were not held in trust for the benefit of customers. If, at the time of the announced profit warning, the companies had set up a trust account, consumers would have been protected. Unfortunately, however, for the 21,000 customers, that is not the case.

Following the closure of all the stores on 14 March 2000, on 15 March, the High Court appointed Simon Allport, Alan Lewis and Richard Dixon Fleming of Arthur Andersen as joint administrators to the companies, and they became responsible for the management of the companies' affairs. I should like to place on record my thanks to Simon Allport, who has been extremely helpful. At my request, yesterday, with his colleagues, he attended a meeting in the House of Commons to brief Members. Those who attended agreed that the meeting was informative and worth while.

The administrators concluded that formal trading of the business was not viable for several reasons. The two companies owed a total of £3.2 million in rental payments on 24 March 2000, and salary payments of approximately £600,000 were due on 31 March 2000. Many customer deposits had been taken and there were related outstanding orders. Finally, substantial losses were being incurred by Uno.

Despite those and other difficulties, the sale of World of Leather as a going concern took place on 24 March. Thirty-two of its stores were transferred to the purchaser, a consortium of private individuals who, for whatever reason, decided to trade as New World of Leather. I think that that choice of name was unfortunate, as customers who were left high and dry by the closure of Uno and World of Leather could not understand why stock once owned and displayed by those companies was now being sold in the same stores under the name of New World of Leather. That was confusing for the many customers who ordered and paid for purchases from stock that is now back on sale. They cannot come to terms with losing their money and furniture while the stores are back in business and even employ the same employees as before. That is quite unacceptable.

As I said, the two companies had approximately 21,000 customer orders outstanding on the date of administration. Following representation on behalf of my constituents, the administrator told me that he was attempting to establish the position of individual customers' orders by reviewing the companies' records and identifying individual orders. He said that considerable work was involved, as the particulars of every outstanding order had to be analysed and the furniture held at the companies' storage locations had to be sorted, counted and allocated. It was necessary to ensure that all furniture stored in all sites could be identified and relocated to central storage units.

There was also a need to sort, count and trace from source documents all furniture that appeared to have been appropriated by individual customers, thus identifying all customer stock. All competing title claims to furniture, including customer stock, had to be resolved, which involved negotiation and resolution of legal issues with suppliers who had not been paid for furniture manufactured by them. I understand that that may end up in test court cases. Finally, negotiations with customer finance providers and credit card companies had to take place to permit the release of furniture.

After that exercise, approximately 2,400 items of customer stock were identified—compared with a possible total of 21,000 outstanding customer orders—and stored in distribution depots throughout the country, one of which was in Baillieston in Glasgow. My hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale and I gained access to that depot, checked our constituents' order numbers and identified their furniture. To his credit, the administrator had authorised the release of any furniture with a customer's name, address and order number, and three of my constituents were fortunate enough to obtain orders held in that depot.

The current position is that customers are likely to fall into three broad categories. Some are likely to receive their furniture because their order has been identified as customer stock. Others are likely to receive their order as the result of the administrator reaching an agreement with a third party on completing their order. Finally, some customers are unlikely to receive their order or have their money refunded, resulting in a claim against the companies for the amount paid. Unfortunately, however, those customers would be classed as unsecured creditors and are unlikely to receive any substantial return. Alternatively, depending on circumstances, they may have a claim against the credit card or finance company under the Consumer Credit Act 1974.

Is it any wonder that customers are extremely angry and are asking how companies can get away with what they believe is tantamount to fraud? They do not accept that there is nothing to be done in such circumstances and have asked that the Government take whatever action is necessary to prevent innocent people being ripped off in such a way in future. My constituents find it totally unacceptable and immoral that, on the same site where World of Leather and Uno previously traded, a new company trading under the name of New World of Leather is selling stock previously owned by World of Leather and Uno as bankrupt stock.

To return to the profit warning, it is clear that the announcement was known to those who knew where to look for such information. Was it just a coincidence that a private company of investors set up an organisation in November? I am sure that the Minister could explore that and confirm whether it is true. I am not suggesting any impropriety, but the Department of Trade and Industry must undertake a thorough investigation into the events surrounding the closure. There are many questions to be asked and answered.

According to a customer notice issued by the consumer and trading standards advice service in Hamilton to my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell and Wishaw and myself, the new company, MM&S, confirmed that the organisation acquired the display stock of Uno plc from the administrators on 24 March. The administrators have confirmed that part of the assets of World of Leather were sold to an independent consortium of private investors trading under such a title. The administrators further confirmed that no customer stock was sold as part of the sale agreement.

MM&S said in the customer notice that it had taken on some of the staff previously employed by the two companies, and went on to reassure customers who had lost their hard-earned savings that it had no connection with the previous owners. MM&S, now trading as New World of Leather, said that it would like further to reassure all customers that the staff were totally unaware of the financial state of Uno plc and World of Leather, whose collapse came as a complete and very nasty surprise, and resulted in significant loss of earnings for each and every one of them.

On that basis, the profit warning in November was unknown not only to consumers but to staff. Indeed, one of the employees—a manager—confirmed that. It is therefore essential that we revise how profit warnings are given, where they are published and how we maximise consumer awareness of the financial difficulties that companies may face.

This Government have a proud record of introducing legislation to ensure that consumers are protected—for example, the recent Utilities Bill. I do not accept that we should or can continue to allow consumers who buy goods in good faith to use their hard-earned savings only to find themselves in a similar situation to my constituents: simply being informed "It's just your bad luck" and given sympathy. They need and desire protection against sharp practices. That must be delivered by creating a fund or bond to compensate consumers in such circumstances. It is unacceptable simply to advise consumers that the Office of Fair Trading suggests avoiding paying in full for goods before receipt of them or, if paying a deposit in excess of £100, to consider using a credit card. Many of the consumers in my constituency do not have credit cards.

Since I was elected, I have constantly heard complaints from the Opposition about the amount of regulation that the Government are introducing. I make no apology in this instance for seeking more protection for my constituents and the 21,000 customers who feel that they have been ripped off. I seek a commitment from the Minister to investigate thoroughly all the issues and to introduce additional regulation if required in order to ensure proper consumer protection. On that basis, I ask the Minister to consider three changes to legislation.

First, a scheme similar to the bond scheme that operates for travel agents, which compensates consumers when a travel agent goes out of business, should be introduced. Secondly, a profit-warning notice should be given maximum coverage, especially in local publications. Thirdly, the DTI should agree to an extensive investigation of the facts and act on its findings. If the Minister examines events leading up to the closure of those companies, I believe that he will reach the same conclusion as my constituents and I and many hon. Members.

Mr. Keith Darvill (Upminster): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) on securing this debate. I should like to emphasise concerns across the country. Although he represents a Scottish constituency, while I represent an east London constituency, many of my constituents have raised similar problems. Some of them have lost—or are looking like they will lose—more than £3,000 in deposits. Others may have to rely on chance to receive their suites of furniture on the retention of titled clauses.

I emphasise the need for stronger consumer protection in this area, similar to that in the travel industry, where consumers pay such large deposits. We need a thorough investigation into the matter because the companies to which my hon. Friend referred clearly encountered financial difficulties some time ago, and because consumers were clearly unaware of that and unable to protect themselves.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Richard Caborn): First, I apologise to you, Mr. Jones, and to the House for being half a minute late. I was trying to get some information from the stock exchange, which I was not able to get but will pass on when I eventually do so. If I do not complete my speech, I will write to my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan), probably depositing that letter in the Library. Some 21,000 people have been affected by the matter and it is therefore important that we provide as much information as possible, although some of it will be an interim response.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South on securing this debate. I am very sorry to learn of the difficulties faced by customers who may lose money that they have paid for furniture ordered from the 58 furniture stores throughout the country. I assure him that some of my constituents have been hit, too; there are complaints in my postbag just as there have been in his. Many of those affected can ill afford to lose the sums that they paid, which in some cases was in excess of £2,000.

Before addressing the issues, let me confirm the facts as we know them. Administration orders were made against Uno plc and its wholly owned subsidiary, World of Leather plc, on 15 March 2000 on the petition of their directors. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South said, three partners in Arthur Andersen were appointed as administrators. The objective of the administration was to secure the survival of the companies as an on-going concern or, if that was not possible, to sell the assets at an enhanced value.

As my hon. Friend knows, achieving the former objective was not possible, so the assets, comprising premises, showroom stock and the order book for potentially profitable contracts, were sold to New World of Leather. The administrators have a duty to sell assets at the best value. I understand that the assets were sold to the New World of Leather Ltd. partnership, which was formed after the date of the administration's appointment. A separate company, New World of Leather Ltd., which is part of the group, was formed in November 1999 under the name MM&S (2599) Ltd. It is quite possible that that company was acquired off the shelf from company formation agents.

The potentially profitable orders to which I referred represented a small proportion of the total. Generally, they are orders on which only a small deposit was paid, and most were placed with World of Leather, not Uno. None of the directors of Uno or World of Leather is a director of the new company.

I understand that the administrators will be calling a meeting of creditors in mid-June to vote on the administrators' proposals on the companies' affairs. Generally speaking, an administrator is not permitted to distribute funds among creditors. That will occur by placing the companies in liquidation in due course.

Officials have obtained information from the administrators about the prospects of customers obtaining goods that they have ordered and paid for in whole or in part. As I said, about 21,000 customers are in that position. Broadly speaking, customers fall into one of three categories. First, there are customers whose furniture has been manufactured and delivered to Uno or World of Leather. Secondly, there are customers, mainly of World of Leather, who have paid a small deposit and consequently whose orders may still be fulfilled profitably. New World of Leather has acquired such orders. Thirdly, there are customers who fall into neither of those categories. They are unsecured creditors.

The position is complicated by the fact that most suppliers to Uno and World of Leather sold goods to them under terms whereby they retain the title of the goods until they are paid for in full and by the fact that some of the furniture appropriated to customer orders is in commercial warehouses, which may exercise liens on goods stored with them for unpaid costs. That means that it is unsafe to make definitive statements about any customer order until all the relevant circumstances have been investigated.

When companies are placed in liquidation, the order of distribution of assets will be determined by insolvency law. The Crown has certain preferential rights, but only for taxes that the company will have collected and should have paid, such as PAYE and VAT, and then only to certain limits. Employees also enjoy preferential rights for sums due to them, but, again, they are limited. I shall return to preferential rights later.

A question that I am sure is running through the minds of customers and hon. Members is what action might be taken if misconduct by Uno's directors is discovered. Although the Insolvency Service has no power under the Insolvency Act 1986 to investigate the affairs of a company in administration or any regulatory role in relation to one, the administrators have a duty under the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986 to report to the Secretary of State if they form the view that the conduct of any of Uno's directors makes them unfit to be involved in the management of a company. I am sure that, in preparing their report, the administrators will be at pains to establish the causes of the failure of both companies.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Clydesdale): I am listening carefully to my right hon. Friend's response and, if he does not mind my saying so, the legal rhetoric. Let us be clear that, from our constituents' point of view, and ours, we are talking about corporate robbery, and I want him to tell us what will be done about it. There may be an inquiry further down the line, but we and the 21,000 creditors who have been robbed by the company want some answers. Where are the directors now and what are they doing? What influence did they have? If they are not still directors of the company, are members of their family or their friends involved in it? We would like him to tell us that there will be an inquiry.

Mr. Barry Jones (in the Chair): Order. Interventions must be brief.

Mr. Caborn: Thank you, Mr. Jones. I hope to cover some of those matters. If I had had notice of those questions, I might have been able to answer them, but I cannot at the moment.

I cannot anticipate whether the administrators will make such a report, but, if they do, the Secretary of State has the power to apply to the court for a disqualification order against the director concerned if he believes that it would be in the public interest to do so. That partly answers my hon. Friend's questions. The court may take into account the extent of a director's responsibility for any failure by the company to supply goods or services that have been paid for in whole or in part—in other words, deposits and pre-payments.

On 4 November 1999, more than four months before the administrators were appointed, Uno made a trading statement warning that results for the year to April 2000 were of market expectations. I understand that publicity given to such a statement is covered by chapter 9.2 of the listing rules: a listed company is required to notify the company announcements officer of the London stock exchange, which makes the information publicly available. In addition, it must notify shareholders, either by sending them a copy of the statement or by placing a copy in the national newspapers.

My Department also has investigatory powers under the Companies Act 1985. They are exercised if there is good reason to do so, but they are not used to duplicate investigation efforts elsewhere. We considered Uno plc for investigation, but took the view that administrators were already in place and were alert to their duty to report misconduct, so we do not plan to investigate at present. That stance will be reviewed if circumstances change.

An administrator has powers under insolvency law to apply to the court to reverse any payments made by the company that amount to preferences to certain creditors or transactions that are undervalued. The wrongful trading provision in the Insolvency Act 1986—which enables a court, on application, to make a director personally liable if he permits a company to continue trading while insolvent—applies only to a company in liquidation, as does the provision whereby a director may be made liable to contribute to a company's assets if fraudulent trading is proved to the court's satisfaction.

Hon. Members will want me to address the question of whether, if nothing can be done to help the customers of World of Leather, the law could be changed to avoid a repetition of the position in which customers of World of Leather find themselves. The Government's view is that any attempt to protect consumers by removing existing preferential rights or, indeed, extending preferential rights to consumers in an insolvency case would not achieve adequate protection of customer deposits and pre-payments because it would not overcome the fundamental problem that, in many insolvencies, there are simply insufficient assets to go round, even for preferential creditors.

Mr. Desmond Browne (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): On possible changes to the law, what is my right hon. Friend's response to the not unreasonable suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) that, in the particular circumstances of the credit retail business, information about the insolvency or the trading circumstances of a business should be advertised in publications that circulate in the area where that business trades so that potential customers might know what the stock exchange and the limited number of readers of the London Gazette know?

Mr. Caborn: That is a very valid point. I was late arriving at the House today because I was trying to find out exactly what had gone on with the stock exchange. It could be argued that rights are given to shareholders, but not to customers, which needs to be investigated. I was trying to find out for hon. Members whether the public had been informed and, if so, exactly how. I cannot answer that question now, but, as soon as I receive that information from the stock exchange, I will write to my hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. Browne) and put it on the public record. We might have to look at such matters when we discuss the consumer affairs White Paper.

Changing such rights would constitute an attempt to close the stable door after the horse has bolted. If protection were to be afforded to advance payments by consumers, it would have to operate when the payment was made. There are good policy reasons for not extending the ranks of preferential creditors. To do so would lead to demands from other categories of creditor who could advance an equally strong claim. For example, subcontractors could argue that moneys due to them by main contractors should be granted preferential status. To accede to any such requests would open the floodgates and lead to a general extension of preferential rights. That would be contrary to policy under the Insolvency Act 1986, which is to reduce preferential claims as far as possible. Time is running out, but I assure hon. Members that I will put in writing the information that I would have given them had I been able to do so.

It has been suggested that the Government should provide some means of compensation for consumers when firms fail. For example, there could be a statutory requirement on retailers to protect consumers' deposits and pre-payments generally by placing them in a bond—which was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South—or a trust account until the contract is fulfilled, or we could make retailers take out insurance. However, while that might well be effective, it would all have to be enforced, and that would be costly. Inevitably, the additional costs on business would be passed on to consumers generally in the form of higher prices. All consumers would pay, but relatively few would benefit. A small business might find it increasingly difficult to trade, especially because of the loss to its cash flow. On balance, therefore, that approach would not be a viable solution to the problem.

Mr. Charles Wardle (Bexhill and Battle): I am grateful for the opportunity to draw attention to what appear to be serious irregularities on the part of the immigration service in the way in which the renewal of the contract for the escort of persons to be removed from the United Kingdom under the Immigration Act 1971 was conducted. I shall also refer to allegations of unacceptably late payments by the IS of money requested in invoices, involving delays of up to four years. I shall cite evidence of administrative chaos, and the failure of the IS to keep records of removals.

These matters were drawn to my attention by Mr. Barry Southon, who lives at Broadoak, Brede, in my constituency. He is the proprietor of Airline Security Consultants Ltd. ASC has worked for the IS for some 18 years. In this debate, I shall rely on what Mr. Southon has told me and shown me, which I take to be entirely sound.

At the outset, I should declare a past interest. I served as an Immigration Minister in the Home Office during the previous Parliament. I did not meet Mr. Southon in that capacity, however; I first encountered him when he came to one of my constituency advice surgeries in February this year.

I have the highest regard for the hard work and dedication shown by men and women in the IS, who must frequently operate in trying conditions. If, on some occasions in the past, I have expressed reservations about the management calibre of some senior officials in the immigration and nationality directorate, as it now is, that does not detract from my esteem for the achievements of rank-and-file members of the IS. However, none of that prevents me from putting the spotlight on what appears to show carelessness and malpractice on the part of a very few officials during the tender for the new escort contract.

I hope that, following this debate, the points that I raise will be investigated more closely, not only by the Minister—to whom I have already written—but by the National Audit Office. I asked the Comptroller and Auditor General for a copy of the Public Services Contract Regulations 1993 in connection with the debate, and I intend in due course to draw to his attention what I have said today.

Mr. Southon tells me that, since he began working under contract to the IS in 1982, he has been personally involved in the escorted removal of more than 4,000 people from the UK. I am not aware of any significant criticism by the IS of the way in which ASC has operated during that period; indeed, I have been told that, in 18 years, only nine complaints have been made about ASC, all of which proved on further investigation to be without foundation. In contrast, I have seen copies of many commendations of ASC, from the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), directors, an inspector, training teams, chief immigration officers and immigration officers. All have praised the company. Some of the most recent letters of commendation have expressed downright surprise that such an experienced team should be dropped at the very time when the British public looks to the IS to increase its effectiveness in removing immigration offenders.

Over the years since 1982, ASC has developed a highly efficient service in which security and medical escorts have been made available at just two hours' notice, together with a secure vehicle with airside access when required. Until 1994, it was the sole provider of escorted removals to the IS, but, following a written question tabled in 1994 by the Minister of State, Home Office, the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche), who will reply to the debate—she was then an Opposition Member, and I was the Minister—a second escort company, Loss Prevention International, was taken on at the instigation of a procurement official, Mr. Paul Quibell. From then on, ASC handled about 80 per cent. of the work and LPI about 20 per cent.

In 1996, ASC—presumably along with LPI—participated in a tender for renewal of the escort service contract, but, for some unexplained reason, that tender competition was never completed. It was eventually abandoned three years later, in July 1999. At that juncture, ASC was asked to re-tender, which it did, by submitting an 83-page document by the due date of 9 November last year. The result of the new tender was to be announced on 20 December, although, in fact, no such announcement was made on that date.

Only one of the companies that tendered in November was called in for a clarification meeting with the IS. That was the eventual winner, LPI, whose representatives met Mr. Hassett and other officials in Croydon on 13 December when, it is alleged, they were told that they had been successful. That was a week before the designated date for the announcement of the winner.

On 20 January, a month after the date on which the result of the tender process should have been announced, Mr. Hassett spoke to Mr. Southon on the telephone and confirmed that the contract had indeed been awarded to LPI. Mr. Hassett said that another bidder, Reliance, had been placed second, ahead of ASC. A meeting was arranged for 26 January, at which Mr. Quibell gave his reasons why ASC's tender offer had not succeeded. He said that ASC had, in particular, fallen short on standards of quality and training.

At the meeting, Mr. Quibell denied that LPI had been told on 13 December that it had won the contract, but, in his letter of 21 February to Mr. Southon's solicitor, he appears to have changed his position. In that letter, Mr. Quibell admitted that > we had already . . . selected LPI as the contractor we proposed to appoint prior to calling the company in for . . . further discussion . . ; LPI attended a meeting with us on 13 December to clarify a number of points . . . in order to allow us to proceed to award the contract.

In that letter, Mr. Quibell said that the successful tender offer by LPI and the second-placed tenderer, Reliance, had set out a much more extensive package of training and a more comprehensive management structure. He said that the quality of systems and procedures offered by both those companies were supported by current accreditation to ISO 9002. What he did not say was that LPI's and Reliance's ISO 9002 accreditation was for activities other than deportations. The only company working for full accreditation for deportation is ASC, and the only reason for a delay in ASC's accreditation for that task is that the Home Office has refused to give the accreditation body permission to observe a removal by ASC. That was confirmed when I saw a fax from National Quality Assurance Ltd.'s regional office in London saying precisely that.

Mr. Quibell's allegation that ASC fell short of its competitors' training standards is, to say the least, strange. On 26 January, Messrs Quibell and Hassett claimed that ASC had afforded only a six-day training course, with no monitoring of staff or acceptance testing. They could not have read ASC's tender document very carefully. That document makes it clear on page 9 that the initial six days of induction training will be followed by operational training, to be conducted by experienced staff and recognised outside instructors. Pages 12 and 13 outline no fewer than 28 aspects of the on-going training sessions, and make it clear that great emphasis will be placed on training on the job. ASC should know how to train better than anyone else, as it is the only company with a sustained track record in the business.

Pages 41 and 43 of ASC's tender document show what training is to follow the induction course. Pages 23 and 45 describe performance monitoring, and the on-going assessment of escorts; pages 32, 49 and 50 explain how staffing levels will be adjusted to cope with the expected increase in the volume of work. Mr. Quibell and his colleagues were entirely wrong to suggest that the ASC tender document had nothing to say on that point.

Equally wrong was the assertion by the IS that ASC had failed to ensure that escorts would identify themselves properly. Pages 36 and 50 make clear precisely how escorts are to do that. Equally inaccurate was the IS's suggestion that ASC had ignored questions of quality and the issue of Investors in People. ASC's quality policy and the commitment to Investors in People is set out on page 5 of the tender document; similarly, page 11 sets out in detail ASC's security plan, and page 61, together with the letter at appendix 5, confirms that ASC has the ability to increase its insurance cover.

For all those reasons, the objections to ASC wheeled out by the IS simply do not stack up. Even if we assume for the sake of argument that LPI and Reliance had demonstrated a greater thoroughness than ASC in their plans, it is not good enough for the IS to claim that ASC did not have a detailed plan in its tender document when it certainly had precisely that.

As I have said, I wrote to the Minister earlier this month. I imagine that she has by now been able to compare the three tender documents from LPI, Reliance and ASC in the unamended form in which they were presented on or before 9 November last year. I hope that she will agree that it would be appropriate now for the NAO to examine those three documents, too. As I have said, it is something that I shall ask the CAG to do.

If the discrepancy between IS officials' criticism of ASC's tender document and the reality of what that document contains is not serious enough, there are other warning signals from the tender, about which the Chamber should be aware. The first concerns Reliance, which was placed second in the tender process. In 1995, the IS raided the offices of Reliance and found that no fewer than 15 of its employees were illegal immigrants. The Minister will, I hope, be able to explain why, under those circumstances, Reliance was placed second.

[Mr. Charles Wardle]

As for LPI, IS officials will no doubt have alerted the Minister to the controversy in which that company became embroiled over stowaways on a Nigerian-flagged vessel in Lagos harbour some years ago. Equally, I feel confident that she will have been informed of the occasion a few years ago when LPI used four escorts for a removal to Sierra Leone. The immigration offender being removed was put under sedation by LPI and was delivered unconscious at Freetown. None of LPI's four escorts on that case was medically qualified. All four were detained in Freetown for a week for questioning.

I have no doubt that the Home Office will have on its files the latest accounts for LPI and will be aware that, as recently as the 1997 financial year, it appeared to be insolvent. When the Minister replies, I hope that she will be able to assure the Chamber that she has examined its latest accounts and can confirm a substantial increase in capital since the end of that financial year.

ASC is not insolvent. I am assured that it has never traded while insolvent, although no thanks for that are due to the Home Office, which has an appalling record of delays in payments and non-payments of invoices due to ASC.

In the past, ASC regularly had monthly meetings in Croydon. Almost every time, the issue at the top of the agenda was slow payment. Some of the invoices have been outstanding for four years before payment has been made. The delays have had nothing to do with queries on the content of those invoices. At one time, the debt owed by the Home Office to ASC was about £250,000.

In 1997, ASC was not paid anything for four months because of a Paymaster General dispute in Liverpool, yet, at the same time, it paid more than £90,000 in VAT on invoices for which it had not received a penny from the Home Office. Repeated requests to the IS did not result in payment.

ASC claims, for example, that, if it had been able to charge interest on late payment from the Home Office prior to November 1988 in the manner subsequently required by legislation, it would have been able to claim an extra £400,000. That is the extent of the inefficiency and muddle over finances into which the Home Office appears to have got itself over a period of years. I hope that that has been remedied.

There has been an equally unsatisfactory muddle over records that the IS is supposed to have maintained concerning the removal of immigration offenders. Mr. Southon has assured me that, whenever Members tabled questions about the number of people removed, the IS had to seek urgent answers from ASC because there were no in-house records of its own on which it could rely.

I turn to a particularly disturbing facet of the run-up to the tender offer. I am told that an LPI director, whose name I can provide to both the Minister and, if I am asked to do so, the NAO, regularly entertained IS staff at Harmondsworth. I have been given the names of the IS staff who were entertained and offered other inducements. I am assured that ASC is willing to provide an affidavit to support that allegation.

The IS officials who were entertained told ASC that they were looked after by LPI and asked whether ASC was willing to do the same. Specifically, they asked whether ASC would "weigh in too." Mr. Southon tells me that he refused point blank, but after he did so the work placed with ASC from Harmondsworth declined noticeably. I am unwilling—I am sure that the Minister will agree with this—to name in the Chamber officials who are the subject of those allegations, but I shall provide their names to the Minister and to the NAO if required to do so.

I have been alerted to reports that a former senior enforcement official at the IS has joined the board of LPI, since when that company appears to have gained favour, despite its modest track record and past inadequate capitalisation. I worked with that individual when I was at the Home Office and had no complaints about him. Nevertheless, it is said on the Home Office grapevine and among reputable home affairs press correspondents that, following that person's retirement, he secured for himself an unusual assignment in Russia, where, it is said, he produced a highly original guidance manual for clients about ways in which they might obtain entry into the UK with the minimum difficulty.

Two experienced journalists have related that story to me over the past year, but I did not feel that there was sufficient hard evidence from what I was told to raise the matter with Ministers then. In view of that official's involvement with LPI now, and LPI's success in the tender offer in the face of an apparent shut-out of so much of the ASC tender document, all those things now must surely merit closer investigation.

I have been informed that, on 2 March, at a meeting in Dover, the director of the immigration and nationality directorate, Ms Collins, was asked why the contract had been awarded to LPI instead of ASC. I understand that she seemed unaware that LPI had obtained the contract. That was more than two and a half months after LPI had been told of its success and a month and a half after ASC had been informed that it had lost out. I remind the Chamber of my past criticism of management performance among senior officials at the Home Office. That seems to be yet another clear example of an abysmal lack of communications.

I point out a frustrating catch-22 situation in which ASC has been placed following its failure to secure the contract. Mr. Quibell has told Mr. Southon that, where a carrier—for example, an airline or ferry company—brings an illegal immigrant into the UK, that carrier is now responsible for the removal of that immigration offender. Historically, the IS has arranged for the deportation and then invoiced the carrier for the costs. Mr. Quibell has said to Mr. Southon that, as from April this year, under new legislation, carriers have had to contract directly with escort companies for the removal of those offenders.

Mr. Quibell went on to say that, although the main IS contract had been awarded to LPI, he hoped that ASC would still carry out carriers liability removals under the new arrangements. To be able to provide that service to the carriers, ASC needs sponsorship from the IS to obtain airside passes, but Mr. Quibell has said that IS sponsorship of such airside clearance can no longer be made available. Thus, with that catch-22 situation, ASC finds that insult has been added to injury.

Under all those circumstances, I hope that the Minister will review as a matter of urgency the conduct of the tender procedure. I am sure that she will appreciate how important it is that ASC and the wider public receive an explanation of why there appear to be so many anomalies between what IS officials said on 26 January, what Mr. Quibell wrote in his letter of 21 February and the reality of the content of the ASC tender document.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mrs. Barbara Roche): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Mr. Wardle) for providing me with an opportunity to set the record straight about the award of the overseas escorting contract. I remember when I was in opposition asking a number of questions and taking an interest in that area of work. We now find ourselves in different roles on the subject.

It may be helpful if I say why it is necessary for us to escort some people overseas and why it was necessary to retender the contract. The immigration service and the immigration and nationality directorate remove about 39,000 people per year from the United Kingdom. Most people who are directed to leave accept that they must do so, but a small minority—around 600—must be escorted to ensure that they reach their destination. The majority of those escorts are for security reasons.

For more than six years, the overseas escort service has been provided by two suppliers: Airline Security Consultants and Loss Prevention International. ASC has provided the service for considerably longer than LPI, as the hon. Gentleman said. Owing to the new regulations specified in the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, it will be necessary for escorting staff to be certified as fit and proper persons to conduct escorts under the arrangements set out in the Act. Existing contracts did not provide a satisfactory platform to achieve that; nor was it possible to demonstrate that the Home Office was getting best value for money or proper continuity of service by using those arrangements.

Consequently, and following an investigation and recommendation by the National Audit Office, it was decided to hold a competition last year for the provision of an overseas escorting service by one contractor. That was done on the basis of what the NAO had to say. Both ASC and LPI, which had previously been providing escort services, were aware that that would happen, and they participated in the competition.

The hon. Gentleman has made some allegations about LPI. I understand from the brief advice that I have taken that, at this stage, we have no knowledge of these accusations. However, I shall investigate his allegations and write to him.

The competition was run in accordance with the Public Services Contract Regulations 1993, using the restricted procedure. The contract was initially advertised in the Official Journal of the European Communities and also in Government Opportunities. As a result of the advertisement, eight companies were invited to submit tenders, although two of these subsequently withdrew from the competition. Of the six remaining tenders, LPI's was judged to be the best, in that it offered the most economically advantage proposal with both the best technical solution and best overall value for money to the taxpayer.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the sequence of events. Although it was hoped to announce the results of the tender on 20 December 1999, there were a number of practical issues to be resolved before the contract could be signed. These included confirmation that the insurance meeting our full requirements was in place. All matters were resolved and a decision was finally taken and notified to tenderers in writing on 17 January 2000. The contract was finally signed on 8 March. As the hon. Gentleman knows from his past experience and from his present position in the House, such decisions are taken by officials and Ministers are informed. I wish to make it clear that I had no part in the decision-making process.

The hon. Gentleman has suggested that the competition for the contract was not handled properly. I shall carefully examine his remarks when they appear in Hansard tomorrow. I can say only that, from the information that is before me, the procedures were fully complied with under the Public Services Contract Regulations 1993. The competition also had independent oversight from the Home Office procurement unit and the Treasury Solicitor, and both are completely satisfied with the process. That is important because those bodies are in place to make checks and balances. The hon. Gentleman will know that all our procurement procedures are subject to audit.

The hon. Gentleman has mentioned, as has ASC, that the company does not believe that the tender documents were properly scrutinised. There was the example of staff training. I am advised that the training proposals submitted by ASC with the tender were inadequate. It was only at a subsequent meeting on 26 January 2000 that ASC suggested that the training proposals were only indicative and represented one week of a programme of several weeks. It was alleged by ASC that the tender had not been read properly, but it was unable to show in its documentation any details about the further expansion of the one-week example into a full programme.

Mr. Wardle: I am acutely aware that I have taken more than my share of time, but may I say that I fully understand that the Minister was not involved in the procedure? I hope that she will find time to study the contracts, because that is what I shall be asking the Comptroller and Auditor General to do as well. I have no idea whether he will do that, but it would be a great help if the hon. Lady were to examine them.

Mrs. Roche: I shall examine what the hon. Gentleman has said when his remarks appear in the record.

The evaluation process cannot be expected to take account of things which might or might not be intended. It can take account only of the contents of the documentation.

The hon. Gentleman has raised extremely serious matters, and I want to deal with them in the time that is available to me. He implies that there has been some misconduct in the relationship between IND officials and ASC and LPI. Similar implications were contained in a letter from ASC's solicitors dated 7 March, in which it is alleged that two members of staff had been socialising with LPI directors. I take such allegations extremely seriously. The two members of staff concerned deny the implications absolutely.

We asked the solicitors to provide specific details so that the matter could be investigated. To date, more than two months later, they have not done so, and I take great exception to that. If the hon. Gentleman is able to provide specific examples, I will ensure that there is an investigation. As I have said, these are serious allegations.

Mention has been made of a retired director of the immigration service. Again, serious allegations were made by the hon. Gentleman. I am informed that the retired director's appointment had no direct bearing on the decision to award LPI the contract. He did not attend any of the meetings with LPI and made no contact with officials responsible for the procurement process. As I have said, it was run under the 1993 regulations.

The hon. Gentleman made other allegations, which I heard for the first time. He repeated gossip. These are serious matters to raise on what is effectively the Floor of the House. As he is entitled to do, he raised them with the protection of privilege. I will consider the allegations. If he has any evidence to show, I will ensure that a proper investigation is conducted.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned late payment and the relevant legislation. I am responsible for it because I campaigned for its introduction when in opposition. It was one of the measures that I took through the House when I had the privilege to be a Department of Trade and Industry Minister. The hon. Gentleman will recall that I was critical of late payment by government, and made it a feature of what I was doing in opposition. I have in mind particularly the record of the previous Government, of whom the hon. Gentleman was a member. I am assured that payment practices, which were not good in the past, have improved dramatically. That is important.

It is important also for us to place arrangements for escorting people away from the United Kingdom on a better contractual basis. That is what we have sought to do. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the knowledge of senior management in terms of the contract. It was known at senior levels of management that the contract had been placed. The hon. Gentleman suggested that, in regard to accreditation, ASC was placed in not as good a position as the other companies. That is certainly not the case. On the basis of the information that I have seen, I can reassure the hon. Gentleman and the House on that point.

Given what I have seen so far and what has been presented to me—it was seen by the relevant bodies, including the Treasury—everything was done to meet the bona fides of the process. I shall carefully examine the record to ascertain what was said. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible. However, it is incumbent on him and on those who have provided him with information to provide that information, rather than merely making allegations—

Mr. Barry Jones (in the Chair): Order. Time is up.

Shipbuilding

1.30 pm

Mr. Mohammad Sarwar (Glasgow, Govan): I am grateful for the opportunity to debate the future of British shipbuilding. Events in recent weeks have given the debate great relevance, particularly for workers at the Govan shipyard in my constituency.

United Kingdom shipbuilding has a proud past and a rich heritage. Britain's empire and wealth were based on our shipyards employing huge work forces. The Clyde yards in particular were pioneers of innovation and shipbuilders of quality. The first iron ships for the British Navy were built in Govan. At one stage, one sixth of the world's shipping was launched from Clydeside berths.

However, the present day has seen an industry in decline for a number of years. It is now readying itself to meet the challenges of the new millennium. Up to 30,000 people are directly employed in shipbuilding, repair and conversion, and an estimated 50,000 are employed by subcontractors, suppliers and support industries. United Kingdom yards now compete strongly for orders, with up to 30 vessels being built annually. Our capacity allows us to build almost as much again.

Shipbuilding and ship repair work generates £2.6 billion per annum in Britain. In facing new challenges head on, our industry is gaining a reputation for repair and conversion work. Conversion is increasingly seen as a genuine alternative to new building. Europe has about 40 per cent. of the world market, with the UK among the top three converters in Europe.

Our industry knows that it can shape its own future. Market conditions can be influenced, and Britain's shipbuilders are seeking new opportunities for work in an intense marketplace. They are changing practices and influencing policies that help the industry to improve its competitiveness in the world market.

I praise the work of the Minister's predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle), in instigating the shipbuilding forum. Only a Labour Government would have established the shipbuilding forum and the Scottish shipbuilding forum within months of taking office, bringing the Government, the unions and the industry together to make real progress in British shipbuilding. It has provided real support to the industry, and encouraged practical recommendations that benefit shipbuilding in the United Kingdom. It has also facilitated broad co-operation between shipbuilders, the Shipbuilders and Shiprepairers Association, the British Marine Equipment Association and the Chamber of Shipping.

The Minister will recognise the value of continued co-operation in the forum in allowing the industry to flourish in the future. The nature of competition faced by British shipbuilders will shape the future for our shipyards. I urge the Minister to remain responsive to the concerns of Britain's shipbuilders about our direct competition in Europe. While I recognise that significant work has been done by the European Commission to remove barriers to fair competition across the European Union, it is important for our own industry to remain vigilant and to work closely with the Government when there is perceived unfairness through hidden subsidies on the continent.

I welcome the increased co-operation at British level, through the SSA, to promote the industry as being at the cutting edge of technology and innovation. Shipbuilding is a high-tech industry that combines the most advanced technologies in production and operation. Our shipyards have a key role in a knowledge-driven economy. They have a proud heritage of achievement, but they will have a future only if they work together across the board to increase productivity and to remain the most advanced shipbuilders in the world.

Operating aid granted under the shipbuilding regulations will be essential for the industry across Europe in the current global market. The second report of the European Commission to the Council of Ministers on the situation in world shipbuilding has proved that Korean yards continue selling new ships at prices that do not cover their cost. Those predatory practices undermine the market.

Last year, South Korea succeeded in replacing Japan as the world leader for incoming orders. The agreed minutes in April of discussions between the European Commission and South Korea offer a real opportunity for fair competition, and address problems in tariff practices and financial transparency. That followed hard negotiations and an ultimatum requiring South Korea to bring its shipbuilding prices into line or face action before the World Trade Organisation. The agreed minutes are clearly a step towards solving the problem, but the solution requires a level playing field in the market. Market conditions will not change dramatically overnight, but it will soon become apparent whether the South Korean Government intend to introduce fair competition or are simply trying to win time for their yards.

I hope that the Minister will outline the Government's position on British shipbuilders co-operating with European competitors in the preparation of a case to bring before the WTO, so as to safeguard against the eventuality of no change in Korea. A watchful eye must be kept on Korean ship prices and the pervasive influence of Government-controlled banks on Korean shipbuilding. We must all hope for fair competition to prevail. There may be the prospect of a multilateral agreement through the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development being initiated—an agreement that even the United States may no longer be restrained from ratifying.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and my hon. Friend the Minister for Competitiveness have made it clear that they will work with the shipbuilding industry to help it to improve its competitiveness and to win orders. The Government have demonstrated a strong belief that the shipbuilding industry has a future as a modern and dynamic part of the manufacturing sector. There has been improved financial support for shipbuilding, with changes made to the home shipbuilding credit guarantees scheme. I appreciate the successful efforts of the Minister in that regard.

The shipbuilding intervention fund has been extended to previously excluded yards such as Ailsa Troon on the Ayrshire coast. Conversion contracts previously excluded from support have also seen support extended, as the British industry develops a reputation in Europe for conversions. The Government positively encourage increased productivity. Companies are no longer punished by reduced financial support if they reduce their costs. That is a great benefit to well-run shipbuilders across the UK.

New investment has been encouraged, particularly in research and development, which is the clearest way of investing in the industry's future. The shipbuilding intervention fund now allows a 9 per cent. profit element. By no longer basing the grant on break-even basis, we have been able successfully to secure new orders for our shipyards.

Cammell Laird recently won the largest cruise liner conversion ever, worth £57 million. The north-east yard will also build the first vessel on the Tyne in six years. Harland and Wolff worked closely with Government Departments and agencies under great pressure to secure for the work force a conditional contract for four sophisticated RoPax ferries worth £300 million.

In addition to the threat over Harland and Wolff being lifted, Appledore in Devon earlier this month lifted notices on 300 workers following an order. That is good news for British shipbuilding.

The Minister has been attentive to the concerns of the industry over the ending of intervention fund money this year. While the fund did not always help to make our yards competitive, it continues to offer useful short-term assistance for our shipbuilders. Shipyards across the UK now have the common goal of improving productivity to increase competitiveness.

Defence orders are vital to UK shipbuilding, as can be seen at places such as Scotstoun, which is the biggest shipbuilder in Scotland, working solely on naval vessels. It must be stressed that maintaining shipbuilding capacity is also vital to our modern defence strategy, as was shown most recently in the Government's response to the crisis in Sierra Leone. The Amphibious Ready Group was dispatched, including the helicopter carrier HMS Ocean, which was constructed in Govan. HMS Ocean is an excellent example of Clyde-built quality and Govan's commercial build methods.

The yard operates as Britain's biggest merchant shipbuilder and has great flexibility—flexibility which is needed for the modern operations of the Ministry of Defence and which will be of paramount importance in determining future orders for British yards. Last month, the MOD issued invitations to tender for two landing ships logistics. Swan Hunter, Harland and Wolff, Cammell Laird in Birkenhead, Appledore and BAE Systems in Govan are all in the running, with orders expected later this year. Govan's sister yard Scotstoun is involved in designing the new type 45 destroyer. The first class will be assembled and launched on the Clyde at Yarrow. Thousands of jobs will be safeguarded by that decision, which is part of a multi-billion pound shipbuilding programme.

The type 45 destroyer future services combatant and the future aircraft carrier programmes will together create orders with British yards for more than 30 major warships. That is more than was ordered in the whole period since 1979. The MOD's procurement programme signifies a huge investment in the future of British shipbuilding. It gives the industry a long-term stable platform for the next two decades, to invest, modernise and become more competitive in the world market.

Orders should be made not only on the best commercial grounds but in the best interests of our shipbuilding industry. Defence contracts must be rolled out in a manner that ensures a viable, competitive future for UK yards. The Government must fulfil their commitment to work with the industry and the unions to build a world-class industry. I welcome plans by Ministers to hold discussions with Britain's main shipyards and the unions, and consider how we can best meet the challenges and take advantage of the opportunities provided by the MOD programme. It offers us an historic opportunity. Britain's shipbuilders cannot afford to miss this chance.

The Minister has always stressed that competitiveness in shipbuilding needs and demands a strong supplier base. A wider look at the industry is essential for decisions that protect and enhance our shipbuilding capability. That is a lesson that has been taken on board in my constituency. The west of Scotland defence and aerospace network has looked at the wider economy based around the Govan shipyard. At present about 1,200 people are employed directly by BAE Systems at Govan, with more than 2,000 employed at Scotstoun. Almost 5,000 are employed in and around Glasgow by suppliers and subcontractors to the Govan yard. That is a huge number of jobs reliant on shipbuilding in Govan, and it is not exclusive to Glasgow or even Scotland.

Up to 200 jobs in the north-east of England could go if the MOD order for roll on/roll off ferries is not awarded to Govan as part of the Sealion bid. The north-east defence diversification project, a networking organisation for the defence industry, predicts that 76 small firms in the region which would supply specialist parts and skills to the Govan yard could lose valuable orders. Although my focus is understandably on the Glasgow, Govan constituency, the placing of the contract elsewhere would have a major long-term impact on Scotland and the north-east for many years to come, as more than two thirds of the work would be carried out by sub-contractors. The order could provide employment to hundreds of workers in the north-east, not only during the building of the ferries but over the entire 25 years service of the ships.

Let there be no doubt: the Prime Minister and many other Ministers have assured me on numerous occasions that no decision has been made on this order. I anticipate my hon. Friend the Minister for Competitiveness doing so again this afternoon. There is everything to play for as the Government scrutinise the bids. My own position is also clear. The necessary skills and experience are in my constituency. Govan is ready to build the ships immediately. As the local Member of Parliament, I am grateful to the many colleagues who have constituents employed at Govan for the total support that they have shown in lobbying for this order and for future work. The message is clear in Scotland—we are fighting for Govan.

Our argument has moved on from attempting to secure this order to working effectively as a team to secure the long-term future of shipbuilding on the Clyde. Workers at the yard, through shop stewards led by yard convener Jamie Webster, the trade unions, Members of this House and of the Scottish Parliament are all united in support of Govan shipyard. When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, brokered the deal that saved Govan last year and saw Kvaerner sell the yard to BAE Systems, it was cause for real celebration in my constituency and across Scotland. The shipyard is the major employer at the heart of Govan, but it is a great symbol of pride across Scotland.

People appreciate that Govan has a justifiable reputation for Clyde-built quality—building ships to last, on budget and on time. Scottish MPs have mounted a positive campaign and made a persuasive argument on the strong merits of the Govan yard. Across Scotland, we have taken our campaign to the streets and asked our constituents to sign a petition in support of Govan. Thousands of people continue to express their full support for Govan. They believe that Clyde shipbuilding has not only a proud history but great potential for the future and they know how vital this order is for Govan. Work would be guaranteed for at least three years. Up to 200 additional workers would be needed. Apprentices could be taken on for the first time in three years. That is vital in an industry that desperately needs young recruits able to learn skills for the future.

Our argument has to be persuasive, as work ends at the Govan yard in a matter of months. Closure would rip the heart out of a community and be an economic and political disaster for Scotland and Britain. Earlier this year, BAE Systems announced plans for substantial future investment in Govan and Scotstoun as a centre of excellence. The two yards worked closely as one in partnership with the sister yard at Barrow. Govan needs the work offered by the ro-ro order to bridge the gap until key projects such as the type 45 destroyers come to fruition.

The future can be bright if political will and industrial competitiveness continue to work for the common goal. The dedicated and skilled work force at Govan and their families have suffered greatly through the uncertainty of the past year and a half. I have shared their rollercoaster ride and realise how unbearable the stress can be. They know that the future of shipbuilding depends on flexibility and technology. They deserve the chance to continue proving themselves. This is a vital time for shipbuilding in the UK. Nowhere is that more true than at the Govan shipyard. The Labour Government have worked hard for an end to boom and bust in British shipbuilding. I know that the Minister will continue his good work with colleagues in active and creative support of the industry. I also urge the Government to meet the challenges of securing the future for Govan.

The Minister for Competitiveness (Mr. Alan Johnson): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sarwar) on securing this debate. He has been a persistent and effective advocate for the British shipbuilding industry and has articulated the concerns of his constituents on many occasions in the House. It is indicative of the importance of the subject to the area and the nation of Scotland that we have my hon. Friends the Members for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson), for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan), for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood), for Midlothian (Mr. Clarke), for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. Browne)—I apologise for my pronunciation—and for Eastwood (Mr. Murphy) present at the debate this afternoon.

The Government are well aware of the importance of the shipbuilding industry, both to the British economy and to the economy of the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Govan, where the largest merchant yard in Great Britain—BAE Systems, Govan—is located. Govan accounts for more than one fifth of all employees in British merchant shipyards.

I am also acutely aware that all British shipyards face difficult challenges. There is fierce international competition. It has been assessed that global overcapacity of about 30 per cent. exists, which, despite increased demand, has led to a significant fall in real prices in the last 10 years. The Government know that British yards are finding it very difficult to win new orders against international competitors. We have been discussing the matter with industry and unions and we share their concerns about the current problems.

Before I deal with those problems, however, I stress that it should be recognised that the industry has not been without its successes. As my hon. Friend the Member for Govan mentioned, last year, Cammell Laird won the £60 million contract for conversion of the Costa Classica cruise vessel, which is the biggest ever cruise conversion. Conversion is more labour-intensive, and therefore creates more jobs, than new build.

I assure hon. Members—as my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Scotland Office did in the recent debate on the future of shipbuilding on the River Clyde—that the Government remain committed to working closely with the industry to help it to face the challenges and to achieve the improvements necessary to win the contracts that are needed.

Despite the current difficulties, I firmly believe that the British shipbuilding and ship repair industry has a future as a modern and dynamic manufacturing sector in today's knowledge-driven economy. There is nothing old-fashioned about shipbuilding. Today's industry is high-tech and requires a strong skills base. In today's industry, modern computer skills are as important as some of the more traditional shipbuilding skills. Modern shipbuilding also calls for a high level of project management and marketing skills.

The key challenges facing the industry—my hon. Friend the Member for Govan articulated them in his speech—are to improve competitive performance and to tackle Korean unfair pricing: and Korean pricing most definitely is unfair.

We are working closely with the industry in both those spheres. We are helping the industry to achieve improved competitiveness through both the national shipbuilding forum and the Scottish shipbuilding forum, which—as my hon. Friend said—were formed in 1998 to facilitate that process. It is worth remembering that, in the whole history of this maritime nation, never before had the industry, the unions and Government sat round the same table, as they have in the forum, created a couple of years ago by my predecessor, now the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle). The forum is currently implementing all 40 recommendations made by the industry, including enhanced Government financial support for the industry.

Much progress has been made. We have enhanced the shipbuilding intervention fund and the home shipbuilding credit guarantee scheme. In fact, if I had not been called to today's debate—I make no complaint about that; this debate is obviously the priority and where I need to be today—I would have visited Appledore, to announce more than £1 million of SIF funding to build a fisheries protection vessel for the Irish navy, plus a further half a million pounds regional selective assistance towards a three-year, £6.5 million dry dock expansion project—which will increase throughput, create at least 230 new jobs and safeguard 82 existing jobs.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): I am truly delighted to hear that news, for which I am very grateful to the Minister. It is greatly important to my constituency. However, may I draw his attention to one of the central thrusts of the comments of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sarwar)? Will the Minister assure the Chamber that all Departments will examine very carefully overseas tenders—particularly overseas tenders—for illegal subsidies?

Mr. Johnson: I am pleased to see the hon. Gentleman in the Chamber, and I thank him for those comments. Much of my speech, which I have limited time to deliver, will deal with the very issue of unfair subsidies.

The Government have supported a number of competitiveness projects that the industry has developed in the forum. We are currently considering proposals by the Shipbuilders and Shiprepairers Association for a programme that will deliver increased competitiveness within the shipbuilding and ship repair industry through productivity improvements and site-specific master classes, which are based on our earlier, highly successful master class programme for the automotive sector. We are also considering the industry's proposals for improving marketing, the main elements of which are the production of an industrywide marketing strategy by a marketing specialist and the creation of a database of shipowners, to help identify potential customers.

We continue to offer the industry significant financial support. As my hon. Friend the Member for Govan said, we pay the shipbuilding intervention fund maximum rate for new ships. We have also brought our financial support schemes into line with our European competitors' practice, in direct response to recommendations made by the shipbuilding forum.

We remain vigilant in seeking to ensure that our European Union competitors do not receive unfair subsidies. When there is hard evidence of such practices, we will take the matter up with the European Commission. However, as we have often said to the industry, there must be firm, not merely anecdotal evidence of such abuse. It is fair to say that no evidence has been produced to suggest that other member states are bending the rules.

We share entirely the industry's concern about unfair trade practices by Korean and other low-cost Asian shipbuilders, as we believe that that is where the major problem lies. We are continuing to make vigorous efforts to address those concerns. At the November 1999 Industry Council, the Council agreed bilateral trade actions to combat Korean unfair trade practices.

Much progress has been made. The Commission has engaged Korea in bilateral talks, which have resulted in an agreement that addresses the EU industry's concerns.

[Mr. Johnson]

That is a significant advance in our approach to tackling Korean unfair trading practices. The priority now is to pursue Korea under the agreed minutes, as the agreement is called, as vigorously as possible.

The agreed minutes have extracted Korean commitments on financing yards on a commercial basis only, transparency in accounting rules for shipyards, and pursuit of commercially viable ship prices. The agreement has also secured a key consultation mechanism to take up specific cases of unfair competition. At the 18 May Industry Council—just last Thursday—we achieved a very strong outcome on Korea. The Council directed the Commission to press Korea to implement fully the agreed minutes and called for rapid bilateral consultations with Korea on specific cases of unfair competition. The UK took the lead in advocating that tough approach.

If Korea does not respond effectively, the European Union still holds the possible World Trade Organisation anti-subsidy case in reserve. The Government and the Commission are continuing to work closely with the industry in the preparation of a WTO action, should that be necessary. However, we all hope that the problems caused by Korean unfair competition can be resolved through the agreed minutes. That is the desirable way forward, and we are working hard to make the deal that we have struck with Korea work.

In the longer term, we continue to press for the only viable solution to the anti-competitive practices that my hon. Friend the Member for Govan described: to establish effective international trade disciplines, as embodied in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development shipbuilding agreement. We have taken a leading role in advocating that approach both in the European Union and in the OECD. The problem is that we have been frustrated in our efforts by the failure of the United States—which has a special relationship with South Korea—to ratify the 1994 OECD shipbuilding agreement. Nevertheless, we shall continue to pursue our objectives.

My hon. Friend urged us to remain vigilant to unfair subsidies in Europe. As I said, if we receive any hard evidence of such subsidies, the matter will be pursued vehemently. Although it is true that the shipbuilding intervention fund will be abolished at the end of this year, the United Kingdom industry last year gave its complete support to abolition; moreover, the fund will be abolished across Europe. In all the years for which the SIF has been available, it has done very little to help us in world competition. Therefore, although there has been a change of heart in some quarters about SIF abolition, the UK industry agreed to it unanimously. Nevertheless, as my hon. Friend said, we must remain vigilant on the issue of unfair subsidy.

The fundamental need is for the industry to improve its competitiveness. Operating aid has not delivered the improvements in competitiveness that the industry needs. We do not believe that continuation of operating aid is the right approach to dealing with Korean unfair competition.

I am convinced that the British shipbuilding industry does have a future. We shall continue to work closely with the industry to help it meet the tough challenges of the market, boost its competitiveness, improve its success and win new orders. In the summer, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will convene a high-level meeting of shipyards and unions for that purpose. The Secretaries of State for other Departments with an interest in shipbuilding, including the Scottish Executive, will be invited to attend.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Two o'clock.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

GM Crops

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the published and pre-reviewed studies that the Government have assessed to date on the safety of GM crops. [117029]

Mr. Meacher: There are hundreds of published and peer-reviewed scientific papers and studies that inform the safety assessments of GM crops. It is not possible to list them all here but some examples considered recently by the Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment (ACRE) are as follows. This body of knowledge on GM crops which is contained in the scientific literature is brought to bear on risk assessment not only through the individual experts on Government advisory committees, such as ACRE, but also via the Government's own scientists and Non-Governmental Organisations.

Note:

[1] Discussed at ACRE meeting on 9 June 1999.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what measures he took to notify district and parish councils about the GM crop trials in (a) St. Osyth and (b) Wivenhoe in Essex. [121276]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 8 May 2000]: Information about the Farm Scale Evaluations of GM crops is widely available. I announced the programme on 17 March and wrote to the hon. Member and other MPs with constituencies in England, outlining the aims and nature of the research.

A full list of proposed site locations is available on my Department's website, along with more detailed information about the programme and GM crops in general. The Cabinet Office website also contains further information.

My Department has organised a series of regional meetings, to which district and local councillors in areas where GM crop trials are proposed have been invited. There is also a DETR leaflet, "GM Crops—Take a Closer Look", which is on the website and available at public meetings.

The proposed trial of oil seed rape at St. Osyth (which is now not going ahead) was advertised locally by Aventis. Officials from my Department wrote to the local parish and district councillors to invite them to attend a public meeting in Ipswich on 13 April and I understand that several councillors were able to attend.

The proposed trial of GM maize at Wivenhoe has not been advertised locally, because the crop involved has a European Part C marketing consent which means that it can be grown in the UK without my Department being notified. However, the biotechnology industry has agreed that this crop should be grown in the Farm Scale Evaluations and have agreed to provide my Department with the grid references of the fields involved. Details are on the DETR website.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received from Herefordshire about the siting of the GM trial sites in Kempley, Gloucestershire, and Preston Wynne, Herefordshire; and if he will make a statement. [122039]

Mr. Meacher: Following notification of the proposed Farm Scale Evaluation of oil seed rape at Kempley, Gloucestershire, my Department has received 18 letters from those objecting to, and seeking further information about, the Evaluations programme.

My Department was told about the GM maize at Preston Wynne on 26 April, at which time details were placed on the Department's website. To date, no letters have specifically referred to this field site.

Food Safety (Hospitals)

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions in each of the last five years, how many times the Health and Safety Executive has investigated hygiene and food safety standards in hospitals through (a) spot checks, (b) pre-arranged inspections and (c) legal action for the enforcement of standards. [120990]

Mr. Meacher: The Health and Safety Executive has not, in any of the last five years, investigated any hygiene and food safety standards in hospitals.

These matters are properly the responsibility of Environmental Health Officers employed by local authorities for the districts in which the premises are located.

Refrigerants

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the cost to his Department of converting air conditioning and refrigeration equipment from using HFC refrigerants to using (a) hydrocarbons and (b) ammonia. [120427]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 8 May 2000]: My Department's local property managers are asked to assess the practicality and cost-effectiveness of such measures in drawing up plans to reduce the environmental impact of our estate.

Estimating the costs of converting from HFC refrigerants, consistent with the draft UK programme on climate change, requires studies by appropriate specialists to determine on a case by case basis the practical and economic options. These studies address the size and costs of replacement plant and associated works as well as the cost of replacement refrigerants.

Disadvantaged Neighbourhoods

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has for improving the management of programmes for disadvantaged neighbourhoods. [121453]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Government's plans for the future management of regeneration programmes, targeted at deprived neighbourhoods, will take account of the recommendations in the National Strategy for Neighbourhood Renewal (the framework document of which was published for consultation on 12 April) and the Urban and Rural White Papers (scheduled for publication later in the year). The National Strategy framework document proposes a significant number of recommendations for overcoming the problems of deprived areas, including ideas for improving the way regeneration, and other, programmes are managed and delivered centrally and regionally.

Bus Safety

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to make the installation on buses of safety equipment designed to alert drivers to faults in bus wheels mandatory. [121491]

Mr. Hill: Faults in wheels of commercial vehicles and buses are identified during normal maintenance checks depending on a particular operator's maintenance schedule. My Department's Guide to Maintaining Roadworthiness, which is issued to all vehicle operators, emphasises the need for a daily "walk round" check by the driver. My Department is aware of several proprietary devices intended to give a visual indication of loosening of wheel retaining nuts, which could assist the driver in this check, but there are not any plans to introduce these as a mandatory requirement. Certain wheel faults such as cracks or excessive wear are only apparent on close inspection which is not normally expected to be within the competence of the driver.

Green Transport Plans

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the number and quality of green transport plans produced by private sector businesses. [121481]

Mr. Hill: A survey carried out in early 1998 showed that at least 200 organisations (excluding local authorities) were implementing plans. The provisional Local Transport Plans submitted in 1999 suggest that numbers have increased significantly in some areas since then. We intend to commission a full survey shortly.

Town Centres

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent research he has undertaken on the impact of upward-only rent reviews on town centre property markets. [121483]

Ms Beverley Hughes: My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning published a research report on 19 April about the impact of the property industry's Code of Practice on Commercial Property Leases. This considered, among other things, the extent of upward-only review clauses in the property market generally. The research did not look specifically at town centre property markets.

The study, by the University of Reading, found that upward-only rent review clauses still predominate in longer leases. We have asked the property market and professions to consider how the market could best promote alternatives to upward-only rent review clauses. We recognise that landlords may seek a higher initial rent to offset the greater risk of letting without such a clause. It will therefore be important for market promotion to draw the tenant's attention to the offsetting advantages of renting without an upward-only provision, as well as to any higher rent.

Stoke Lane Allotments, Gedling

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what contact his Department has had with Gedling Borough Council regarding the proposed sale of part of the Stoke Lane Allotments. [121946]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Department has had no contact with Gedling Borough Council regarding the proposed sale of part of the Stoke Lane Allotments.

Whitley Way, Hampshire

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 2 May 2000, Official Report, column 4W, on Whitley Way, if he will list the representations he has received about this road. [122300]

Ms Beverley Hughes: There have been six separate representations on this matter. In addition to the reply that the then Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) sent the hon. Member on 19 August 1998 in response to representations on this issue, one further representation was received from Winchester City Council in September 1999. Representations were made by three local members of the public between April and June 1999. More recently, representations have been received from one further member of the public.

Landfill Tax

Mr. Hurst: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals

he has to return moneys collected from the landfill tax to local authorities; and if he will make a statement. [121023]

Mr. Timms: I have been asked to reply.

There are no such proposals. Revenues raised from the landfill tax contribute to general Government revenue. The Government are considering the question of resources for local authorities as part of the overall 2000 spending review.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Human Rights Act 1998

Sir George Young: To ask the President of the Council what plans she has to introduce mechanisms to oversee the use of statutory instruments to amend primary legislation under the provisions of the Human Rights Act 1998. [121505]

Mrs. Beckett: The Government intend to invite the House to give the proposed Joint Committee on Human Rights the task of scrutinising remedial orders shortly.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Computers for Teachers Scheme

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what steps he will take to ensure that teachers can obtain a response from his Department about receiving their subsidy under the Computers for Teachers scheme; [121948]

(2) what assessment he has made of the operation of the Computers for Teachers scheme; and if he will make a statement. [121947]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 12 May 2000]: The Computers for Teachers Initiative was launched on 12 January 2000. Due to high teacher take-up, the first phase of the scheme was closed on 30 April, with a deadline for receipt of applications of 5 June. Some 17,000 applications have been received, with over 2,200 teachers already having received their subsidies. The Department has put in place a range of measures to answer teachers' inquiries, including the recruitment of extra staff, opening further telephone lines and arranging a dedicated Computers for Teachers e-mail address.

Higher Education (Cheltenham)

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people resident in the Cheltenham constituency have (a) applied for, (b) been accepted into and (c) graduated from full-time courses in higher education in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available. [122004]

Mr. Wicks: The available data for 1998–99 and 1999–2000 are given in the following table; the data on student postcodes from which these figures are derived is not sufficiently complete to allow similar figures to be produced for earlier years.

Full-time undergraduates whose normal residence prior to entry was Cheltenham constituency

Academic year	Entrants	Graduates
1998–99	920	710
1999–2000	905	[1]n/a

[1] Data on 1999–2000 graduates will be available in February 2001

Student Support Contributions

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment for what reason changes were made to the calculations for parental income in assessing liability for student support contributions whereby MIRAS relief was disapplied in 2000–01; and for what reason life assurance premiums were similarly disapplied. [121339]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 11 May 2000]: The removal of the disregard of parental income in student support for mortgage interest that attracts tax relief follows the wider Government decision to abolish tax relief for mortgage payments from April 2000. The abolition of MIRAS has been public for some time and the families of students entering higher education this year will be well aware of it. We will ensure that the families of students already in higher education are not asked to pay any more as a result of the abolition of MIRAS in the 2000–01 academic year. From the 2001–02 academic year, we are raising the contribution threshold from £17,805 to £20,000, as announced by the Secretary of State on 25 January. This increase is well above the rate of inflation and will benefit both mortgage payers and those who do not have mortgages.

The Government keep the student support system under review to ensure that support is targeted at those students who need it most. The disregard for life assurance premiums which attract tax relief has been removed because it gave a limited group of parents with certain life assurance policies a double benefit of tax relief on payments and a disregard from their income in determining their contribution to their children's support.

Supply Teachers

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent representations he has received from schools that are having to fund the use of supply teachers in place of teachers who are on jury service; and if he will make a statement. [121730]

Ms Estelle Morris: No such representations have been received.

Fresh Start Schools

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on progress at each of the Fresh Start schools. [121970]

Ms Estelle Morris: Fresh Start policy is in its infancy—only 15 schools have undergone a fresh start to date, 11 secondary and four primary. Three opened in September 1998, eight in September 1999, two in January 2000, one in April 2000 and one in May 2000.

Former school name	New school name	Phase	LEA area

These schools all present major challenges, and we are working with them to support them and learn from the early experiences of the process. All currently have a substantive or acting headteacher in place and Ofsted is monitoring the schools progress on a termly basis. There are no performance data on the schools that fresh started since September 1999 but there are early signs of improvement in the first three schools. Exam results are up and truancy down—to a marked degree.

GCSE Statistics

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of pupils achieved at least five GCSEs at grades A* to C at (a) Blakelaw school, (b) Earl Marshall school and (c) Regis school in (i) 1996, (ii) 1997 and (iii) 1998. [121969]

Ms Estelle Morris: The proportion of pupils who achieved at least five GCSEs at grades A* to C was as follows:

	Percentage
	(i) 1995–96	(ii) 1996–97	(iii) 1997–98
(a) Blakelaw school	10	9	7
(b) Earl Marshall school	8	11	10
(c) Regis school	24	25	29

New Deal (Sheffield)

Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many New Deal places have been (a) offered, (b) taken up and (c) completed within Sheffield City Council since the start of the New Deal initiative. [121492]

Ms Jowell: From April 1998 to date (10 May 2000), Sheffield City Council have employed two new deal 25+ clients on the New Deal subsidised employment option. These were a result of the clients being encouraged by their New Deal personal advisers to market the option themselves to prospective employers.

One client commenced subsidised employment on 7 September 1999 and has since been retained after the six-month subsidy period.

The other client commenced subsidised employment on 26 April 2000, and is in the process of completing the subsidised period of six months.

Departmental Publications

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list each publication issued by his Department since May 1997, the number of copies printed of each publication and the cost of publication, printing and distribution of each publication. [121328]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 9 May 2000]: It is not possible to provide all the information requested on individual publications without disproportionate expense.

The Department faces enormous communication challenges in reaching its diverse audiences, including around 6.5 million parents, over 415,000 teachers, some 8.5 million students in further and higher education and up to 3.2 million small and medium-sized employers. Since May 1997, the Department has spent £5.85 million from its central Advertising and Publicity Budget on printing 559 new information leaflets and booklets. Print runs vary greatly—from 4.3 million copies of the leaflet "It all adds up", which shows parents easy ways to help with their children's mathematics, to 5,000 copies of an information pack on Millennium Volunteers.

Distribution costs for publications cannot be separated from the Department's contract with its mailing house without disproportionate expense. Since May 1997 this contract has cost £5.22 million for distribution and fulfilment of requests for publications funded from the Advertising and Publicity Budget.

Further Education

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the funding available for individual students at further education colleges on similar courses when sourced by (a) the Further Education Funding Council and (b) New Deal programmes. [121688]

Mr. Wicks: Currently the Further Education Funding Council and Employment Service funding systems are not directly comparable. We intend that all post-16 funding should be on a more comparable basis in future. We are currently consulting on a common funding system across the Learning and Skills Council and Employment Service.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many further education corporations have not yet cleared their 1998–99 accounts following external audit. [121687]

Mr. Wicks: Matters concerning external audits and college accounts are dealt with by the Further Education Funding Council (FEFC). I have asked the Chief Executive to reply to the hon. Member direct.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Trawlermen

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on what date he expects to publish his joint report with the Department of Trade and Industry on compensation for distant-water trawlermen. [121955]

Mr. Morley: It is not customary for policy advice given by officials to Ministers to be made publicly available. I can assure the House that the trawlermen's case is well understood and that the Government are considering it as a matter of urgency.

Environment Agency (Fisheries)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what representations he has received on the environmental impact caused by the cut in grant in aid for the Environment Agency for fisheries work; [121734]

(2) what representations he has received on the effects on the Environment Agency's fisheries work as a result of the cuts in their grant in aid. [121758]

Mr. Morley: I have received representations from a number of individuals and organisations, including some 150 letters from Members of Parliament and over 90 letters from the general public.

Migratory Salmonid Fisheries

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what initiatives he is pursuing to aid migratory salmonid fisheries. [121733]

Mr. Morley: The report of the independent Group established by Ministers to review all aspects of salmon and freshwater fisheries legislation and policy in England and Wales was issued for public consultation in March. This report includes many recommendations aimed at improving migratory salmonid fisheries. Interested parties have until 31 July to submit their views; we shall then prepare a Government response setting out how we intend to take matters forward.

Pest Shooting

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his current policy to allow a general licence to shoot pests includes (a) sporting events and (b) mass shoots; and if he will make a statement. [121782]

Mr. Morley: The shooting of certain 'pest' bird species is permitted under the terms of general licences issued by MAFF and DETR under the provisions of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. The general licences allow authorised persons, such as the landowner or occupier, or a person acting with the owner or occupier's permission, to kill or take certain bird species. This control is permitted for the purposes of preventing damage to agriculture (licensed by MAFF) and to preserve public health or public or air safety (licensed by DETR) and does not cover sporting events.

The populations of the species concerned are monitored and there is no evidence that their conservation status is currently threatened by any of these control measures.

Primates

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many primates are kept in research laboratories in the UK funded through the European Community; and if he will make a statement. [121306]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I have been asked to reply.

Home Office records are not held in such a way as to identify the numbers of primates, or other animals, being held at designated establishments at a particular time, nor do they record centrally the sources of funding of establishments engaged in animal research. It is the nature of the work proposed in relation to the cost/benefit assessment, rather than the source of funding, which is the key consideration in deciding whether a project should be licensed under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986.

PRIME MINISTER

Broadcasting (Religious Freedom)

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Prime Minister how many letters have been received by his office since 1 May 1997 supporting greater religious freedom in broadcasting. [121324]

The Prime Minister: Between 1 May 1997 and 20 April 2000 my Office received 9,898 letters regarding broadcasting. Information on whether letters supported greater religious freedom in broadcasting is not kept.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

New Millennium Experience Company

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what is his latest estimate of net receipts to the New Millennium Experience Company from ticket sales. [120229]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 2 May 2000]: Net receipts from ticket sales up to 31 December 1999 will be published in the company's 1 April 1999—31 December 1999 Annual Report and Financial Statements due to be published before the end of June. Forecast net receipts from ticket sales over the project life-time are an integral part of the business review. They will be informed by assumptions and judgments made about ticket yield and about percentages of sales through the different ticket distribution channels—the call centre, the National Lottery, the website (www.dome2000.co.uk). The potential range of net receipts under discussion are commercially confidential because they are directly relevant to the company's competitive position in the visitor attraction market-place.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what expressions of corporate interest in acquiring the New Millennium Experience Company as a going concern he has received. [121952]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 12 May 2000]: The Dome Legacy competition has received one serious expression of interest in acquiring the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) as a going concern since financial offers were invited.

Millennium Dome

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on attendance figures for the Millennium Dome. [120806]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 5 May 2000]: Attendance at the Dome to date totals 2.1 million, making it the most popular pay-to-visit attraction in the UK. Visitor figures are posted on the Dome website (www.dome2000.co.uk) weekly.

The latest independent survey shoes that visitors have overwhelmingly enjoyed their day at the Dome with satisfaction levels of over 80 per cent. This is borne out by the largest monthly attendance to date of 579,333 visitors in April and May day's record attendance of 32,192 visitors.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many responses were received to the dome legacy competition; if he will publish them; and if he will make a statement. [121953]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 12 May 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend, the Minister for Local Government and the Regions gave my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) on 17 January 2000.

Road Closures

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what recent representations he has received regarding the cancellation of sporting and charitable events due to the imposition of charges for road closures; and if he will make a statement. [121358]

Kate Hoey: My Department has received three letters recently about the cancellation of athletics events on the public highway. The Association of Chief Police Officers is undertaking work on the staging of sporting events on the public highway and I am consulting it on the current position. I will write to the hon. Member as soon as I have had a response, placing copies of my reply in the Library.

Broadcasting (Religious Freedom)

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport for what reason religious groups are prohibited from applying for local digital radio licences. [121320]

Janet Anderson: Schedule 2 to the Broadcasting Act 1990 (as amended by the Broadcasting Act 1996) disqualifies a body whose objects are wholly or mainly of a religious nature from holding local digital multiplex or digital sound programme service licences.

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many letters have been received by his Department since 1 May 1997 supporting greater religious freedom in broadcasting. [121323]

Janet Anderson: Since 1 January 1999, my Department has replied to around 16,500 letters on religious broadcasting. Figures relating to the period since 1 May 1997 are not available.

Creative and Cultural Education

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what progress has been made towards implementing the recommendations of the report of the National Advisory Committee on Creative and Cultural Education; and if he will make a statement. [121950]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 12 May 2000]: The Secretary of State for Education and Employment and I announced the Government's response to the NACCCE report, "All our Futures: Creativity, Culture and Education", in January and have placed copies in both Libraries of the House. We have made significant progress in implementing the commitments, notably: guidance on creative development for pre-school children is available to accompany the new Early Learning Goals; schools will be working with a more flexible National Curriculum from September with greater emphasis on the need for creative and cultural education; guidance on building partnerships between schools and arts practitioners has been published; an arts award for schools is being developed and will be piloted shortly; the creation of the National Foundation for Youth Music and the injection of £180 million has made a huge impact on the teaching of music.

We will also be making £150 million available to create multi-purpose sports and arts facilities for primary schools; and work by the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority on the role of arts and creativity in the curriculum will further strengthen standards of teaching and learning.

This is a substantial body of work and underlines the importance we place on creativity and culture in education. But this is just a small snapshot of where we have got to so far. The real value of the NACCCE report is the influence it is continuing to have as our thinking develops.

Museums (North-west)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what funds museums in the North West of England will receive from the amounts which his Department has allocated to cut museum entry fees; and which museums will receive the money. [119101]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Due to an error my answer was incorrectly printed. The correct version is as follows:

In 1990–2000 to enable free admission for children at the two museums funded by my Department in the North-West which are affected, the National Museums and Galleries on Merseyside (NMGM) received £719,000 and the Museum of Science and Industry in Manchester (MSIM) £188,000. In 2000–01, to enable free admission for children and people over 60, NMGM has been allocated £855,000, and for free children only MSIM has been allocated £188,000. The allocation of funds to cut museum entry fees at the museums and galleries funded by my Department in 2001–02 is still under consideration and no detailed figures are available yet. An announcement will be made in due course.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

European Humanitarian Office

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what is the remit of the European Community Humanitarian Aid Office; what public reports it has issued; and what are the (a) percentage and (b) total of United Kingdom Overseas Development funds that are channelled through the European Union. [121637]

Clare Short: The European Community Humanitarian Office (ECHO) is mandated to provide humanitarian assistance to people outside the European Union, particularly in developing countries, who are affected by natural disasters or man-made crises.

Since 1993 ECHO has published an Annual Report, periodic information updates (ECHO News and ECHO Files) and special reports on particular aspects of its activities such as disaster preparedness. A full list of current publications is available on the ECHO website (http://europa.eu.int/comm/echo/index.html).

Some 30 per cent. of UK development funds are currently channelled through the EC. In 1998–99 (the latest year for which confirmed figures are available), the total DFID contribution to EC external spending was approximately £706 million.

Ethiopia

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much food aid was promised by the European Union through ECHO to Ethiopia in 1999; and when and where it was delivered. [121094]

Clare Short: Food Aid is the responsibility of the EC's DG-Development rather than ECHO. The EC pledged some 150,000 metric tonnes (MT) of food aid in 1999 and delivered about 190,000MT. EU pledges against Government of Ethiopia Emergency appeals are effectively multi-annual. Food pledges one year may not be delivered in the same year. The process is in effect a rolling programme of support with food from the year before filling gaps in the food pipeline. We do not have details of where the food was distributed.

European Community Humanitarian Office

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much food aid has been committed to Ethiopia by the European Union through ECHO in 2000; and when and where it will be delivered. [121095]

Clare Short: Food aid is the responsibility of the EC's DG-Development rather than ECHO. The EC has committed 432,526 metric tonnes (MT) of food aid this year. A further 110,000MT will be provided by July 2001. Britain contributes 17 per cent. of the cost. Two shipments carrying 46,500MT of cereals have arrived. We do not have details of where the food was distributed.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if ECHO is committed to finding the cheapest appropriate food aid on the open market in responding to humanitarian need in Ethiopia and other such crises. [121097]

Clare Short: Food aid is the responsibility of EC DG-Development. EC procurement rules for food aid include assurances on value for money and takes quality and quantity into account.

CABINET OFFICE

Agriculture and Environment Biotechnology Commission

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when she expects to announce the new chair of the Agriculture and Environment Biotechnology Commission; and what role this body will fulfil with regard to the GM farm scale trials. [120717]

Marjorie Mowlam: Appointments to the AEBC will be made shortly.

The Commission will have a wide-ranging remit to provide Government with independent strategic advice on developments in biotechnology and their implications for both agriculture and the environment.

DEFENCE

Service Discipline Acts

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the consolidation of the Service Discipline Acts. [122507]

Mr. Spellar: We recognise the importance of updating the legislation governing discipline in the armed forces. It has been the intention for some time to consolidate the Army and Air Force Acts 1955 and the Naval Discipline Act 1957. We have been taking stock of the consolidation in the light of the changes to the present legislation made by the Armed Forces Discipline Bill and the likelihood of further changes in the quinquennial Armed Forces Bill in the next Session.

A further consideration is the Government's intention, indicated in the Strategic Defence Review, to replace the three present Acts with a single tri-Service Act. It is planned that the substantive development of this important project should get under way as soon as the quinquennial Bill is enacted and that, when the work is complete, the resulting legislation should be introduced when the parliamentary timetable allows. As a consequence, legislation consolidating the present Acts would be likely to have an effective life of only a few years.

We have therefore concluded that the most sensible approach would be to subsume consolidation within the development of the tri-Service Act, the purpose of which will be to provide legislation that better meets the requirements of the three Services in an increasingly joint environment.

Disciplinary Procedures

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to Civil Service Appeal Board Case No. AB/6751, held on 13 April, concerning Mr. A. J. Ely of Linlithgow and ABRO (MOD), what response he has made to the request by the Board to examine the implementation of the case, with particular reference to the rating of the offence in the charge letter, in their current review of disciplinary procedures. [120836]

Dr. Moonie: The Civil Service Appeal Board (CSAB) makes reference to a current review by the Ministry of Defence of its disciplinary procedures. The review was completed some time ago and, following lengthy consultation with the trade unions, revised guidance has been issued on the handling of the most serious disciplinary offences. This has also been made available to the CSAB.

The rating of a disciplinary offence as gross misconduct in the particular case in question followed full and proper consideration of the facts of the offence committed.

Cluster Bombs

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what failure rates for cluster bomb submunitions are assessed as acceptable. [121693]

Mr. Spellar: The small possibility of submunition failure is taken into account when reaching decisions on the use of UK cluster bombs in the light of national Rules of Engagement and targeting constraints.

Ranger Anti-personnel Mines

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Ranger anti-personnel mines have been cleared from the Falkland Islands. [121977]

Mr. Spellar: No Ranger anti-personnel mines have been laid by UK forces in the Falklands, and therefore none have been cleared.

Lynx Helicopters

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Lynx helicopters are in reserve. [121601]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 11 May 2000]: As of 10 May 2000, the Ministry of Defence has a total of 203 Lynx helicopters. All aircraft are rotated through a routine of operational use and regular maintenance, including update work such as the conversion from Mk 3 to Mk 8. There are no Lynx helicopters held as a "reserve", although some aircraft in maintenance are characterised, for fleet management purposes, as an In-Use Reserve.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reasons the number of Royal Navy Lynx helicopters has been decreased to 59. [121599]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 11 May 2000]: The Royal Navy has 59 Lynx helicopters available for front-line units, sufficient for our current operational requirements. Other Naval Lynx are undergoing routine deep maintenance or conversion work.

Sea Harriers

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Sea Harriers are available to the Royal Navy; how many are in service; of these how many are in reserve and how many Sea Harriers (a) have been converted to FA2 standard, (b) are undergoing conversion and (c) will be converted in due course. [121596]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 11 May 2000]: The Royal Navy Sea Harrier FA2 programme consisted of 52 aircraft: 18 were purchased from new and a further 34 were converted from Sea Harrier FRS1. The conversion programme was completed in 1999. Allowing for attrition losses, the Royal Navy now has 47 Sea Harriers of which 29 are available to meet operational requirements. Of the remainder, a number are undergoing updates to the navigational system. The balance is held in reserve.

HEALTH

Social Workers

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to publish his proposals for education and training for social workers; and if it is his policy that undergraduate and postgraduate social work qualifications should continue to be recognized when the General Social Care Council assumes its responsibilities. [119694]

Mr. Hutton: Independent contractors have completed reports on the content and delivery of the Diploma in Social Work. We shall make these reports available when we publish our Quality Strategy Green Paper for social care later in the spring.

In carrying out its functions the General Social Care Council will recognise existing professional social work qualifications at both entry and post qualifying levels.

Vaccinations (Deaths)

Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children have died following a routine vaccination in each year since 1990. [111958]

Yvette Cooper: Over 150 million doses of vaccine have been distributed in the United Kingdom for use in the childhood programme in the last 10 years.

A report of a particular suspected reaction does not necessarily mean that it has been caused by the vaccine. There is no evidence to support the suggestion of a causal link between any of the childhood vaccines recommended in the UK and death.

Yellow card reports to the Medicines Control Agency of suspected adverse reactions to a routine vaccine where a child, aged 16 years or less, died are presented in the table for the UK.

Year	Reports of a fatal reaction to a vaccine
1990	2
1991	9
1992	10
1993	7
1994	4
1995	4
1996	3
1997	5
1998	2
1999	4

Vaccinations

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current percentage take-up for each childhood vaccination. [122157]

Yvette Cooper: The information available about the percentage of children receiving childhood vaccinations is contained in the Statistical Bulletin, "NHS Immunisation Statistics, England: 1998–99". A copy of the bulletin is available in the Library and can also be found on the Department's website: www.doh.gov.uk/public/sb9928.htm.

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the potential side-effects for each of the current childhood vaccinations. [122155]

Yvette Cooper: The potential side effects for each of the current childhood vaccines are listed in the UK health departments' handbook, "Immunisation against infectious disease", a copy of which is in the Library. A revised chapter on meningococcal vaccine, including reference to the new meningococcal Group C conjugate vaccine, was issued on 18 October 1999 under cover of PL/CMO/99/4, PL/CNO/99/8, PL/CPHO/99/3; a copy of this is also available in the Library.

Strategic Services Reviews (South Staffordshire)

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is (a) the total cost to date and (b) the total budgeted cost on completion of the Strategic Services Review being undertaken by South Staffordshire Health Authority. [121579]

Mr. Denham: The review of South Staffordshire health services commenced in July 1999 and has involved the health authority, National Health Service trusts, primary care groups and social services serving the health community. To date the review has spent £65,000 on specialist advice and consultants support and an additional £8,000 in respect of materials and publications to keep staff and the public informed (these costs exclude normal staff and professional time). It is anticipated that expenditure for the assessment and recommendation phases will not exceed £100,000.

Public Bodies

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 8 May 2000, Official Report, columns 324–25W, on transfer of work, how many of the bodies listed in (a) (i) and (ii) have been transferred since 1992 or are planned to be transferred to and from the Northern Region. [121624]

Ms Stuart: Of the bodies listed at (a)(i) (executive agencies), National Health Service Estates relocated its headquarters from London to Leeds in April 1993; it also has staff at the regional office headquarters in Durham and has an office in Newcastle, opened in April 2000.

Of the bodies listed at (a)(ii) (non-Departmental public bodies), the Family Health Services Appeal Authority has been located in Harrogate since it was established in 1995.

Social Services

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his policy on taking power to issue statutory guidance to local authorities concerning their social services charging policies. [121612]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 11 May 2000]: Our White Paper, "Modernising Soeial Services", recognised that the scale of variation in discretionary charges for non-residential care is unacceptable. This has now been confirmed in the Audit Commission report, "Charging with Care". We are considering all the options for changing the current system, and will consult representatives of service users, carers, local authorities, and other interested parties.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assumptions are made by his Department in the social services Standard Spending Assessment for the recoupment of costs by means of charges. [121611]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 11 May 2000]: The Standard Spending Assessment (SSA) for personal social services comprises four elements: SSAs for children's services, residential care services for older people, non-residential care services for older people, and services for adults aged 18 to 64 years.

The SSA formula for residential services for older people includes an estimate of the actual amount of income collected. The SSA formula for non-residential services for older people reflects differences in the potential to raise charge income in different councils. However, SSAs are intended to reflect relative differences in councils' need to spend. The Department does not set targets for recoupment rates, nor make assumptions regarding the monetary value of cost recoupment.

The SSA formulae for the other two elements make no assumption about income from charges.

VAT (Continence Products)

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much the reimposition of VAT on continence products is estimated to cost the NHS in 1999–2000 and 2000–01. [122106]

Mr. Hutton: Details of expenditure on continence products are not held centrally. The estimate of £9 million per annum given in the reply to the hon. Gentleman on 2 March 1998, Official Report, column 487W, was based on an earlier study. However, there is no reason to suppose that this estimate is not valid for 1999–2000 and 2000–01.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the proportion of patients in the last five years who knew that the drugs dispensed to them had been tested on animals; and if he will make a statement. [122103]

Ms Stuart: No estimate has been made of the proportion of patients in the last five years who knew that the drugs dispensed to them had been tested on animals. Although there is no statutory requirement for pharmaceutical product labels to include a statement on animal testing, such information is often available in the Summary of Product Characteristic.

Breastfeeding (Food Supplements)

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to provide mothers with vouchers for food supplements to help with the breastfeeding of their babies; and if he will make a statement. [122142]

Yvette Cooper: The Welfare Food Scheme is being reviewed and the Prevention Modernisation Action Team is examining a wide range of options but no conclusions have been reached. Any proposals for change will be subject to parliamentary approval.

Phenobarbitone

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the increase in the cost of phenobarbitone over the last three years. [122143]

Ms Stuart: Table A shows the change in prescription items and the net ingredient cost of phenobarbitone dispensed in the community, 1996 to 1998, and January 1999 to September 1999.

Phenobarbitone is included in our proposals to set maximum prices for certain generic medicines, announced on 20 April 2000.

Table A: Number of prescription items and net ingredient cost of phenobarbitone dispensed in the community, 1996 to 1998, and January 1999 to September 1999

Year	Prescription items (thousand)	Net ingredient (£000)
1996	403.6	187.6
1998	363.8	237.2
1999[1]	260.1	258.8

[1] January to September

Notes:

1. The prescription information is from the Prescribed Cost Analysis (PCA) system and is based on a full analysis of all prescriptions dispensed in the community, ie by community pharmacists and appliance contractors, dispensing doctors, and prescriptions submitted by prescribing doctors for items personally administered in England. Also included are prescriptions written in Wales, Scotland, Northern Ireland and the Isle of Man but dispensed in England. The data do not cover drugs dispensed in hospital or private prescriptions.
2. The net ingredient cost (NIC) is the basic cost of a drug and does not take account of discounts, dispensing costs, fees or prescription charges income.
3. Phenobarbitone drugs are those defined within the British National Formulary section 4.8.1, "Control of epilepsy".

Leukaemia

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what clusters of sufferers of leukaemia there are around (a) current and (b) past rubbish tips. [122154]

Yvette Cooper: Epidemiological studies have not demonstrated that there is a connection between landfill sites and leukaemias. We have commissioned the Small Area Health Statistics Unit at Imperial College, London, to carry out a study of health outcomes, including leukaemias, in populations living near landfills in England, Scotland and Wales during the period 1982 to 1996. The study is expected to be completed this year. Further information is available on the Department website, at http://www.doh.gov.uk/landh.htm

Respite Care (Disabled Children)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make respite care available for parents of children with severe physical, mental or physiological difficulties. [120943]

Mr. Hutton: Respite care is already available for families with disabled children. Availability of respite care is being boosted by two important Government initiatives. First, the Carers National Strategy, which gives a strong commitment to improving services and support for all carers, including parent carers of disabled children. The Carers Grant in 2000–01 includes £10 million for services for families with disabled children.

Secondly, Quality Protects, the Government's £375 million programme to improve children's services includes the specific sub-objective for all local authorities to:

increase the number of disabled children receiving family support services (including short term breaks/respite care).

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Deprived Neighbourhoods

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what support is available to businesses in deprived neighbourhoods outside the inner city. [120125]

Ms Hewitt: The full range of business support from the Small Business Service is available throughout the country. In the Assisted Areas, grants are available for eligible investment: in Tiers 1 and 2 Regional Selective Assistance, and in Tier 3 Enterprise Grants. There is a wider range of regeneration initiatives in the most deprived neighbourhoods, and the Government are currently consulting on a new National Strategy for Neighbourhood Renewal.

Eco-schools Scheme

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what support his Department gives to the Eco-schools scheme. [121672]

Mr. Mullin: I have been asked to reply.

Eco-schools is run by Going for Green and is funded through ENTRUST (the approved regulator of the Landfill Tax Credit Scheme) by Coca-Cola/Sita Environmental Trust. The Department also pays grant to Going for Green and its sister company, the Tidy Britain Group, to run a number of programmes, including Eco-schools, that will create an awareness of, and a demand for, litter free and sustainable environments. The Department paid a total grant of £3,763,000 in 1999–2000, with the same amount available in 2000–01.

World Trade Organisation

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he has taken to establish UK representation in a WTO parliamentary body to meet alongside future WTO ministerial meetings. [121964]

Mr. Caborn: The UK Government support the current consultations by WTO Director General Mike Moore and General Council Chair Ambassador Bryn which include consideration of WTO consultative and decision-making procedures. We would not like to pre-judge the outcome of these consultations—including any ideas concerning a WTO parliamentary body—which will need to take into account a wide range of views among WTO members on the nature of the issues and the shape of solutions for reform, in order to reach consensus between WTO members on a way forward.

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions the Government have undertaken with the Inter-Parliamentary Union about organising the representation of parliamentarians at future WTO ministerial meetings. [121965]

Mr. Caborn: The UK Government support the current consultations by WTO Director General Mike Moore and General Council Chair Ambassador Bryn which include consideration of WTO consultative and decision-making procedures. We would not like to pre-judge the outcome of these consultations—including any ideas concerning the representation of parliamentarians at future WTO ministerial meetings—which will need to take into account a wide range of views among WTO members on the nature of the issues and the shape of solutions for reform, in order to reach consensus between WTO members on a way forward.

Nuclear Reprocessing

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to the oral statement by the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Neath, (Mr. Hain) of 3 May 2000, Official Report, column 84WH, on what dates each of the UK's nuclear reprocessing plants, including those used to process military nuclear materials, were (a) put under Euratom safeguards and (b) made liable to inspection by the International Atomic Energy Agency. [121978]

Dr. Howells: Civil nuclear material at UK reprocessing facilities became subject to the safeguards provisions of the Euratom Treaty on 1 January 1973. Such material became subject to the terms of the United Kingdom's safeguards agreement with the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) and Euratom (INFCIRC/263) when that agreement entered force on 14 August 1978. All reprocessing in the UK since March 1996 has been performed under Euratom safeguards and been liable to inspection by the IAEA under the terms of the INFCIRC/263 agreement.

Banana Dispute

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his latest estimate of the number of British jobs lost as a result of the banana dispute between the EU and the US. [121711]

Mr. Caborn: The number of jobs lost within UK companies in the targeted sectors will depend on a number of factors, including the length of time that the retaliatory measures remain in place, and the ability of affected companies to find alternative customers for their goods. I have received many representations from UK companies affected by the US retaliation and recognise that there is a real risk of damage to UK companies in terms of both lost trade and jobs.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the Council of Ministers will next meet to discuss the banana dispute between the EU and the US. [121709]

Mr. Caborn: I understand that Commissioner Lamy intends to report to the General Affairs Council on 22 May.

Motor Industry

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what initiatives he is pursuing to safeguard jobs in the motor components industry which may be under threat from the sale of Rover; and if he will make a statement. [121728]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The sale of Rover cars to the Phoenix consortium is the best outcome to safeguard jobs in the supply chain for the models produced at Longbridge and the R75.

In the longer term, the Government will continue their efforts to help the industry to improve its competitiveness. The DTI is providing a total of over £18 million of support for initiatives such as the SMMT Industry Forum and the Foresight Vehicle programme, as well as undertaking activity to attract new investment and develop exports.

Coal

Mr. Heseltine: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many deep mine coal pits are operating in Great Britain; and what percentage of national electricity generation is fuelled by coal. [121448]

Mr. Byers: There are currently 17 major deep mine coal pits in operation in the UK.

There are also a number of smaller deep mines, each producing less than 100,000 tonnes of coal per year.

In 1999, coal accounted for 29 per cent. of national electricity generation.

Sub-post Offices

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list those documents and publications produced by his Department and its Agencies, including the Royal Mail but excluding the Post Office, that are available at sub-post offices. [121628]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I understand from the Post Office that the information requested is not readily available in the form sought. However, they have supplied their list of stores items available to be sent to sub-post offices. I have arranged for a copy of this information to be placed in the Libraries of the House. The Post Office has advised that changes to the list can occur on a weekly basis as items are withdrawn and new items added.

New World Trade Round

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what will be the objectives of the European Union in respect of its initiating a further new world trade round; and what problems the Commission seeks to resolve in respect of specific market problems referred to in paragraph 1.2 of its work programme. [121636]

Mr. Caborn: The EU objectives for a future round of trade negotiations remain as set out in the October 1999 General Affairs Council Conclusions. This was confirmed at the Porto Informal Ministerial for EU Trade Ministers which I attended on 17–18 March. A copy of these Conclusions has been placed in the Library of the House and is also available on the European Commission's website at: www.europa.eu.int/comm/trade/pdf/agr15en.pdf.

The Commission has an ongoing programme to secure the removal of a wide variety of obstacles to EU exports in a range of third country markets by various means, including resort to the WTO disputes settlement procedure.

Miners' Compensation

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in the action for miners' compensation for chest disease, how many claims questionnaires have been sent out by his Department's solicitors; and how many of them have been returned by miners' solicitors in each week from 1 January to the present. [121523]

Mrs. Liddell: In total, to date, the Department's claim handlers have issued 27,372 claims questionnaires to solicitors in England, Wales and Scotland, and of these 11,722 (42.8 per cent.) have been returned. Detailed weekly statistics separately for Claims Questionnaires back to January are not readily available. But the return of full claims packs (consisting of Claims Questionnaires, Financial and Other Loss Questionnaires and Mandates) is monitored. From levels of 200 a week in the early part of the year, these have now risen to around 700 a week currently. This needs to rise to about 1,000 a week as the Medical Assessment Process becomes fully operational.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish for each medical assessment centre set up by Healthcall Services Ltd. for handling miners' compensation claims for chest disease (a) its location and whether it is a hospital, (b) the number of chest consultants employed at the centre in full-time equivalents, (c) the capacity of the centre in terms of the number of medical assessment procedures per month and (d) the total number that have to date undergone medical assessment procedures at the centre. [121522]

Mrs. Liddell: The information is as follows:

Energy Supplies

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of Beacon Gas's practices in respect of taking over consumers' gas supplies. [121444]

Mrs. Liddell: It is for the Director General of Gas and Electricity Supply to monitor the performance of individual suppliers.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what guidance he has given to Ofgem about its treatment of companies that take over consumers' energy supplies without their consent. [121446]

Mrs. Liddell: In 1998, the Government worked with Ofgem in introducing a licence condition governing the sales and marketing practices of gas and electricity suppliers. Under the condition, suppliers are, among other things, required to make all reasonable efforts to confirm that individual customers wish to proceed with a change of supplier. Ofgem recently renewed the condition for a further two years, and is currently consulting on enhancing it by requiring suppliers to have effective management of their sales agents; ensuring that gas, as well as electricity, suppliers provide customers with copies of the terms and conditions of contracts entered into over the telephone; extending coverage of the condition to sales undertaken in public places and to certain sales over the internet; and requiring suppliers to take steps to ensure that the customer understands that he has entered into a contract.

The Government support these proposals to give additional protection to consumers. The Utilities Bill currently before Parliament would allow Ofgem to impose financial penalties for breaching the licence condition, including infringements relating to involuntary transfer.

Electricity Trading Arrangements

Mrs. Gilroy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress in implementing the new electricity trading arrangements. [122510]

Mr. Byers: Implementation of the new electricity trading arrangements is planned to take place this autumn in the period following the change from British Summer Time to Greenwich Mean Time on 29 October. The project remains on target. A contract with Logica for the central computer systems has now been agreed which specifies 21 November 2000 for the new market to be implemented.

Parental Leave

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received on the introduction of paid parental leave. [120974]

Mr. Alan Johnson: From the start of the consultation on the Maternity and Parental Leave Regulations on 4 August 1999, we have received over 300 representations in support of paid parental leave.

As announced in the Budget speech, we will be undertaking a review of parental leave and maternity pay. The findings of the review will contribute to our future thinking on this issue.

Minimum Wage

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the change in the total number of (a) full-time equivalent employees and (b) hours worked due to the introduction of the minimum wage; and if he will make a statement. [121745]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The second report of the Low Pay Commission, published in February 2000, looked at these matters but found no indication so far of significant effects on the economy as a whole as a result of the introduction of the national minimum wage. Some sectors have been affected more than others and this is dealt with in detail in the report.

The Low Pay Commission continues to monitor and evaluate the implementation of the national minimum wage and is due to report again by July 2001.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the (a) absolute and (b) proportional gross impact of the minimum wage on hourly wage rates for employees who were previously paid below the minimum wage; and if he will make a statement. [121744]

Mr. Alan Johnson: According to the second report of the Low Pay Commission, the average increase in hourly earnings in the year to April 1999 for those earning below minimum wage rates in April 1998 was between 18 and 31 per cent.

Domestic Fuels

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what price elasticities of demand for domestic fuels were used in the document entitled "Energy Projections for the UK, Working Paper, March 2000"; and if he will make a statement. [121747]

Mrs. Liddell: The long run price elasticities of demand for domestic fuel implied in the working paper "Energy Projections for the UK, March 2000" are given in the table. This paper represents work in progress, on which comments have been invited.

Fuel	Price elasticity
Electricity	−0.29
Gas	−0.35
Oil	−0.22
Solid fuel	−1.46

The table is interpreted in the following way:

The electricity price elasticity implies that, in the long run, for a 10 per cent. increase in the price of electricity, demand for electricity would be expected to decrease by 2.9 per cent.

Civil Servants (Relocation)

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which relocation companies his Department has used when relocating civil servants since May 1997. [122295]

Dr. Howells: Since May 1997, the Department has used only one company for relocating civil servants, Bradford and Bingley Relocation Services (before March 1999, known as Black Horse Relocation Services).

Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to improve access to finance for small businesses through the Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme. [122074]

Ms Hewitt: David Irwin, Chief Executive of the Small Business Service, will be taking a close look at the problems faced by small businesses in accessing finance and what improvements might be made to existing forms of financial support provided by the Small Business Service, including the Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme. To assist this work the Small Business Service will shortly be setting up a dedicated finance division.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

UK Veto

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those areas of policy where the United Kingdom would lose its veto if the Commission proposals in Com(2000)34 were adopted. [120812]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 5 May 2000]: The Commission's opinion Com(2000)34 is not an agenda for the intergovernmental conference. Only member states can make changes to voting procedures in the Treaty. The Government will consider the possible extension of qualified majority voting on a case-by-case basis. When it is in Britain's interests to support QMV, we shall do so. However, where key national interests are at stake—such as on treaty changes, border controls, social security, taxation, own resources and defence—we shall insist on retaining unanimity.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the areas of policy where the United Kingdom has a veto over EU proposals. [120813]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 5 May 2000]: There are 73 articles and sub-articles subject to unanimity in the main EU Treaties. I have placed a complete list in the House of Commons Library.

"Your Britain, Your Europe"

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what level of response was anticipated to the questionnaire on the "Your Britain, Your Europe" campaign; and what plans he has to issue further questionnaires. [121513]

Mr. Vaz: Although we distributed almost 7,000 copies of the "Your Britain, Your Europe" leaflet, we have no level of anticipation on the response numbers. We have no plans to issue any further questionnaires in the near future.

EU Postcards

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many copies of the postcard, "50 years of solidarity, property and peace" have been printed by the European Union; for what purpose; at what cost; and if he will make a statement. [121495]

Mr. Vaz: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the office of the European Commission in London.

Belarus

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Government policy towards human rights in Belarus; and what representations he has made to the Government of Belarus on this issue. [121494]

Mr. Vaz: Her Majesty's Government regularly raise our concerns over the human rights situation in Belarus with the Belarusian authorities. Our Embassy in Minsk is in close contact with human rights groups, trades unions and members of the Belarusian opposition. Embassy officials have been attending trials of members of the Belarusian opposition including the ongoing trial against

Mr. Chigir, former Prime Minister. During 2000, we have funded visits to the UK by two members of the Belarusian Independent Trade Unions. Mr. Vyachorka, Chairman of the BPF-Renewal party, will visit the UK next week for a series of meetings. Mr. Sharetsky, Speaker of the 13th Supreme Soviet (former Parliament disbanded by President Lukashenko in 1996), is planning to visit the UK in early June and will have meetings with senior officials.

EU policy towards Belarus is based around the General Affairs Council Conclusions of September 1997 which substantially restrict relations pending demonstrable improvements on constitutional and human rights matters. The EU has made a number of representations to the Government of Belarus including, most recently, a Declaration deploring the use of force by the Belarusian authorities to suppress an opposition-organised march in March 2000 and a formal representation on human rights concerns in April 2000.

Cyprus

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Government policy in relation to the demand made by Mr. Denktash for recognition of Northern Cyprus as a pre-condition to discussions on the future of Cyprus. [121474]

Mr. Vaz: The UN proximity talks being held under the auspices of the UN Secretary-General are taking place on the basis of no pre-conditions. The UK continues to urge both parties to adhere to this important principle. The Government look to the Cypriot parties and all those with an interest in Cyprus to co-operate with Kofi Annan constructively and flexibly.

UN Millennium Summit

Ms Kingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans his Department is making to contribute to the UN Millennium Summit in September. [121516]

Mr. Hain: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has worked hard to build international support for the UN Secretary-General's proposals for the Millennium Summit. We intend to publicise his recently published Millennium Report on the Foreign and Commonwealth Office website and to invite feedback on it. We helped fund a forum organised by the United Nations Association which sought to frame UK national civil society input to the UN's Millennium events. With DfID, we are also helping finance the Millennium Forum—the civil society companion event to the Summit.

EU Working Groups

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will deposit in the Library a list of all the (a) current and (b) temporarily suspended working groups of the European Union, listing in each case (i) the mandate of and (ii) the grade of participants in each group; what is on the agenda of each group; which groups have been attended by a United Kingdom Minister for at least one meeting since 1 May 1997; and if he will make a statement on his policy on openness in such groups. [121511]

Mr. Vaz: I refer the hon. Member to earlier questions on this subject from my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George), on 9 March 1999, Official Report, column 179W; from the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Boarder (Mr. Maclean), on 22 March 1999, Official Report, column 57W; and from Lord Pearson of Rannock, on 3 December 1998, Official Report, House of Lords, column WA56, and on 5 April 2000, Official Report, House of Lords, column WA137. None of the 28 Common Foreign and Security Policy Working Groups is suspended. The United Kingdom is represented by officials, with the necessary expertise, of varying grade, depending on the importance of the issues being discussed. No Working Group has been attended by a Minister. The Government favour the maximum possible transparency in all areas of EU business, including Common Foreign and Security Policy, and have consequently introduced procedures for the parliamentary scrutiny of all Common Foreign and Security Policy Common Positions and Joint Actions, and other politically important documents. The preparatory discussions within Working Groups are confidential, in order to preserve the negotiating position of the individual member state.

Ranger Anti-personnel Mines (DRC)

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received of the use of Ranger anti-personnel mines in the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. [121979]

Mr. Hain: We have received no reports of the use of Ranger anti-personnel mines in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

Penalty Clauses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the contracts entered into with private sector companies for the provision of goods or services since May 1997 where penalty clauses were triggered for non-performance; and if he will make a statement. [122019]

Mr. Hain: Penalty clauses are not legally enforceable, but the FCO does include liquidated damages clauses in its contracts when this is appropriate. The FCO has a large number of contracts in operation at any one time, but details are not held centrally. A record of contracts where liquidated damages clauses had been enforced could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Diamonds (Sierra Leone)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals he has to work with other countries to block the sale on the world market of diamonds illegally mined in Sierra Leone. [121833]

Mr. Hain: We have taken a leading role internationally in arguing for measures to improve the transparency of the international diamond trade and prevent the proceeds from illicit diamond trading fuelling conflict, including in Sierra Leone. In doing so, we have consulted a number of countries in Africa and elsewhere. At the forthcoming meeting of G8 Foreign Ministers we will be pressing for agreement on further steps, including consideration of an international system to keep such diamonds out of the market.

Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he has taken to persuade (a) Israel, (b) India, (c) Pakistan and (d) Cuba to accede to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. [121945]

Mr. Hain: Ministers and officials regularly raise this issue with the countries concerned. At the ongoing Non-Proliferation Treaty Review Conference the need for universal ratification of the NPT has been stressed in a number of documents, including the statement by the five Nuclear Weapons States and the EU Common Position and Statement.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library each of the documents (a) produced by Her Majesty's Government or (b) referring to United Kingdom nuclear and non-proliferation policy, distributed by official delegations to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty Review Conference in New York on 24 April to 19 May. [121944]

Mr. Hain: We shall arrange for documents circulated by the UK delegation at the NPT Review Conference to be placed in the Library. We shall also place a copy of the final document of the Review Conference in the Library when it is available. This will contain all the documents issued at the Conference.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 8 May 2000, Official Report, column 257W, what evidence he has evaluated of the extent of the financial interests of President Mugabe in OSLEG Private Ltd. [121617]

Mr. Hain: We have no information on President Mugabe's interests, or otherwise, in OSLEG Private Ltd.

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what estimate he has made of the amount of unallocated land which the Government of Zimbabwe currently holds. [121349]

Clare Short: I have been asked to reply.

The Government of Zimbabwe have not published details of unallocated land. It has been unofficially estimated that the Government owed 300,000 hectares of former commercial land farm land that has not been resettled.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Disabled People

13. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the Government's policies towards the disabled. [120950]

Mr. Bayley: We are committed to providing support and opportunities for all disabled people. We are introducing comprehensive and enforceable civil rights for disabled people and we are modernising the welfare system to help disabled people work and to provide better support for those in greatest need.

Local Exchange Trading Schemes

14. Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to introduce a benefits disregard for local exchange trading schemes. [120951]

Angela Eagle: We welcome initiatives to improve social inclusion and want to remove unjustified obstacles to greater community participation where that will contribute to our overall welfare to work goals.

LETS schemes can help promote community participation and we are, therefore, carefully considering whether changes are needed to the treatment of credits earned through participation in LETS.

Housing Benefit Fraud

15. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress he has made in tackling Housing Benefit fraud. [120952]

16. Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on progress in tackling Housing Benefit fraud. [120954]

Angela Eagle: I refer the hon. Members to the oral answer I gave to the right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) earlier today, Official Report, columns 5–6.

Invalid Care Allowance

17. Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to reform Invalid Care Allowance. [120956]

Mr. Bayley: We are aware of the need for adequate financial support for carers. Our National Strategy for Carers, published last year, committed us to keep under review the financial support available to carers, including Invalid Care Allowance, and we are continuing to do that.

Basic State Pension

18. Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the number of people entitled to, but awaiting, their first payment of basic state pension. [120957]

Mr. Rooker: No estimate has been made of the number of people entitled to but awaiting their first payment of basic state pension.

Most new claims to Retirement Pension each year result from people being invited to claim by the Department some four months before they reach pension age. This enables the majority of claims to be paid by the time the first pension pay day is reached.

The calculation of the various components that can make up a Retirement Pension award is made by the NIRS2 computer. Although there have been problems in NIRS2 calculating the additional pension for some claims, this has not applied to the basic pension calculation.

Housing Benefit Reform

19. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the operation of the Housing Benefit system and his proposals for reform. [120958]

24. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals he has to reform Housing Benefit. [120966]

Angela Eagle: We intend to reform Housing Benefit to improve customer service through a modernised streamlined system, to tackle fraud and error, and to reduce the barriers to work. We have already made significant progress; our Housing Green Paper, currently out for consultation, sets out how we can take this further.

We are determined to deal with the weaknesses of the system we inherited from the previous Administration.

Minimum Income Guarantee

21. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what impact the minimum income guarantee will have on incentives to save for low earners. [120961]

Mr. Bayley: One of the Government's main objectives is to encourage people to save more for their retirement where they can afford to do so, while at the same time providing extra State support for those who cannot save.

We are introducing new stakeholder pensions and reforming SERPS through the State Second Pension. These reforms will mean that, in future, people with a lifetime of working behind them will get a large enough pension to take them above the MIG, even if they have been on low earnings throughout their life. However, it takes time to build up pension entitlements, so for many, particularly those who have already retired or who are close to retirement age, these reforms come too late. That is why we introduced the MIG to make sure that the poorest pensioners are guaranteed a basic decent income in retirement, even before stakeholder pensions and the Second State Pension mature.

We recently announced an increase in the MIG capital limits to make sure that people with relatively modest savings do not lose out. We want to do more to encourage savers. In the last Budget, the Chancellor announced that we propose to consult on a new Pensioner Credit which will do just that.

Our pensions reforms should be looked at as a package. We believe the package strikes the right balance between encouraging savers, while protecting those who cannot save.

26. Dr. George Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners in North-West Norfolk he estimates will benefit from the minimum income guarantee for pensioners in (a) 1999–2000 and (b) 2000–01. [120968]

Mr. Bayley: Around 3,500 pensioners in North-West Norfolk benefited from the minimum income guarantee last year.

For this year we estimate that around 1.5 million pensioners across Great Britain will benefit from the minimum income guarantee. This information is not available at local level.

27. Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement about the take-up of the minimum income guarantee for pensioners. [120969]

Mr. Bayley: We have recently announced our plans for an ambitious national take-up campaign for the minimum income guarantee. Starting from the end of this month there will be intense activity on a number of fronts; including television advertising, writing to around 2 million pensioners and a new tele-claim centre which allows pensioners to make a claim over the telephone.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of pensioners entitled to minimum income guarantee are receiving it. [120947]

Mr. Darling: Estimates on the numbers of pensioners in receipt of the minimum income guarantee (MIG) are to be found in the DSS report "Income Related Benefits: Estimates of Take-Up, 1996/97 and 1997/98". A copy has been placed in the Library.

To encourage pensioners to take up their entitlement we have launched a national helpline which has already received nearly 31,000 calls in the last five weeks, and we are launching a national TV advertising campaign on 30 May. We are determined that as many pensioners as possible get the MIG to which they are entitled.

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how changes in Government spending since 1997 have affected the incomes of (a) poorer pensioners and (b) pensioners with small savings. [120960]

Mr. Rooker: The minimum income guarantee benefits around 1.5 million of the least well off pensioners.

From April the rates increased to £78.45 for a single pensioner this represents an extra £5 a week in real terms since 1998.

By increasing the minimum income guarantee in line with earnings, more and more pensioners with modest pensions and savings are benefiting. With an extra 92,000 cases becoming newly entitled to the MIG since April 1999.

From next April, the planned changes to capital limits will mean that pensioners with savings up to £12,000 will be entitled to the guarantee. Our estimate is that this will benefit a further 500,000 pensioners.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the loss of benefits suffered per week by a pensioner who is entitled to minimum income guarantee but is not receiving it. [120955]

Mr. Bayley: The latest estimates were published in the DSS report "Income Related Benefits: Estimates of Take-Up, 1996/97 and 1997/98". A copy has been placed in the Library.

Paternity Tests

22. Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what provision is available for a mother to demand a second DNA test to determine the father of her child. [120962]

Angela Eagle: If a man who is named by a parent with care denies that he is the father of a child, the Child Support Agency will normally offer DNA tests to the parties involved.

The DNA testing company has rigorous and secure procedures for carrying out these tests. If a parent with care refuses to accept the outcome of the DNA tests, it is open to her to apply to court for a declaration of parentage which would be binding on the CSA.

Benefit Fraud

23. Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent representations he has received regarding fraud in the Social Security system. [120963]

Mr. Rooker: We are determined to combat fraud and error in the Social Security system. We have a comprehensive strategy, to safeguard the system from the first to the final payment. For example, we are insisting claimants produce more evidence before Income Support is paid, which will save £1 billion over the Parliament. This comprehensive strategy will help to strengthen public confidence, and thereby encourage their support.

Pensioner Incomes

25. Mr. Borrow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received on assistance for pensioners with small occupational pensions; and if he will make a statement. [120967]

Mr. Rooker: We have received a considerable number of representations from this group over the years. Following the current success of the Minimum Income Guarantee our concern is to develop initiatives that will reward work and savings. That is why we are starting development work on a new pensioner credit that will better help those pensioners with small second pensions and modest savings who have worked hard to provide for themselves in their retirement.

SERPS

28. Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received about the proposed scheme for providing redress to those who were not informed about the benefit changes to SERPS. [120970]

Mr. Rooker: As the House was informed on the 15 March, we will introduce a scheme to give redress to those who received and relied on wrong or incomplete advice given by this Department in relation to the SERPS additional pension their spouses would inherit. The House was also informed that we would consult widely before bringing forward regulations setting out the detail of the Scheme.

In addition to the reports from the NAO and the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, the Department has received representations from Age Concern, NACAB, Help the Aged and the noble Lord Rix, and from a number of members of the public.

Pensioners (Departmental Spending)

29. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of GDP his Department's spending on people of above pensionable age represented in (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1997–98. [120972]

Mr. Rooker: Social security expenditure on people aged over 60 was 5.33 per cent. of GDP in 1996–97, and 5.23 per cent. in 1997–98.

Occupational Pensions (Taxable Allowances)

30. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the annual cost of providing that the state pension should not count against taxable allowances in respect of occupational pensions. [120973]

Mr. Rooker: The cost of exempting the basic state pension from income tax is estimated to be £2.2 billion in 2000–01.

Older Benefit Claimants

31. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals he has to encourage older benefit claimants back into employment. [120975]

Mr. Rooker: We have developed a range of measures to help older benefit recipients return to work.

The New Deal 50plus was launched by the Prime Minister at the beginning of April. It is the first major national programme of back to work help for older people and has the potential to bring back into the labour market thousands of people with the skills and expertise employers need.

New Deal 50plus is a voluntary programme available for people over age 50 who have been on Jobseeker's Allowance, Incapacity Benefit, Severe Disablement Allowance or Income Support for at least six months. It provides support from a personal adviser, jobsearch help, in-work training support worth £750 and a tax free Employment Credit of £60 a week for up to a year for those taking up full-time work, or £40 a week for those taking part-time work.

In addition the New Deal for Disabled People, which includes a large proportion of older benefit recipients, provides active help and encouragement for people with long-term illnesses or disabilities to move back into work.

The Performance and Innovation Unit Report "Winning the Generation Game" includes a number of recommendations for improving people's opportunity to contribute to society and the economy in their later working years. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security, will be carrying forward these recommendations in his role as Cabinet Champion for Older People and Chair of the Ministerial Group on Older People.

Appeal Tribunals (Medical Members)

Mr. Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement about the appointment of part-time sessional doctors engaged by Medical Services (SEMA) and Nestor Disability Analysis Ltd. as medical members of appeal tribunals. [120938]

Mr. Bayley: My noble Friend the Lord Chancellor appoints appeal tribunal members. The qualification requirements for appointment are set out in regulations and do not exclude SEMA and NESTOR doctors.

We laid an amendment regulation on 10 May to reinforce current Appeals Service instructions which preclude doctors from hearing an appeal in which they have previously given advice or prepared reports on a claimant's medical condition.

Child Poverty

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 3 April 2000, Official Report, column 334W, concerning child poverty, what measures he will use to judge performance against his target of halving child poverty in 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [121846]

Mr. Bayley: I refer the hon. Member to the written answer which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave to the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) on 19 October 1999, Official Report, column 486W.

Further details on all the indicators in the "Opportunity for All" report have been placed in the Library.

Bereavement Allowances

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his Department's policy on the benefit position of widowers with dependent children prior to the introduction of the new system of bereavement allowances, following recent judgments in the European Court. [122107]

Angela Eagle: Our obligation, following the friendly settlement of two cases before the European Court of Human Rights, is to future widowers. Our reforms meet this obligation and go further. Widowed Parents Allowance will be available to men who were widowed before the introduction of the benefit. Existing widowed fathers who meet the entitlement conditions may receive Widowed Parent's Allowance from the date it is introduced.

New Deal

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he has taken to ensure that women seeking to enter the labour market will benefit from the new deal. [120953]

Angela Eagle: The new deal programmes provide individually tailored advice and opportunities for each client. This ensures that everyone seeking to enter the labour market, men and women, will benefit from the new deal.

Means-tested Benefits

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the number of people who no longer receive (a) one and (b) more than one means-tested benefit due to the introduction of the minimum wage; and if he will make a statement. [121743]

Angela Eagle: It is estimated that there are 50,000 people who no longer receive one of Income Support, Housing Benefit or Council Tax Benefit as a result of the introduction of the minimum wage and there are 10,000 people who no longer receive more than one of these benefits.

Notes:

1. Estimates based on 1997–98 Family Resources Survey Data, uprated to 2000–01 prices and benefit rates. Minimum wage and benefit receipt have been modelled with the Policy Simulation Model.

2. Estimates rounded to the nearest 10,000.

3. Estimates are based on minimum wage rates when it was introduced (£3.60 for those aged over 21 and £3.00 for those aged 18–21).

4. Estimates assume no secondary effects on employment or wages.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the proportion of recipients of (a) Council Tax Benefit, (b) Housing Benefit and (c) other means-tested benefits who are paid within (i) 5 per cent. and (ii) 10 per cent. of the minimum wage; and if he will make a statement. [121746]

Angela Eagle: Actual data on hourly earnings of those in receipt of means-tested benefits from administrative sources are not available. However, it is estimated that 6 per cent. of Housing Benefit recipients, 3 per cent. of Council Tax Benefit recipients and 3 per cent. of Income Support recipients are paid within 5 per cent. of the minimum wage. It is also estimated that 7 per cent. of Housing Benefit recipients, 3 per cent. of Council Tax recipients and 3 per cent. of Income Support recipients earn within 10 per cent. of the minimum wage.

Notes:

1. Estimates based on 1997–98 Family Resources Survey data, uprated to 2000–01 prices and benefit rates. Minimum wage and benefit receipt has been modelled within the Policy Simulation Model.

2. Estimates give individuals earning between the minimum wage and 5 or 10 per cent. above the minimum wage who are in a benefit unit receiving the means-tested benefit as a proportion of all adults in benefit units in receipt of the benefit. No account has been taken of overlapping receipt of means tested benefits.

3. Estimates are based on minimum wage rates when it was introduced (£3.60 for those aged over 21 and £3.00 for those aged 18–21).

4. Estimates assume no secondary effects on employment or wages.

Early Retirement

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent representations he has received on his policy in relation to pension provision for those over 50 years old who take early retirement; and if he will make a statement. [120948]

Mr. Rooker: None. Under the present policy employees may retire early and draw an immediate pension from age 50 if their employer agrees. We will be consulting very widely before any decisions are made to change this policy.

Vaccinations (Compensation)

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what compensation has been paid to children who have suffered severe damage by vaccinations since 1970; [122160]

(2) what outstanding cases for compensation for severe damage resulting from childhood vaccinations there are; and what measures he is taking to draw these claims to a close. [122156]

Mr. Bayley: The Vaccine Damage payment scheme, which has been in place since 1979, provides a one-off payment to people severely disabled by vaccination against certain diseases. The scheme is not intended as compensation but is designed to ease the burdens of those suffering from vaccine damage, and their families. During the first six years of the scheme claims were accepted from people who had received vaccinations at any stage since 1948 (the creation of the NHS). The amounts payable since the inception of the scheme are as follows:

£10,000 for claims made from 9 May 1978 until 15 August 1985
£20,000 for claims made on or after 16 August 1985
£30,000 for claims made on or after 15 April 1991
£40,000 for claims made on or after 1 July 1998.

There are 29 claims for Vaccine Damage Payments outstanding and one awaiting a reconsideration. There are 46 appeals awaiting hearing with the Appeals Service. All cases are being actively considered by the Department's Vaccine Damage Payments Unit or the Appeals Service as appropriate.

Post Offices

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will place in the Library a copy of the letter from the Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) to the Post Office, instructing sub-postmasters not to issue forms encouraging customers to opt for benefit payment at post offices. [122236]

Mr. Rooker: I have written no such letter.

I did recently write a private letter to Colin Baker (General Secretary of the National Federation of Sub-postmasters) about payment of benefits by automated credit transfer. However, it is not Government policy to make private letters such as this public.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the documents and publications produced by his Department and Agencies that are available at sub-post offices. [121625]

Mr. Rooker: The following leaflets have been distributed to all post offices in Great Britain:

Leaflet
Benefit Rates	(Leaflet GL23)
Financial Help If You Work Or Are Looking For Work	(WK1)

"You Have A Choice" is a joint leaflet produced with the Post Office to advise customers on the payment of benefits.

In addition posters have been distributed for display. Which posters are displayed depends on whether a Post Office Point Of Sale (POPOS) display board and viewing area are available in the post office. The distributed posters are:

Poster
Social Security Benefit Rates	(GL23P)
Lone Parents	(LP20P)
Fraud Hotline Poster	(NBFH0300)
Help With Your Rent and Council Tax	(GL16/17P)

Welsh bilingual versions of all leaflets and posters are available in Wales.

Taxes and Benefits

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide illustrative examples of cases where taxes and benefits interact to produce a replacement ratio of (a) 70 per cent. and above, (b) 80 per cent. and above, (c) 90 per cent. and above, and (d) 100 per cent. and above on the same basis as figure 36 in the departmental report, Cm 4614, p.80. [120383]

Mr. Rooker: Replacement ratios in Figure 36 of the latest departmental report were calculated by micro-simulation modelling, using a sample of households from the 1996–97 Family Resources Survey. The examples are drawn from the sample underpinning the latest estimates, for 1999–2000. They are shown by 10 per cent. bands. As in Figure 36, the examples are for the head of household only where the head of the household works 30 hours or more a week, and are based on income levels after housing costs.

70 per cent. to 79 per cent. ratio: a single person with no children and an in work income after income tax (£5), National Insurance contributions (£5) and housing costs (£41) of £71 per week, and an income out of work from contributory Jobseeker's Allowance of £51 (replacement ratio 73 per cent.).

80 per cent. to 89 per cent. ratio: a single person with no children and an in work income after income tax (£4), National Insurance contributions (£5) and housing costs (£48) of £64 per week, and an income out of work from contributory Jobseeker's Allowance of £51 (replacement ratio 81 per cent.).

90 per cent. to 99 per cent. ratio: the head of household in a benefit unit with two earners and two children and a combined in work income of £389 per week, after income tax (£33), National Insurance contributions (£23) and housing costs (£45), and including Child Benefit (£24) and Family Credit (£4), and an out of work income of £271 per week, including contributory Jobseeker's Allowance (£51), Child Benefit (£24), Family Credit (£78) and the partner's original earnings (£172). (replacement ratio 94 per cent.).

100 per cent. + ratio: the head of household in a couple benefit unit with one earner and one child and a combined in work income of £4 per week, after income tax (£18),

National Insurance contributions (£13) and housing costs (£217), and including Child Benefit (£14), and an out of work income of £7 per week, including contributory Jobseeker's Allowance (£51), income-based Jobseeker's Allowance (£159), Child Benefit (£14). (replacement ratio 186 per cent.).

Pensions

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what co-operation the European Commission is seeking from the Government in respect of (a) its objective of modernising the system of pensions and social protection in member states, and if such modernisation is to extend to applicant member states and (b) its intention to establish a legal framework for supplementary pensions. [121635]

Mr. Rooker: Heads of State and Government agreed at the Lisbon Special Summit in March that social protection systems should be adapted as part of an active welfare state to ensure that work pays, and that they should be sustainable in the long-term in the face of an ageing population. It was agreed at the Summit that the High Level Working Party on social protection, of which the Commission is a member along with representatives from all member states, should arrange a study on the future long-term evolution of social protection, with particular attention on pensions. The Commission has indicated it will produce a new Communication on modernising social protection, concentrating on pensions, later this year. The High Level Working Party is due to produce a progress report on social protection by December at the Nice summit; and a more substantial report for the Spring Council 2001.

In December 1999, in the context of modernising social protection, the Council of Ministers concluded that the Community should pay particular attention to a balanced economic and social development in the applicant countries in the process towards an enlargement of the European Union. The High Level Working Party is considering ways of involving applicant countries in their work.

The Commission's Communication "Financial Services: Implementing the Framework for Financial Markets: Action Plan" (COM(1999)232) noted that the Commission would propose a Directive on the prudential supervision of pension funds. The Commission has held informal discussions with member states.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been (1) the highest compensation payment paid to date by the Child Support Agency; [121475]

(2) the total amount of money paid by way of compensation payments by the Child Support Agency. [121476]

Angela Eagle: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mrs. Faith Boardman. She will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Faith Boardman to Mr. Tom Cox, dated May 2000:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Questions to the Secretary of State for Social Security about compensation payments paid by the Child Support Agency.

In common with other DSS Agencies, the CSA operates a discretionary "special payments" scheme to compensate customers for actual financial losses, or any suffering and distress caused in cases of maladministration. For CSA these arrangements cover maintenance lost to a parent with care (PWC), as well as expenses incurred by PWCs or non-resident parents (NRPs) in dealing with the Agency. It is also possible to make consolatory payments in recognition of the less tangible effects of maladministration, such as inconvenience, embarrassment and the worry and distress that can result from delay and errors.

The largest individual amount of compensation paid was £27,393.60. This figure did not include any consolatory element but represented monies due to a parent with care, which would have been paid by the non-resident parent, had it not been for the Agency's maladministration. It also included a payment for loss of use of monies (interest). Each case is considered on its own merits and payments of this magnitude are particularly exceptional. The average payment during 1998/99 was £795.

The largest individual consolatory payment is £1,150, however, on average this type of payment is around £133.

Since its inception, the Agency has made compensation payments to a value of £8.6 million (figure to end February 2000). During 1998/99 the Agency paid out £4.3 million in compensation payments. Evidence this year shows that this amount is falling. From April 1999 to the end of February 2000 the Agency had paid out £2.4 million for the 1999/2000 financial year. The main reason why this figure was so high in recent years is that the Agency has been clearing the backlog of cases that had built up during the early years of its operations. As the Agency is now more up to date with its work, payments of this scale are unlikely to recur.

I hope this is helpful.

Disability Benefits

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many representations he has received from hon. Members with regard to constituents who had been awarded disability benefit for life but have subsequently had it withdrawn or downgraded; and if he will make a statement. [121927]

Mr. Bayley: Prior to 12 January 2000 the legislation that applied to Disability Living Allowance (DLA) allowed awards to be made for life or for a limited period. Although some awards were therefore given "for life", this terminology was misleading because the law has always allowed for awards of DLA to be altered where, for example:

(a) a person's care or mobility needs had increased or reduced;

(b) there had either been a mistake, or ignorance regarding the relevant facts; or

(c) there had been an error of law.

These rules are the same as those that apply to changes of almost all Social Security benefits. However the "life award" terminology in DLA was in this respect anomalous and created uncertainty. As a result, many representations were received from hon. Members on behalf of constituents who had been given life awards which were subsequently withdrawn or downgraded.

To help clarify the nature of these awards, references to awards made for life were removed from the legislation by the Welfare Reform and Pensions Act 1999, and replaced with the words "indefinite award".

This made the language used consistent with that which applies to other benefits. This change was welcomed by the Social Security Select Committee in its third report of the 1998–99 session.

Although the terminology has been changed to help clarify the situation, indefinite awards are made in the same circumstances in which a life award would previously be made. The rules that apply when an indefinite award is altered are the same that applied to life awards.

TREASURY

Tax (People over 65)

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of tax revenues have been paid by people aged 65 years and above in each year since 1979. [121015]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 5 May 2000]: It is possible to provide reliable and appropriate estimates only for income tax and capital gains tax, and only for years after 1990–91 following the introduction of independent taxation. The estimates are given in the table.

Liabilities for individual income tax and capital gains tax payers: proportion relating to those aged 65 years and above

1990–91	9.2
1991–92	9.1
1992–93	8.3
1993–94	7.5

1996–97	7.7
1998–99[1]	8.4
1999–2000[1]	7.6

The estimates are based on the Survey of Personal Incomes, the capital gains tax assessments and Self Assessment extracts. The provisional estimates are consistent with the March 2000 Budget.

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost of increasing the age-related personal allowance for people aged (a) 65 to 74 years and (b) 75 years and over by (i) £500, (ii) £1,000, (iii) £1,500 and (iv) £2,000; and how many people would cease to pay income tax in each case. [121017]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 5 May 2000]: The costs and effects of raising the age-related personal allowances in 2000–01 are shown in the tables:

£ million

Increasing personal allowance by	£500	£1,000	£1,500	£2,000
for 65–74s	–150	–310	–450	–600
for 75s and over	–100	–190	–270	–350

Change in taxpayer numbers in 2000–01

for 65–74s	–170	–310	–450	–600
for 75s and over	–130	–240	–330	–400

The estimates are based on the Survey of Personal Incomes and consistent with the March 2000 Budget.

Carbon Dioxide

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the carbon dioxide which will be saved by his proposals for (a) general vehicle excise duty and (b) company car taxation. [120286]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 2 May 2000]: As indicated in table 6.2 of the 2000 Economic and Fiscal Strategy Report, the reforms to company car taxation (and general vehicle excise duty) announced by the Chancellor in the recent Budget are expected to result in emission savings of up to 1.0 million tonnes of carbon (MtC) by 2010.

ECOFIN

Mr. Hood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the outcome of the ECOFIN Council held in Brussels on 8 May; and if he will make a statement. [121571]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I attended the meeting of the Economic and Finance Council of Ministers on 8 May.

The Council agreed Exceptional Financial Assistance for Montenegro in the form of a 20 million euro grant. This must come from within the existing category IV ceiling.

The Council broadly welcomed the Commission's report on the implementation of the 1999 Broad Economic Policy Guidelines (BEPGs) and the Commission recommendation for the 2000 BEPGs.

The Commission presented its priorities for the 2001 EC Budget. Most Finance Ministers, myself included, rejected proposals to revise the financial perspectives.

The Council reached a political agreement on the amended proposal for a directive on the reorganisation and winding-up of credit institutions. The directive will be adopted once it is clear of all scrutiny reserves, and the final formalities are completed.

The Council agreed and published an opinion on the update to the Austrian stability programme for 2000–03.

The Council took note of a Commission presentation of its strategy to improve the operation of the VAT system.

Banana Dispute

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the effect on tax revenues to the Exchequer of the banana dispute between the EU and the US. [121710]

Miss Melanie Johnson: No estimate has been made.

Climate Change Levy

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the arrangements whereby rebate on the climate change levy will be made available to the horticulture industry. [121773]

Mr. Timms: The administrative arrangements for the repayment of climate change levy to horticultural users will be included in regulations to be published later this year.

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Government will announce the kind of financial incentives they propose to make available to those companies that agree to take on binding emission targets. [R] [121772]

Mr. Timms: In the recent Budget, the Government announced that they see merit in the case put forward by the business led Emissions Trading Group (ETG) that some form of financial incentive will be required for companies to take on binding emission targets that generate additional emission reductions.

Since the Budget, the Government have continued to work closely with the ETG on the many complex issues that remain to be resolved, including the form such a financial incentive might take. Further announcements on financial incentives will depend on the progress the ETG and the Government can make in dealing with these outstanding issues.

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how individual companies in the horticulture sector may apply for rebates for the Climate Change Levy; and on what basis such rebate will be made. [121774]

Mr. Timms: The administrative arrangements for the repayment of climate change levy to horticultural users will be included in regulations to be published later this year.

The basis for the rebate is set out in paragraph 41 of Schedule 6 to the Finance Bill.

EU (UK Contribution)

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the authority is for payment of the UK's contribution to the EU; and how the amount is calculated. [121810]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Authority for payment of UK contributions to the EU is contained in the EC (Finance) Act 1995. Contributions are calculated in accordance with the Decision of the Council of the European Communities on the system of the Communities' Own Resources (31 October 1994). Further information on the Own Resources system can be found at Section E: Community Revenue of the White Paper European Community Finances (Cm 4382).

EU Strategy

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what request for consultation he has received from the Commission of the European Union concerning (a) its intention to consider future strategy for changes to (i) pan-community taxation, (ii) the Customs Union and (iii) changes to the current system of value added tax and (b) the views of the Government on the need for such changes. [121634]

Dawn Primarolo: The Commission, in considering what legislation to propose, consults member states continuously including through established working groups. The Government consider each proposal on its merits and details are lodged with the scrutiny committees.

Eurocheque System

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact of the withdrawal of British banks from the Eurocheque system on the cost and ease of transferring small payments within the European Union by (a) small businesses and (b) private individuals. [121484]

Miss Melanie Johnson: None. There has been an 80 per cent. drop in the use and acceptance of eurocheques in the 1990s. This has been matched by significant growth in the use of alternative methods—automated teller machines, debit cards and credit cards—of making payments and obtaining cash abroad. The Association for Payment Clearing Services, the industry body for the UK's banks and building societies which oversees money transmission systems, have advised that the majority of UK banks are able to offer cost effective alternatives to eurocheques.

Manufacturing Jobs

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many manufacturing jobs have ceased to exist in the United Kingdom since May 1997. [120869]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Estimates of manufacturing jobs are compiled by the Office for National Statistics. I refer my hon. Friend to tables B12 and B18 of Labour Market Trends.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many families are receiving the Working Families Tax Credit; and of these, how many were previously receiving family credit; [121689]

(2) how many Working Families Tax Credit recipients are men in couples where family credit was previously in payment to the female in the couple; and what is the average weekly value of the Working Families Tax Credit in payment in such cases. [121685]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 12 May 2000]: Up to the end of March 2000, there had been 1,030,200 awards made of the Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC). The families in receipt of 574,300 of these awards had previously been in receipt of Family Credit (FC) awards that ended immediately before the start of the WFTC awards.

It is not possible, without incurring disproportionate cost, to estimate how many such WFTC awards are paid to men in couples where the previous FC award was paid to the female in the couple; or the average weekly value of such awards.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average amount by which the incomes of families with incomes of less than £12,000 per annum have increased as a result of the Working Families Tax Credit. [120971]

Dawn Primarolo: For awards of Working Families Tax Credit made by the end of March, the average award made to families with gross weekly earnings up to £230 was £81.53 per week.

Scanning Equipment

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what evaluation he has (a) made and (b) commissioned of the potential health risks from the use of (i) high-energy and (ii) low-energy scanning equipment for the detection of smuggled goods and substances at ports of entry. [121794]

Dawn Primarolo: Before any scanning equipment is used by Customs and Excise, a full health and safety evaluation is carried out by an independent consultant to ensure compliance with all UK health and safety legislation.

Child Care Credit

Mr. Flight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the take-up of the child care credit in the Working Families Tax Credit. [120959]

Dawn Primarolo: The child care tax credit component of the Working Families Tax Credit has been particularly successful, with about 103,000 recipients in awards made to the end of March. At its peak, in August 1999, 47,000 families claimed the child care disregard in Family Credit.

Parliamentary Questions

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to raise the advisory cost limit of £500 for answering written parliamentary questions; and if he will make a statement. [122509]

Mr. Timms: The advisory cost limit was last increased in 1997—21 July 1997, Official Report, column 442W—and is to be further increased to £550 from today.

The purpose and application of the advisory cost limit remains unchanged. It is intended to act as a threshold for disproportionate cost parliamentary questions. Any written question where the marginal cost of preparing the answer is considered likely to exceed the threshold may be refused in whole or in part on the grounds of disproportionate cost. Alternatively the Minister may decide that the question is to be answered irrespective of cost. There is no advisory limit for oral questions.

The advisory limit continues to be based on eight times the average marginal cost for written questions, which is now £70, rounded down to the nearest £50 for convenience of application.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the average cost of answering (a) oral and (b) written parliamentary questions in the last three months. [122070]

Mr. Timms: As at April 1999, the latest date for which information is available, the average cost of answering an oral and written parliamentary question was £282 and £121 respectively.

State Pension

Mr. Stevenson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer further to his oral statement of 21 March 2000, Official Report, column 867, if the increases in the basic state pension forecast will be the minimum applied irrespective of the retail price index for September 2000. [120604]

Mr. Rooker: I have been asked to reply.

As our right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said in his budget statement on 21 March:

> Based on forecast rates of inflation, we can expect the pension rise in 2001 to be more than £2 for single pensioners and over £3 for couples—[Official Report, 21 March 2000; Vol. 346, c. 867.]

Our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is required to review rates of benefit annually, the outcome of that review will be announced in the Autumn as normal.

European Institute of Public Administration

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the (a) level of public funding, (b) purpose and (c) United Kingdom-sponsored activities of the European Institute of Public Administration. [121503]

Mr. Vaz: I have been asked to reply.

The UK subscription to EIPA for the financial year 1999–2000 was 97,000 euros, equivalent to £67,550.

The EIPA is a non-profit making organisation, which serves public administration in member states of the European Union. It supports the practical management of European integration through the provision of training, applied research and consultancy at a European level as a complement to national and subnational programmes. It is also dedicated to supporting the process of the accession of future member states to the European Union. EIPA is currently undertaking a review of its structure and activities which is due to report in June.

There are no specific UK sponsored activities of the EIPA but the UK plays a full part in its activities by sending delegates to courses and seminars and through the Director of Recruitment and People Development in the Cabinet Office sitting in both the EIPA Board of Governors and the Review Committee.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Metropolitan Police Area Crime Rate

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department by how much crime rose in the Metropolitan police area during the year to 31 March; and if he will make a statement. [122093]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that the total number of notifiable offences in the Metropolitan police district for the year ending 31 March 2000 was some 12.6 per cent. higher than that in the previous financial year.

Chinese President (State Visit)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will deposit in the Library a copy of the Metropolitan Police Service's report on Policing during the Chinese state visit; what input Government Departments had to the report; and if he will make a statement. [121497]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Metropolitan Police Service's review into the policing arrangements for the state visit by the President of China was put into the public domain on 17 March 2000, and copies were placed in the Library.

The report was written without reference to any person or body outside the Metropolitan Police Service. Government Departments had sight of the report prior to publication.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make a statement on the admission by the Metropolitan police that some of its officers behaved unlawfully during the Chinese state visit of October 1999; [121801]

(2) for what reasons the Metropolitan police's review of policing of the Chinese state visit during October 1999 did not identify behaviour that it later found to be unlawful. [121800]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand that the statement made by the Metropolitan police in the context of court proceedings was based on further legal advice concerning the powers available to them under the byelaws applying in the Royal Parks.

This indicated that flags and banners could not be removed from protesters where such items were being used solely for peaceful protest purposes.

The review by the Metropolitan police concerned the operational policing arrangements for the visit and did not benefit from the additional legal advice.

Illegal Entrants

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 8 May 2000, Official Report, columns 310–11W, on persons served with notice as clandestine illegal entrants, if he will indicate in each case how many of such persons have claimed asylum. [121572]

Mrs. Roche: Precise information on the numbers of those persons issued with notice of illegal entry as clandestine entrants who had also claimed asylum is not contained in the central records and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

However, it is possible to deduce from the available data that at least 81 per cent. of those clandestine illegal entrants who were issued with a notice of illegal entry between 1 April 1999 and 31 March 2000 had also applied for asylum. It should be noted that this is a bare minimum and the actual percentage may well be higher than this.

Rape and Sexual Assault

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 21 December 2000, Official Report, column 416W, on rape and sexual assault, when the Sexual Offences Review will report; and when the proposals will be published for consultation. [121694]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The sexual offences review has completed its work and reported to Ministers. I hope that its proposals will be published for consultation shortly.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 21 December 1999, Official Report, column 478W, on rape and sexual assault, what organisations have provided submissions to the Review of Sexual Offences relating to the law and rape including psychological and physical impact of rape on victims. [121695]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The following organisations provided submissions and evidence to the review in relation to the law on rape and sexual assault:

Action Concern Empathy
University of Cambridge—Institute of Criminology
Campaign to End Rape
English Collective of Prostitutes
Europap
Grimsby and Scunthorpe Rape Crisis
Harrogate and District Women's Aid
Hull Women's Centre
Jewish Care
ManKind
National Association for the Treatment of Offenders
University of North London—Child and Women Abuse Studies
Nottingham Rape Crisis Centre
Rape Crisis Federation of England and Wales
Rape Crisis (North Staffordshire)
St. Mary's Sexual Assault Referral Centre
Sheffield Hallam University—School of Law Soroptimist International South Essex Rape and Incest Crisis Centre
Committee of the Joint Council of Stipendiary Magistrates
The Suzy Lamplugh Trust
University of Teesside—School of Social Sciences
The Tizard Centre
United Kingdom Men's Movement
Women Against Rape
Women's Education Partnership
Wyre Forest Women's Aid
Young Women's Christian Association of Great Britain

In addition the review received many submissions from individuals on the subject of rape and sexual assault.

Domestic Violence

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 21 December 1999, Official Report, column 484W, on domestic violence, if the improvements in systems which will allow the information on domestic assaults to be collated have been made; and if the Office Court Proceedings Database is available on line or in a format available to the public. [121696]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The improvements referred to in the reply were with respect to police systems for recording domestic assaults. These have not yet been made and will be undertaken as part of the work associated with implementation of the National Strategy for Police Information Systems.

Aggregated data from the Court Proceedings Database are published annually in the command paper "Criminal statistics, England and Wales" together with four supplementary volumes. Copies of these publications are available in the Library. Some aggregated data can be found on the Home Office website and more will appear in the future. Detailed information is available on floppy disk in Excel format, this being known as the Home Office Court Appearances System (HOCAS). Copies of the relevant disks are available in the Library.

Corpus Juris

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his policy is regarding Corpus Juris; and if he will make a statement. [121670]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The House of Lords European Union Committee's inquiry into Corpus Juris concluded in May last year that the Corpus Juris proposals do not offer an acceptable way forward. The Government share that view. Although we fully share the objective of the Corpus Juris paper to provide more effective remedies against fraud affecting the European Community budget, the Government do not agree that this should be done by "unifying" the laws and procedures of all member states. We believe that the aims of Corpus Juris can best be achieved by improvements in judicial co-operation between member states as agreed at the Tampere European Council, including mutual recognition of judicial decisions and the creation of Eurojust.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on mutual recognition in relation to Corpus Juris. [121666]

Mr. Charles Clarke: On the basis of a United Kingdom initiative, European Union Heads of Government at the Tampere European Council endorsed the concept of mutual recognition of judicial decisions and stated that it > should become the cornerstone of judicial co-operation in both civil and criminal matters within the Union.

Unlike Corpus Juris, mutual recognition does not involve "unifying" the laws and procedures of the member states of the Union. Decisions taken in other European Union jurisdictions could be recognised and enforced despite the differences in the member states' legal systems.

The Government have made it clear that some agreed safeguards would be necessary in order to protect civil rights; for example for any changes to extradition arrangements between member states. The need for common minimum standards, respecting the fundamental legal principles of member states, was also recognised at Tampere.

Macpherson Report

Ms Kingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action his Department has taken to ensure that policies regarding Roma, gipsies and travellers are included in action plans following the Macpherson report. [121518]

Mr. Straw: In March 1999, I published an Action Plan detailing the Government's response to all 70 recommendations of Sir William Macpherson's Report on the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry. Details of progress on these recommendations can be found in my First Annual Report on Progress on this Action Plan, published in February this year, a copy of which is in the Library. None of the recommendations of the report were specific to particular ethnic or cultural groups, and the action taken has accordingly been targeted equally at all minority ethnic communities.

Roma

Ms Kingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what mechanism he has established to collect data concerning human rights abuses documented against Roma, by country; how many Roma (a) sought asylum in the United Kingdom, by country of origin and (b) had their asylum claims (i) upheld and (ii) denied in the United Kingdom in the last five years. [121519]

Mrs. Roche: The Country Information and Policy Unit in the Immigration and Nationality Directorate obtains from a wide variety of sources information on issues which are raised in the asylum process, including the question of human rights abuses against Roma. Country assessments based on this information are published on the top 35 asylum-producing countries. The assessments are revised and updated every six months.

The majority of Roma asylum seekers in the United Kingdom come from the Czech Republic, Poland and Slovakia. During the period January 1995 to January 1999, there were 2,600 asylum applications from nationals of the Czech Republic. 6,110 asylum applications were received from nationals of Poland and 1,250 received from Slovakia. A visa regime was introduced on 8 October 1998 in respect of Slovakia. During the period January 1995 to May 1999, 490 Czech and 910 Slovak asylum applications were refused. There were no grants of asylum during this period. During the same period 3,355 Polish asylum applications were refused. One or two Polish applicants were granted asylum in each of the years 1996, 1997 and 1998 although our information does not show on what basis asylum was granted. It is not possible to give decisions with a nationality breakdown after May 1999.

Schengen Information System

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 4 May 2000, Official Report, column 209W, on the Schengen Information System, what part that system can play in the fight against crime, fraud and drug trafficking in the European Union; and what constraints exist in the use of this system by member states not within the Schengen arrangements. [121639]

Mrs. Roche: The Schengen Information System exists to support the substantive provisions of the Schengen Implementing Convention, which include police and judicial co-operation between participating member states.

Only those member states which have acceded to the Schengen acquis have access to the Schengen Information System. In accordance with separate arrangements with the European Union member states, Norway and Iceland are also associated with Schengen co-operation, including access to the Schengen Information System.

In line with its application to participate in parts of the Schengen acquis relating to law enforcement and judicial co-operation, the United Kingdom would have access to the corresponding parts of the Schengen Information System database.

Police (Crown Insignia)

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police forces in England and Wales have the Crown as part of the (a) crest and (b) cap badge. [121462]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand that 41 forces in England and Wales incorporate a crown in their crest, and that all 43 do so in their cap badge.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 3 May 2000, Official Report, column 152W, on animal experiments, who funds the programmes looking into the development of treatments for chronic obstructive pulmonary diseases. [121488]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Section 24 of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 prevents disclosure of detailed information about individual research programmes licensed under the Act that has been given in confidence.

Section 24 is being reviewed in the context of the freedom of information legislation.

Animal Procedures

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his policy is on public accessibility of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Inspectorate's databases on cost-benefit assessments. [121958]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To meet section 5(4) of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, any application to use protected animals in research must be subjected to a detailed cost/benefit assessment by Home Office inspectors. The likely adverse effects on the animals concerned must be weighed against the benefit likely to accrue as a result of the proposed programme of work.

Section 24 of the Act currently prohibits the release of an application and the cost/benefit assessment. The status of the inspectors' advice to Ministers, on the basis of the cost/benefit assessment, is being examined as part of our review of section 24 and freedom of information. An electronic database of precedents and key cases is maintained by the Inspectorate for internal reference. This comprises material that has been provided in confidence and its status will also be considered as part of our review.

Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he intends to propose further amendments to the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill. [122287]

Mr. Charles Clarke: As I indicated in the debate on the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill on 8 May 2000, Official Report, columns 608–10, I do intend to add a new Schedule to the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill listing the public authorities which may use directed surveillance and covert sources. There will be other changes related to the use and oversight of these powers in Scotland and Northern Ireland. I also expect a very small number of minor and technical amendments. The Government continue to engage with interested parties, including industry, and look forward to consideration of the Bill by the other place. These discussions may lead to further amendments.

Constabulary Inspectorate

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the manual explaining the new inspection model for HM Inspectorate of Constabulary has been published. [122285]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The manual explaining the new inspection model for Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary has not been published. However, the manual has been sent to all police forces and police authorities and copies have been placed in the Library.

Public Relations and Marketing

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many officials in his Department were engaged in public relations and marketing work in (a) March 1997 and (b) March 2000. [122286]

Mr. Straw: The nearest monthly figures I am able to provide are for April 1997 when there were a total of eight information and senior information officers employed in Home Office Publicity.

There was a total of eight information and senior information officers employed in Home Office Publicity in March 2000.

[2] Due to boundary restructuring applications during the relevant period were not processed until the end of 1999.

The figures have been supplied by the Home Office Research Development and Statistics Directorate.

We are addressing the decline in numbers. In March we funded a two-week national radio and press recruitment campaign at a cost of £700,000. We have commissioned some research into what attracts people to the Special Constabulary to help inform the next phase of recruitment activity. The findings are due shortly. In addition, in the next few months we will be providing better sick pay arrangements for injury on duty and improving expenses and allowances. We will also be introducing a scheme to give special constables access to free legal advice and representation if subject to criminal, civil or disciplinary proceedings.

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many special constables there were in each police force in England and Wales on 31 December 1999. [122301]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The latest date for which figures are available is 30 September 1999. The number of special constables in post in each police force area in England and Wales on that date was:

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the police stations in the Metropolitan police area which (a) closed and (b) reduced hours in 1999. [122288]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that six police stations closed during 1999: Biggin Hill, Chislehurst, Westcombe Park, Collier Row, Lee Road and Barnes. A further six reduced opening hours: Muswell Hill, Highgate, St. Ann's, Brockley, Banstead (now part of Surrey Constabulary) and Tooting.

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the police stations in the Metropolitan police area which are planned (a) to close and (b) to reduce hours in 2000. [122289]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that Putney police station closed in January of this year. No further closures are planned for 2000. Opening hours will be reduced at Shepherd's Bush and Stratford.

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information about wastage and other changes in police numbers, between 30 September 1999 and 31 March 2000, is not yet complete as a number of forces are still to submit returns. Press Officers

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many press officers were employed by his Department in (a) March 1997 and (b) March 2000. [122299]

Mr. Straw: The nearest monthly figures I am able to provide are for April 1997 when there were 14 press officers employed in the Home Office press office. This figure includes one trainee, a Higher Executive Officer and a Chief Immigration Officer on secondment.

As at March 2000 there were 17. This figure includes three trainees, a Chief Immigration Officer and a Higher Executive Officer on secondment to the Home Office Press Office.

Traffic Wardens

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many traffic wardens there have been in the Metropolitan Police Service area in each month since January. [122275]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is given in the table, provided by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Month	Metropolitan Polic Service traffic wardens
January	845
February	837
March	826
April	809

Bramshill National Police Training

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the equal opportunities audit of the Extended Interview Process to attend Bramshill National Police Training will be completed; and if he intends to publish the report. [122282]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The report should be circulated to interested stakeholders in July after validation of the research data.

There are no plans for the report to be published more widely but I will arrange for the hon. Member to receive a copy when it is circulated.

Police (DNA Samples)

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which police forces in England and Wales (a) invites and (b) requires their officers to give DNA samples; and if he will make a statement. [122270]

Mr. Charles Clarke: At the Police Advisory Board meeting on 2 February 2000, agreement was reached on the terms of a protocol governing the establishment of a voluntary Police Personnel DNA Elimination Database to aid the elimination of innocent contamination at crime scenes by front line police staff.

The Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) has written to forces to request the sampling of nominated front line staff by 31 May. All sampling for the Elimination Database is voluntary.

Crime Reduction Partnerships

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to improve the attendance of (a) social services departments and (b) health authorities at meetings of crime reduction partnerships; and if he will make a statement. [122283]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We have put in place a support programme for local crime and disorder reduction partnerships, part of which is aimed at maximising the involvement of all the statutory partners. As an example, we have recently launched a series of conferences organised jointly by the Home Office and the National Health Service Executive, for health service managers to increase awareness of the mutual advantages of partnerships working under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998.

Crime Fighting Fund

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers are planned to be recruited in each police force area under the Crime Fighting Fund in the first two years of the scheme. [122281]

Mr. Straw: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe), on 6 April 2000, Official Report, columns 595–96W. I hope to make the promised announcement shortly.

Police Helicopters

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 8 May 2000, Official Report, column 314W, on police use of helicopters, how many of the 200 arrests led to successful prosecutions. [122237]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Overseas Visitors (Financial Bonds)

Mr. Mudie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will announce (a) the implementation date and (b) the level of financial bonds for overseas visitors. [121714]

Mrs. Roche: The proposed pilot study for financial bonds for visitors will begin in October. I hope to make an announcement on the design of the pilot study, including the level of the financial bond, very soon.

Election Turnouts

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of experiments aimed at increasing voter turnout in elections. [122008]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Under the terms of the Representation of the People Act 2000, responsibility for evaluating the recent electoral pilot schemes rests with the local authorities concerned and we do not wish to prejudge that process.

Early indications are that the all-postal ballot schemes had the most significant impact on voter turnout. However, this is not, of course, the only measure of success: the evaluation reports will also be concerned with such issues as ease of voting and increased administrative efficiency.

London Mayoral Election

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what (a) written and (b) oral instructions were given to voters on how to vote using the supplementary vote system at the election for Mayor of London; whether voters were explicitly informed at any stage that they were not obliged to indicate more than one preference; and if he will make a statement; [121815]

(2) if he, his Ministers or his officials (a) approved and (b) were informed of the wording of the instructions to voters on the supplementary vote system used in the election for Mayor of London that were (i) printed on ballot papers, (ii) displayed in polling stations and (iii) to be given orally to voters; [121959]

(3) what discussions he, his Ministers or his officials have had with, and what representations he has received from (a) the Greater London Returning Officer, (b) Ministers and officials in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and (c) other persons regarding the wording of the instructions used at the election for Mayor of London; and if he will make a statement; [121832]

(4) what assessment he has made of the compatibility of the instruction to voters on the ballot paper and in polling booths to indicate two preferences in the election for Mayor of London with the provisions of the European Convention on Human Rights; for what reason voters were not informed (a) on the ballot paper, (b) in the polling booth and (c) by staff at polling stations that they were not obliged to indicate two preferences; and if he will make a statement. [121818]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The wording to be printed on the Mayoral ballot papers and to be displayed in polling stations was set out in the Greater London Authority Elections (No. 2) Rules 2000 (SI 2000/427) which were approved by both Houses of Parliament. We have no reason to believe they were not compatible with the European Convention on Human Rights.

It has never been the practice to issue central instructions to polling station staff on what they should say to voters and none were issued on this occasion.

Proportional Representation

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research his Department has conducted into the number of spoilt ballot papers under systems of proportional representation; and if he will make a statement. [122035]

Mr. Mike O'Brien [holding answer 12 May 2000]: Approximately 0.3 per cent. of the ballot papers that were issued at the European Parliamentary elections and the Scottish Parliamentary elections last year were spoilt, broadly the same percentage as at the 1997 general election. I am advised that the figure for the elections to the Greater London Authority were significantly higher largely because a large number of ballot papers were left blank.

St. George's Day

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what preparations, at what cost, Government Departments made for celebrating St. George's Day this year. [120867]

Mr. Mike O'Brien [holding answer 8 May 2000]: Although Government Departments did not officially celebrate St. George's Day this year, I understand that some embassies and missions overseas and some English Heritage properties took the opportunity to give a St. George's Day theme to events taking place at that time. I further understand that the Coldstream Guards and possibly some other English regiments normally celebrate the Day, at the expense of regimental funds rather than the defence budget.

Drug Treatment and Testing Orders

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress he has made on drug treatment and testing orders; and if he will make a statement. [122508]

Mr. Straw: The order was piloted in three areas: Croydon, Liverpool and Gloucestershire. The pilots ended on 31 March 2000. The final evaluation is being undertaken by the South Bank University and is expected to be available in early July. I intend to publish that evaluation.

The Government have made available £20 million in 2000–01 and £40 million 2001–02 under the Comprehensive Spending Review to fund Drug Treatment and Testing Orders (DTTOs). Most of this money is being channelled through probation services, ring-fenced for the purpose, and each area has been advised of its allocation. Services have been instructed to prepare for roll out of the order subject to the final evaluation, and their preparations are well under way.

We have indicated to probation services that, subject to satisfactory evaluation, the roll out should commence in October 2000. Although the final evaluation is not yet to hand, it is clear that the overall impact of DTTOs in the pilot areas has been very positive: both offending and expenditure on illegal drugs by those subject to the order has reduced markedly. In order to allow both probation services and their partner treatment agencies the maximum time to prepare with certainty, we have decided that, as we are confident as to the outcome of the final evaluation, we should make an early decision on national roll out. The Government have, therefore, decided that the order will be rolled out to all areas in England and Wales with effect from 1 October 2000.

On Track Crime Reduction

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will announce the areas that have been selected to participate in the On Track Crime Reduction Programme. [122441]

Mr. Boateng: I am pleased to announce today that 24 areas have been selected to participate in the On Track programme.

The On Track programme is a long-term crime reduction programme aimed at children between four and 12 years who are at risk of offending. It is a central element of the Government's Crime Reduction Programme's agenda on tackling the causes of crime. Eighty local authorities were invited last December to participate in the programme. The 24 areas have been selected from 76.

The objective will be to establish in each pilot area an enhanced range of evidenced-based preventive services. These will include family support training, home visiting, pre-school education, parent-school partnerships, family therapy and specialist interventions. There will be intensive inter-agency co-operation so that children at risk of offending are identified early and they and their families provided with consistent services through the child's development.

The following areas have been selected to participate in the programme:

Bradford
Brent
Bristol
Brighton and Hove
Bury St. Edmunds (Suffolk)
Easington (Durham)
Greenwich
Haringey
Kerrier (Cornwall)
Luton
Manchester

Northampton (Northamptonshire)
Oldham
Portsmouth
Rochdale
Sandwell
Scarborough (North Yorkshire)
Sheffield
Solihull
Southwark
Sunderland
Wirral

Wales:

Bridgend
Rhondda Cynon Taff

I have written to the Members for these areas in whose constituencies the pilot areas fall.

The On Track programme will establish an effective and cohesive programme of early prevention in these communities. It will have a real impact on youth crime in the areas concerned and provide valuable information on what works best in terms of early prevention.

PRIME MINISTER

Ministerial Meetings

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on his April meeting with the management of Ford, Dagenham. [121070]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 5 May 2000]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and I met with representatives of the Ford Motor Company at the end of March, and representatives of the car industry including Ford at a meeting with the motor industry in April. However, I have had no meetings with the management of Ford, Dagenham during April.

Serbia

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make it his policy to offer to assist the authorities in Serbia to establish a Truth and Reconciliation Commission similar to that in South Africa; and if he will make a statement. [122336]

The Prime Minister: There is no prospect of the present Serbian authorities establishing a credible Truth and Reconciliation Commission. However, the UK Government have always stressed the importance of bringing to justice those responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law in former Yugoslavia. To this end, we support the work of the International Criminal Tribunal for Yugoslavia (ICTY) by providing information and resources. In 1999 our contribution to the ICTY was assessed at £3.1 million.

In Serbia, our active support for Serbian civil society and independent media includes support for projects in this field, including one media project which aims to draw on the experiences of South Africa. The issue of "Reconciliation with the Past" will be the subject of one of the UK funded New Serbia Forum series, which brings together Serbian experts from the democratic opposition to discuss the policies necessary for the post-Milosevic era.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Finance Bill

Mr. Rammell: To ask the Chairman of the Information Committee on which date the amendments to the Finance Bill, due to be debated on 2 May, were posted on the parliamentary intranet; and if he will make a statement. [122120]

Mr. Allan: This is a matter for the Deliverer of the Vote, but I am advised that the Notice of Amendments given up to and including Thursday 27 April 2000 for the Committee of the whole House on the Finance Bill was posted on the parliamentary intranet at 8.13 am on Friday 28 April. The Amendment Paper for the business of the Committee of the whole House for Tuesday 2 May, which was substantially the same as the previous paper, was posted on the parliamentary intranet at 9.34 am on Tuesday 2 May. If the hon. Member has any further queries on this matter, I would advise him to contact the Deliverer of the Vote.

HEALTH

Death Certificates, Royal Free

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what arrangements are in place at the Royal Free Hospital to provide death certificates at weekends in respect of members of groups and communities who require them to arrange early burial or cremation because of their beliefs or culture; and if he will make a statement. [117840]

Mr. Denham: At the Royal Free Hospital, a doctor who knew the patient in life must sign a cause of death certificate. This is usually a junior doctor, if the death occurs out of normal hours. Once it has been completed, the body can be released to the funeral director who will obtain the death certificate from the Registrar of Births, Marriages and Deaths. The Registrar's office opens from 9am-12:20pm every Saturday and they have an on-call system for Sunday registrations.

In response to concerns that have been expressed by some religious groups, such as Muslims, that removal and burial can be unreasonably delayed where the death occurs at the weekend, I understand that the Home Office, which has a general responsibility for coroner arrangements, has asked coroners to ensure that they always take account of the religious feelings of the bereaved and deal with their concerns with understanding and sensitivity. Many coroners have discussed these issues with their local ethnic and religious communities.

Thyroid Disease

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what research his Department has sponsored as to whether the estrogenic dose from soy baby foods is in the range known to cause thyroid abnormalities; and if he will make a statement; [118340]

(2) if he will estimate by age the number of people in the UK, and the proportion of the population which this represents of their age group, who are thought to be at risk of thyroid disease; and what correlation these figures have with the consumption levels of these age groups of soy baby food products. [118342]

Ms Stuart: Thyroid dysfunction is common and it is thought that up to 5 per cent. of the population are affected by hyper- or hypo-thyroidism. There is no central statistical information to answer the question with regard to incidence or risk of thyroid disease.

Following the 1996 advice of the Committee on Toxicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment (COT), a large programme of research was sponsored to specifically determine if soy infant formula carries any risk for infants. The Food Standards Agency is now responsible for this research.

The COT has set up a working group to review the available scientific evidence, including data on thyroid abnormalities, to determine if there are health implications associated with soy infant formula. The group will publish a report early next year. On the basis of this report, the FSA will consider whether any action needs to be taken.

Slimming Drugs

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many slimming clinics have closed as a result of the implementation by the Medicines Control Agency of the ban on the use of products containing amfepramone and phentermine; and how many jobs have been lost through such closures. [121109]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 8 May 2000]: We do not have evidence that slimming clinics are closing, other than the one claim brought to our attention by the right hon. Member, following the withdrawal of amfepramone and phentermine from the market.

The European Commission's decision to withdraw amfepramone and phentermine products became effective from 9 April 2000. Following a legal challenge, the European Court has suspended the European Commission decision to withdraw amfepramone products. As a consequence the licences for amfepramone products were reinstated on 18 April 2000 and amfepramone has again been available on the United Kingdom market since that date. The European Court has not currently made any decision to suspend the Commission's decision regarding phentermine, which remains withdrawn.

Food-related Illness

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the impact of conventional farming methods on levels of food-related illness and the cost of treating food-related illness in the NHS. [118572]

Ms Stuart: There has not been any assessment carried out of the impact of conventional farming methods on the levels of food-related illness. Indeed, it is usually not possible to trace the source of sporadic cases of food poisoning (which constitute the majority of cases) to a specific food, let alone to a specific food producer.

Although we have a good estimate of the total number of cases of infectious intestinal disease, and their cost to the National Health Service, it is not possible to say what proportion of this is foodborne. On the basis of a large study carried out in 1994–95, the cost to the NHS in England of treating illness due to the major food poisoning bacteria, Salmonella and Campylobacter, alone was between £26 million and £30 million per year from 1997 to 1999.

Correspondence

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire will receive a substantive answer to his letter of 28 March on behalf of his constituent Mrs. Drickett. [122332]

Ms Stuart: My right hon. Friend replied to the right hon. Member on 15 May.

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to promote research into and public awareness of causes and symptoms of myalgic encephalomyelitis; and if he will make a statement. [122395]

Yvette Cooper: The chronic fatigue syndrome/myalgic encephalomyelitis working group convened by the Chief Medical Officer to produce good practice guidance for the care and treatment of people with CFS/ME—will make recommendations about the need to identify and commission further research.

The CFS/ME working group is also producing briefing notes. These are being distributed widely. The aim of the briefing notes is to inform people about the working group and the condition itself.

Priorities for departmental research and development support for the development of policy are determined through discussions with policy colleagues, the Departmental research Committee and Ministers. In the National Health Service research and development programme, priorities take account of widespread consultation with those using, delivering and managing services, within a framework overseen by the central research and development committee for the NHS. In all cases, priorities for our budgets reflect analysis of the burden of disease, potential benefits and our priorities and take account of the responsibilities and work of other funders.

Honey (GM Pollen)

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when, and on what terms, EU marketing consent was given for honey containing genetically modified pollen. [121699]

Ms Stuart: The European Commission, in response to questions from the European Parliament, has advised that honey containing trace amounts of pollen from genetically modified crops is not classified as a novel food, and may therefore be lawfully sold throughout the Community. Work carried out by the Laboratory of the Government Chemist, a report of which is available in the Library, indicates that the amount of genetically modified material in honey is likely to be extremely small, at most no more than 0.00000000003g to 0.000000005g in a 500g jar.

All GM crops intended for deliberate release in this country, and in the rest of the European Community, have to be thoroughly assessed for human and environmental safety before they are allowed to be planted. This assessment includes safety implications of any exposure to pollen through ingestion or inhalation from the air, or as a result of it landing on other crops.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Hunting with Hounds

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the Burns Committee to report. [121529]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I understand Lord Burns hopes to submit his report to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary by late spring.

Jay Abatan

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if there will be a coroner's inquest, with a jury, into the death of Jay Abatan. [122481]

Mr. Boateng: I understand that the coroner will decide shortly whether to resume the inquest into the death. A jury would not be mandatory, but the coroner could summon one if she were satisfied that there was reason to do so.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Chief Constable on the circumstances of the death and investigations following the attack on Jay Abatan in Brighton in January 1999. [122480]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I have received a report from Sussex Police and will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible. A copy of this letter will be placed in the Library.

Animal Trainers

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many animal trainers are licensed under the Performing Animals Regulations 1925; and if he will make a statement. [122303]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Home Office has so far this year received notification of 61 trainers and exhibitors of performing animals currently registered with local authorities under the Performing Animals (Regulation) Act 1925. Local authorities were reminded last January of their obligation under the Act to copy related certificates of registration to the Secretary of State.

Sentencing

Mr. Hope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce new sentencing arrangements. [122565]

Mr. Straw: As part of our objectives of reducing crime and dispensing justice fairly, we have already put in place a comprehensive programme of work to reduce the rate of re-offending. This includes ensuring that the Prison Service and the probation service work more effectively together; improving the enforcement of community penalties; developing programmes, in custody and in the community, which are known to reduce re-offending (based on the "what works" strategy) and building on the opportunities which new technology opens up.

Together these developments present an opportunity to consider possible new forms of sentences which better protect the public and reduce re-offending. In particular, they open up the possibility of a more flexible sentencing structure, in which the boundaries between custodial and community penalties are less rigid. However, the current legal framework established in the Criminal Justice Act 1991 may not be best suited to an approach of this sort. I have therefore decided to review that framework. The review will complement that of the criminal courts being conducted by Lord Justice Auld.

Its terms of reference will be:

In the light of the Government's objectives to protect the public by reducing crime and re-offending, and to dispense justice fairly and consistently, to consider:

what principles should guide sentencing decisions;

what types of disposal should be made available to the courts in order to meet the overarching objectives; the costs of different disposals and their relative effectiveness in reducing re-offending;

what changes therefore need to be made to the current sentencing framework, as established by the Criminal Justice Act 1991, so as more effectively to reduce re-offending, including any transitional and consequential arrangements; and the likely impact of any recommendations in terms of costs and the effects on the prison population.

In particular, the review should bear in mind the desirability of promoting flexibility in the use of custodial and community based approaches.

The review will be led by a senior official from the Home Office. I want it to be a rigorous, evidence-based exercise. It will operate in an open way, involving and seeking views from as wide a range of interests as possible. I expect it to take about 12 months from now to produce recommendations, which will then be the subject of formal consultation.

1999 European Parliamentary Elections

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to complete the review of the 1999 European parliamentary elections. [122568]

Mr. Straw: The review has been completed and copies have today been placed in the Library.

Lowdham Grange Prison

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the recommendations for improvements made by the Chief Inspector of Prisons in his unpublished report on Lowdham Grange are to be implemented before the publication of the report. [121466]

Mr. Boateng: The report was published on 27 April. In accordance with the protocol for handling inspection reports, the Prison Service will produce an action plan within 30 working days of publication of the report, addressing all the recommendations made by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons. It is not possible to say how many of the 127 recommendations were fully implemented before publication, but once the action plan has been completed and reviewed at Prison Service Headquarters, I will write to the hon. Member with a progress report on implementation.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what financial penalties have been incurred at HMP Lowdham Grange since the prison opened; and what were the reasons for each penalty. [121465]

Mr. Boateng: The information in respect of performance measures is shown in the table. There was a reduction in fee of £702.00 in respect of an unavailable prisoner place in June 1998. There have been no reductions in fees since February 1999.

Nature of performance measure	Incident of failure: June 1998 to August 1998	September 1998 to November 1998	December 1998 to February 1999

Private Prisons

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will review his decision not to make contracts between his Department and private prison operators public; and if he will make a statement. [121464]

Mr. Boateng: Unpriced copies of contracts between the Prison Service and companies operating prisons are available in the Library and can be obtained from the Prison Service for a small fee to cover administrative and printing costs. This policy is consistent with the Cabinet Office guidance on interpreting the Code of Practice on Access to Official Information and with the requirements of the European Union Procurement Directives.

Altcourse Prison

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what financial penalties have been incurred at HMP Altcourse since the prison opened; if he will list the reasons for each penalty; how many of the recommendations for improvements made by the Chief Inspector of Prisons in his report were implemented before the publication of the report; what conclusions were drawn from the recent security audit; by what date recommendations for improvement were implemented; and what penalties were incurred by Group 4 as a result of that audit. [121468]

Mr. Boateng: Financial penalties totalling £212,728.23 were withheld for the period 1 December 1997 to 30 August 1998 for Altcourse prison. Of these, £195,000 have been calculated by converting the penalty points accrued during the period to a financial value in accordance with the performance mechanism contained in the contract. The amount also includes the sum of £17,728.23 which has been deducted from the contractor for 'doubling', in excess of permitted levels. There have been no financial penalties since 1 September 1998.

The incidents leading to the deductions are listed in the table and are failures to comply with performance standards.

The inspection report on Altcourse prison was published on 19 April. In accordance with the protocol for handling inspection reports, the Prison Service will produce an action plan within 30 working days of publication of the report, addressing all the recommendations made by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons. It is not possible to say how many of the 106 recommendations were fully implemented before publication, but once the action plan has been completed and reviewed at Prison Service Headquarters, I will write to the hon. Member with a progress report on implementation.

The overall compliance rating of the security audit of Altcourse prison was acceptable. Of the modules audited, four were rated as good, two as acceptable and three as deficient. Only one of these was rated as a significant finding and this has been fully addressed.

An action plan has been produced addressing the recommendations for improvements, and some non-compliant baselines were resolved during the course of the audit. Ninety per cent. of the action plan has already been implemented with full implementation to be completed by the end of June. No financial penalties were incurred as a result of the audit.

EU Asylum Policy

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has received from the European Commission in respect of powers exercised by virtue of any convention or treaty article concerning the standardisation of tests for accepting asylum applications to Governments of member states. [121631]

Mrs. Roche: I am aware of no proposals from the European Commission concerning the standardisation of the criteria for the recognition of refugees, or for determining the member state responsible for determining an asylum claim made within the European Union. Such proposals would be consistent with the requirements of article 63 of the Amsterdam Treaty. However, the European Commission has to date produced only a discussion document on "Towards Common Standards on Asylum Procedures" and a working paper entitled "Revisiting the Dublin Convention". The latter seeks to initiate debate on the Dublin Convention as the first step towards developing Community legislation for determining which member state is responsible for considering an application for asylum submitted in one of the member states. The Government's view of this document can be found in the Home Office Explanatory Memorandum dated 10 May, deposited in the Library. The Government's view on the discussion paper "Towards common Standards on Asylum Procedures" can be found in the Home Office Explanatory Memorandum dated 26 March 2000 deposited in the Library.

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to amend the Human Rights Act 1998 following the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of R v. Perry; what steps he is taking to prevent abuse of the type referred to in the judgment; and if he will make a statement. [121986]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 12 May 2000]: The Human Rights Act 1998 gives further effect in United Kingdom law to most of the rights guaranteed by the European Convention on Human Rights, which successive governments and Parliament have abided by for the last 50 years. The Court of Appeal takes a robust approach to those who waste its time and the position should be no different when the Human Rights Act comes fully into force. All judges, lay magistrates and their legal advisers are being trained to deal with Convention points effectively.

Wrongfully Convicted Prisoners

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what financial and other assistance is available at the time of release for prisoners freed by the Court of Appeal on grounds of wrongful conviction; and if he will make a statement. [121937]

Mr. Straw: Most prisoners when released from prison are given a discharge grant to help them meet their immediate needs. The position of prisoners discharged from court after a sentence has been quashed or reduced on appeal is that they would normally be entitled to a grant provided they have been in custody for at least nine days of their sentence.

In cases of wrongful conviction where it has been decided that an individual qualifies for payment of compensation, he or she may then apply for an interim payment to help alleviate any immediate financial difficulties.

Funding has been made available this year to enable a voluntary body, familiar with prisoner resettlement issues, to develop, on a national basis, an advice and counselling service specifically geared to the needs of successful appellants. We hope to be entering into discussions soon with possible providers of such a service. The Probation Service may also provide assistance on a voluntary basis.

Asylum and Immigration

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in what circumstances (a) asylum seekers, (b) persons granted asylum, (c) persons granted exceptional leave to remain and (d) other persons subject to immigration control may lawfully work in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [121812]

Mrs. Roche: The circumstances vary according to the category.

Asylum seekers who have not received a first decision on their asylum application within six months may apply to the Home Office for permission to work. Where written permission is granted, they will be able to take employment lawfully.

Persons granted asylum are given indefinite leave to remain in the United Kingdom and as such have no restriction attached to their stay. They may seek whatever employment they wish and they do not need to seek permission from the Immigration Authorities to take employment.

Persons granted exceptional leave to remain are free to seek employment within the limit of their leave to remain. They do not need to seek permission from the Immigration Authorities in order to do so.

There are a considerable number of categories under which persons subject to immigration control may lawfully engage in employment. Details of the various categories which permit employment and self-employment within the Immigration Rules, and the conditions attached to leave granted under those categories, are set out in the Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules, HC 395. In addition, there are a number of concessions that operate outside the Rules, under which those who meet the requisite criteria may lawfully take employment. Details of the various concessions are contained in the Immigration Directorate's Instructions. Copies of the Rules and the Instructions are available in the Library on the Home Office website: www.homeoffice.gov.uk/ind/hpg.htm.

Gardening Leave

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many officials in (a) his Department and (b) its non-departmental public bodies and Executive agencies are currently on gardening leave. [121813]

Mr. Straw: Six officials in the Home Office (and none in our non departmental public bodies and Executive agencies) are currently on special leave with pay while awaiting a posting.

Corpus Juris

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on Corpus Juris and the EU InterGovernmental Conference. [120888]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) on 15 May 2000, Official Report, column 51W.

The Intergovernmental Conference should focus on the institutional reforms necessary to prepare the European Union for enlargement.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Television (Wales)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what proportion of television viewers in Wales have access to Channel 4 television; and what plans he has to increase the availability of Channel 4 in Wales; [121930]

(2) what proposals he has to increase the availability of Channel 5 in Wales, other than via pay-for-access satellite; [121928]

(3) if he will make a statement on the availability of Channel 4 in Wales following the implementation of digital television. [121929]

Janet Anderson: The priority for the use of scarce frequency channels is to develop digital terrestrial television across the UK, rather than to extend analogue Channel 5 services.

The Welsh transmitters broadcast analogue S4C, instead of Channel 4, so only the 40 per cent. or so of Welsh viewers who can receive signals from English terrestrial transmitters can obtain terrestrial analogue Channel 4. The introduction of digital television has improved the availability of Channel 4 in Wales, since it can be broadcast alongside S4C from Welsh transmitters.

The Government will ensure that all consumers in Wales who presently receive analogue television will be able to receive the main free-to-air channels digitally, before the analogue transmissions are fully switched to digital.

Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what proposals he has to improve regional management and control of Channel 3. [122459]

Janet Anderson: These are matters for the Independent Television Commission. The Broadcasting Act 1996 empowers the Commission to vary a Channel 3 licence on a change of control if they consider it may be prejudicial to the regional character of the service. The Commission can take into account the extent to which managerial and editorial decisions are taken by persons employed in the licence area.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Business Costs

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the (a) start-up and (b) annual running costs to business of (i) the working families tax credit, (ii) the recoupment of the student loan and (iii) stakeholder pensions. [121071]

Mr. Byers: Details of costs arising from these measures are set out in the Regulatory Impact Assessments prepared by the relevant departments, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Gas Market

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to implement the Gas Directive (98/30/EC). [122714]

Mrs. Liddell: I have today issued a consultation document outlining proposals for implementation of the 'downstream' aspects of the Gas Directive. This follows a parallel consultation document outlining proposals to implement those aspects of the Gas Directive which apply to upstream pipeline networks, which I issued on 30 March 2000, Official Report, columns 242–43W.

The regime for the gas market in Great Britain, which has been fully open to competition since 1998, with regulated third party access to pipelines and requirements for non-discrimination, is generally well ahead of the requirements of the Directive. However, there are a number of areas where relatively limited technical amendments will be needed to ensure full compliance.

The consultation document identifies requirements for amendment to the regulatory framework in the following areas:

improvements in the transparency of the procedures for licence applications;

a duty of non-discrimination to be imposed on certain undertakings (in addition to those already subject to such a duty); separate internal management accounts to be kept by certain undertakings; statutory provisions for third party access to be applied to certain undertakings; competent authorities for dispute settlement purposes to be designated.

It also identifies a need for certain administrative actions.

The parallel 'upstream' consultation document proposed that the interconnecting pipeline between the United Kingdom and Belgium should be regarded as an upstream pipeline for the purposes of the Directive. However, the responses to that document may make a good case for treating it as a downstream pipe-line. The present consultation document therefore seeks views on how this interconnector might be treated as a 'downstream' pipeline, subject to statutory third party access with appeal to the Secretary of State.

The regulatory impact costs on business, on which comments are invited, are expected to be negligible.

Comments on the consultation document have been requested by 16 June 2000.

A copy of the document has been placed in the Library of the House. The document will also be available on the Department's website (www.dti.uk).

Insolvency Service

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the Quinquennial Review of the Insolvency Service will take place; and what the terms of reference for the review will be. [122715]

Mr. Byers: I am launching the Quinquennial Review of the Insolvency Service today.

The Government are committed to achieving better public services that are of higher quality and are more responsive to the needs of the people who use them. The services and functions provided by the Executive Agencies and non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs) are at the heart of this programme of continuous improvement and their effective delivery is a key element in the success of Modernising Government. Regular Agency and NDPB reviews are an important element in ensuring that we have in place the right structures to deliver the Government's agenda effectively and to provide a strong focus on improving their future performance.

The terms of reference for the review of the Insolvency Service are:

To consider and to make recommendations regarding:

First, the organisational status which would be most appropriate for the policy, work and operation of the Insolvency Service in the future, taking into account its contribution to the objectives of the Department and of the Government as a whole, including the Modernising Government agenda, developments in the national and international legislative, regulatory and commercial environment, and the views of customers, staff, consumers and other interested parties; and

Second, whether any changes should be made to the way in which the Insolvency Service operates, including its aims and objectives, targets and financial controls; the scope of the activities undertaken; and whether its activities could be done more effectively.

The review is to be undertaken in accordance with the latest Cabinet Office guidance, published in January 2000.

The review will be led by Pamela Denham, a former official in the Department of Trade and Industry, with support from officials and specialist advice as appropriate. The Review Team will report to a Steering Group which will include two independent members (Gill Hankey and Geoffrey Drage) and be chaired by Dr. Catherine Bell, the Director General of Corporate and Consumer Affairs. The aim will be to complete each stage of the review within three months, as recommended in the Cabinet Office guidance.

As indicated in the terms of reference, the Review Team is seeking the views of interested parties. A consultation paper is available from:

Rover

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what contingency plans the Government have in the event that the conditional offer to Phoenix by Burdale Financial, the subsidiary of First Union, of £200 million to finance the acquisition of Rover is withdrawn following due diligence; and if he will make a statement. [122244]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The financial backing which it has received for its bid is a commercial matter for the Phoenix Consortium. The Consortium has not sought Government finance for its proposals.

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to meet representatives of (a) Burdale Financial and (b) First Union to discuss the financing of the acquisition of Rover by Phoenix. [122242]

Mr. Alan Johnson: None. This is a commercial matter for the Phoenix Consortium.

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the status of the offer to Phoenix by First Union of £200 million to finance the acquisition of Rover in respect of (a) due diligence and (b) an examination of the business plan of Phoenix; and if he will make a statement. [122241]

Mr. Alan Johnson: These are commercial matters for the Phoenix Consortium. It would not be appropriate to comment.

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the prospects for Honda's involvement in the future of the Rover plant. [122243]

Mr. Alan Johnson: None. This is commercial matter between Honda and the Phoenix Consortium.

Ilisu Dam

Ms Kingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has had with the Turkish Government regarding the Ilisu Dam Project. [120897]

Mr. Caborn: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has not had any discussions with the Turkish government regarding the Ilisu Dam project. As part of its normal procedures, the Export Credits Guarantee Department has had discussions with the General Directorate of State Hydraulic Works (DSI), the Turkish authority responsible for the project; the most recent meeting took place in London in February.

Defence Manufacturers Association

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many times his Department has met representatives of the Defence Manufacturers Association since 1997. [122245]

Mr. Alan Johnson: My Department maintains a regular dialogue with the Defence Manufacturers Association (DMA) on sectoral and export issues. Many of the meetings between officials in my Department and the DMA are informal or during the course of other events and no central record is kept. In 1997, the then Under-Secretary of State with responsibility for Small Firms addressed the DMA's Annual General Meeting.

WALES

Youth Service

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the development of the Youth Service in Wales and the Learning and Skills Bill [Lords]. [121238]

Mr. Hanson: The Government have introduced amendments to the Learning and Skills Bill to enable the National Assembly to develop, together with local authorities and others, an enhanced youth support service for young people in Wales.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Jay Abatan

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Solicitor-General if he will call for a report from the Crown Prosecution Service on its actions following the attack on Jay Abatan in Brighton in January 1999. [122482]

The Solicitor-General: I have received an initial report about this case from the Crown Prosecution Service. I am now making further inquiries and will provide as substantive answer as soon as I am able.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Asylum Seekers (Housing)

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assumptions he made about the number of asylum seekers living in south east England when he prepared his response to the Crow report. [120255]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Department's household projections are only one of several factors which informed the Proposed Changes to draft Regional Planning Guidance for the south east. I refer the hon. Member to my answer below—which clarifies the relationship between population projections in which assumptions about asylum seekers are made and the Department's household projections.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assumptions he has made in his Department's projections of future population and household formation trends about the number of asylum seekers in England. [120276]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 2 May 2000]: National population projections are prepared by the Government Actuary's Department and published jointly with the Office for National Statistics. A description of the assumptions in the 1996-based national population projections can be found in "National Population Projections: 1996-based" (ONS series PPG2 No. 21, published by TSO). These included a long-term asylum seeker assumption of 5,000 a year to the UK, virtually all of whom were assumed to settle in England. This assumption has subsequently been revised.

The 1996-based national population projections were an input into the Department's household projections, the latest of which is published in "Projections of Households in England to 2021", a copy of which is in the Library. No other information about asylum seekers in England was used in producing the household projections.

A6 (Dove Holes)

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list, in respect of the A6 trunk road through Dove Holes, Derbyshire, for each of the last 10 years, (a) the number of (i) fatalities and (ii) injuries recorded in road accidents and (b) the number of speeding offences detected in the 30 mph zone; and what assessment he has made of the efficacy of the recently implemented traffic calming measures there. [121053]

Mr. Hill: I have asked the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Peter Nutt, to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Nutt to Mr. Tom Levitt, dated 16 May 2000:

The Parliamentary Under Secretary of State, Keith Hill, has asked me to reply to your recent question requesting (a) the number of (i) fatalities and (ii) injuries recorded in road accidents and (b) the number of speeding offences detected in the 30mph zone, both over the last ten years, on the A6 Trunk Road through Dove Holes, Derbyshire. You also asked what assessment had been made of the efficacy of the recently implemented traffic calming measures there.

Unfortunately, we do not have personal injury figures for a full ten-year period for this length of A6. The figures between April 1994 and December 1999, the latest period for which information is available, are as follows:

Fatal - Nil;

Slight - 28

As enforcement of speed limits is a matter for the police, the Highways Agency does not record the number of speeding offences on trunk roads. This information should be available from the Chief Constable of Derbyshire Constabulary.

The "traffic calming measures" to which you refer take the form of variable speed limits (30mph in the built-up area, 40mph in the more rural area) rather than physical constraints on the speed of traffic more normally associated with traffic calming schemes. At present, it is too early to say how effective the measures at Dove Holes have been; monitoring began in April and a report will be produced later this year. I will ensure that you receive a copy.

In the meantime, if you wish to discuss any aspect further, the Highways Agency Route Manager for this length of A6 is Steve Forgham. He can be contacted at our office at Broadway, Broad Street, Birmingham, B15 1BL, or by telephone on 0121 678 8506.

Correspondence

Sir Peter Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will reply to the letter of 28 February from the right hon. Member for Fareham about (a) the effect of the 1994 Land Tribunal Judgment in the case of Batchelor v. Kent County Council and (b) the action he intends to take following that judgment. [120983]

Ms Beverley Hughes: I replied to the right hon. Member's letter of 28 February on 15 May. My reply sets out the current position on the area of the compensation code that featured in the Batchelor case and of the compulsory purchase policy review which has been considering the whole question of compensation for compulsory purchase. I apologise for the delay, which was caused by problems with our ministerial correspondence tracking system.

Air Traffic Control

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what communications he has received from (a) the European Commission and (b) other sources concerning the compatibility with the public ownership and funding of those agencies now operating in the United Kingdom of European Commission proposals to create a single European Airspace and European Air Safety Agency. [121638]

Mr. Mullin: DETR received in January 2000 a copy of the Communication from the Commission to the Council and the European Parliament entitled "The creation of a single European sky"—EM No. 13735/99 COM(99) 614 final.

This Communication examined in detail the European air traffic management system. It provides the Commission's views on where it believes there are shortcomings, and makes proposals for areas which need further study in order to achieve the Commission's objective of "European airspace as a seamless continuum". In general, the Commission's ideas, such as the need to separate service provision from regulation, seem compatible with UK air traffic control policy. This is also the broad consensus view of the respondents to DETR's recent consultation exercise on this Communication.

In June 1998, the Council mandated the Commission to develop, on behalf of the European Community and the member states, a Treaty for a new international organisation to be known as the European Aviation Safety Authority, involving both EU and non-EU member states, as well as the Community itself. The mandate required the Commission first to submit a draft outline text of the founding Treaty to a Special Committee of member states representatives. The draft Treaty agreed by the Special Committee envisages that national aviation authorities, such as the United Kingdom Civil Aviation Authority, will continue as nationally constituted.

The Commission has recently suggested an alternative option, based on the creation of a Community Agency. In this connection, DETR received in April 2000 a copy of the Communication from the Commission to the Council and the European Parliament entitled, "Commission Working Document with a view to discussions within the Council on the creation of the European Aviation Safety authority in the Community framework"—COM(2000) 144 final. This document also envisages the continuation of national aviation authorities.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which Treaty Articles, Regulations and Directives relating to the control of air traffic within the European Union will (a) permit and (b) prohibit, a continuation of the current ownership of and mode of control in the airspace of the United Kingdom. [121630]

Mr. Mullin: By virtue of Article 295 of the Treaty of Rome, provisions made by the European Union under the Common Transport Policy must not prejudice the rules in member states governing the system of property ownership.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proportion of total aircraft movements in the United Kingdom were handled by National Air Traffic Services on the most recent date for which figures are available. [121751]

Mr. Mullin: In 1999, NATS handled 46 per cent. of all aircraft movements in or out of the 60 UK airports for which data are available. In addition, NATS handles all flights between UK airports and aircraft over-flying the UK.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many passengers used licensed airports in the United Kingdom during 1999; in how many of those airports National Air Traffic Services was provider of air traffic control; and where such airports were. [121750]

Mr. Mullin: In 1999 there were almost 170 million terminal passengers at the 60 UK airports for which data are available. NATS provided ATC services at 10 of these airports:

Aberdeen
Belfast International Cardiff
Edinburgh
Glasgow
London Heathrow
London Gatwick
London City
London Stansted
Manchester.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the providers of flight information air traffic control services to the aircraft in the open flight information regions. [121752]

Mr. Mullin: All Air Traffic Control (ATC) Units, both civil and military, are required to provide flight information services (FIS). This service is provided at the London and Scottish Air Traffic Control Centres by dedicated FIS controllers. At other ATC units, the provision of FIS is one of the primary responsibilities of all air traffic controllers.

Local Council Cabinets

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the operation of the procedures and the timescale for the introduction of the Cabinet system of Government in local councils. [121485]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Local Government Bill [Lords], now before the House, provides for councils to adopt a new constitution with a separate executive. If the Bill is enacted, we expect that, under normal circumstances, all councils will have adopted a new constitution by May or June 2002 at the latest. We have now published for consultation revised drafts of the proposed guidance and regulations on new constitutions for councils; copies are available from the Vote Office and have been placed in the Library.

Driving Test Centres (South London)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the driving test centres in South London. [121974]

Mr. Hill: There are 14 driving test centres in the Greater London constituencies south of the Thames at:

South Norwood; Wallington (Mint House); Wallington (Old Town House); Morden; Southfields; Sutton; Belvedere; Bexley Heath; Hither Green; Sidcup; West Wickham and Surbiton.

There are two test centres in Croydon, one conducting tests for learner lorry and bus drivers, the other for learner car drivers.

The test centres at Southfields and Surbiton are to be relocated to a new site at Tolworth-Surbiton from 8 June and Southfields from early September.

Through Traffic (Cheltenham)

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with Gloucestershire County Council regarding proposals to remove through traffic on the A40 through Cheltenham. [122007]

Mr. Hill: The Secretary of State has held no such discussions. This is a matter for the County Council to consider within the context of its Local Transport Plan.

Mayoral Election

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he [his Ministers or his officials] (a) approved and (b) were informed of the wording of the instructions to voters on the supplementary vote system used in the election for Mayor of London that were (i) printed on ballot papers, (ii) displayed in polling stations and (iii) to be given orally to voters; what discussions he [his Ministers or his officials] have had with, and what representations he has received from (1) the Greater London Returning Officer, (2) Ministers and officials in the Home Department and (3) other persons regarding the wording of the instructions used at the election for Mayor of London; and if he will make a statement. [121814]

Mr. Hill: In March, a Greater London Returning Officer (GLRO) was appointed to oversee the running of the first GLA election. In addition 14 constituency Returning Officers (CROs) were appointed to take the poll in their areas.

The wording of the instructions to voters printed on the mayoral ballot paper and displayed in polling station were prescribed in the Greater London Authority Elections (No. 2) Rules (SI 2000/427), which were approved by Parliament. No representations have been made to Ministers about the wording of the instructions; I understand that a small number of representations have been made to the GLRO.

The GLRO will be discussing experience of the election arrangements (which included a number of innovations) with the CROs, and will let me have his conclusions in due course.

Hazardous Loads

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent representations he has received regarding the transportation of hazardous loads by road in tunnels. [121724]

Mr. Hill: None.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will restrict the transportation of dangerous and hazardous goods to rail; and if he will make a statement. [121723]

Mr. Hill: Consignors of dangerous goods may choose the mode of transport most appropriate for their needs, provided that they comply with the relevant safety requirements. As demonstrated in the 1992 Health and Safety Commission Advisory Committee on Dangerous Substances report on the major hazard aspects of the transport of dangerous substances, a copy of which is in the Library of the House, there is no evidence that one mode of transport is generally more dangerous than another.

Police Authorities (Council Tax)

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the police authorities of England in order of their Band D council tax precept for the financial year 2000–01. [122009]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Band D council tax precepts issued by English police authorities for 2000–01, listed in order of the amounts set, are given in the table:

Housing (West Oxfordshire)

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of growth in housing in West Oxfordshire over the next 20 years. [121816]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The level of house building in Oxfordshire is set through Regional Planning Guidance for the South-East (RPG9). The next round of this guidance is currently being prepared by my Department, taking into account the first draft prepared by the local authorities in the region, and also responses made to this draft. We have now published the latest set of proposed changes and are currently inviting comments.

Draft RPG9 allocates an annual average of 43,000 new dwellings per year in the South-East. Local authorities in the region have been asked to consider how this figure can best be divided between the counties, working from an illustrative distribution included with the draft. This suggests that 2,680 new dwellings could be built per year in Oxfordshire.

Following final publication of RPG9 later this year it will be the responsibility of Oxfordshire County Council and the district councils in the area to decide on the allocation of the Oxfordshire housing figure between the districts, including West Oxfordshire. This figure will be then adopted in the next Oxfordshire County Structure Plan.

Until this time the building rates set out in the current Oxfordshire Structure Plan will apply. This allocates 6,750 new dwellings to West Oxfordshire District between 1996 and 2011.

Ivory Trade

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement regarding Government policy towards the ivory trade and elephant poaching, following the recent agreement of countries attending the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species meeting. [122141]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 15 May 2000]: The Government support the co-operative arrangements for elephant conservation between the African range states which have developed at a series of special dialogue meetings over the last five years, sponsored by the International Union for the Conservation of Nature (IUCN) and the UN CITES Secretariat. The latest dialogue meeting took place in Nairobi immediately before the CITES Conference and was, like the previous meetings, partly funded by my Department. Senior UK officials attended the meeting. The Nairobi dialogue agreed arrangements for each African region to participate in two systems which underpin future elephant management and trade: the Monitoring of Illegal Killing of Elephants (MIKE) and the Elephant Trade Information System (ETIS). The dialogue paved the way for the compromise reached at the CITES Conference itself.

The main features of the compromise are that the elephant populations of Botswana, Namibia, South Africa and Zimbabwe, estimated at a total of 192,000 animals, are now listed on Appendix II of the Convention. This means that managed trade in elephant products of these four populations is agreed to be scientifically sustainable according to the criteria laid down under CITES. However there are still concerns among a number of African states—which we share—about resuming further commercial trade in raw ivory at present, particularly as we cannot yet assess the full impact of last year's experimental ivory auctions on elephant poaching levels, both in Africa and Asia. We therefore welcome the decision reached as part of the compromise which sets zero quotas for the export of ivory from southern Africa.

MIKE and ETIS are expected to provide comprehensive information to enable the next CITES Conference in 2002 to decide whether controlled ivory trade can safely be resumed, and whether the conservation benefits of such trade outweigh any remaining risks. The European Union, with the support of the UK, is considering a grant of 4 million Euro to MIKE. The UK has already provided £60,000 towards the cost of ETIS.

The Government appreciate the role played by responsible non-Government organisations, particularly the World Wide Fund for Nature and Fauna and Flora International, in obtaining such a successful outcome in Nairobi.

Standard Spending Assessments

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the standard spending assessment per head of population for each English county for (a) 1998–99, (b) 1999–2000 and (c) 2000–2001, ranked from highest to lowest; and if he will make a statement. [122238]

Ms Armstrong: Three tables have been placed in the Library giving the standard spending assessment per head of population for each English county for 1998–99, 1999–2000 and 2000–01 respectively.

Railtrack Safety Company

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 9 May 2000, Official Report, column 360W, on Railtrack, under what statutory provisions Railtrack is required to consult before creating a safety company; with whom it will consult; and what are the terms and timetable for the consultation. [122457]

Mr. Hill: Arrangements for consultation by Railtrack before the proposed safety company assumes any safety responsibilities and in respect of other requirements for the company's operation are expected to be specified in modifications to its Network Licence. The Rail Regulator will consult shortly on his proposals for these modifications before the nature of the obligations are finalised. These would be imposed under the Railways Act 1993.

Water Sources (Drug Residues)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what evidence he has assessed which indicates that potentially damaging residues from medicinal drugs are contaminating waterways and drinking water sources. [121528]

Mr. Mullin: Last year the Environment Agency commissioned a review of human pharmaceuticals in the environment for completion by the end of May. This will report on the information available on such substances in the environment, their occurence, fate and ecological effects and will provide a basis for further work. The Department has also funded extensive monitoring for drug residues in drinking water sources since the 1970s. Although certain common drugs have been detected at very low concentrations in some drinking water sources, current drinking water treatment processes are effective in removing them.

Ten Year Transport Plan

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he has decided to publish his 10-year transport plan before the end of July. [122485]

Mr. Hill: As with all such departmental reports, we will publish the plan when it is ready.

Rail Access Charges Review

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Rail Regulator will conclude his review of access charges. [122486]

Mr. Hill: It is the Rail Regulator's present intention to publish his final review notice on access charges in early September 2000, subject to the outcome of the consultation announced on 14 April, the deadline for responses for which is 26 May.

Urban Task Force

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many of the recommendations made by the Urban Task Force in the report, "Towards an Urban Renaissance", have been implemented; and if he will make a statement. [122167]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Urban Task Force report, "Towards an Urban Renaissance", made more than 100 recommendations about how to revitalise our towns and cities. It formed an excellent contribution to the debate on how to reverse the social, physical and economic decline that many of our urban areas have faced in recent decades.

The Government are looking at the report's conclusions in detail as we prepare for the forthcoming White Paper on urban policy. But we, and others, have already addressed around a quarter of the recommendations including:

Setting up three pilot Urban Regeneration Companies in Liverpool, East Manchester and Sheffield. These will co-ordinate the regeneration of run-down urban neighbourhoods within a wider local strategy developed by the local authority and its partners, listening to local people's needs and ensuring local priorities are met.

Setting up nine pilot home zones—traffic schemes in residential areas which will give residents more control over traffic movements and ensure that the needs of people, rather than traffic, come first.

Publishing revised planning policy guidance on development plans (PPG12) which advocates simpler and more effective development plans. This helps to fulfil the Urban Task Force's recommendation to streamline the planning process.

Piloting eight Private Finance Initiatives for Housing Revenue Account pathfinders, helping fulfil the need to attract private investment in local communities.

Taking steps to put Local Transport Plans (LTPs) on a statutory footing, ensuring that local authorities take an integrated and strategic approach to planning transport provision in their area.

Publishing draft revised planning policy guidance on transport (PPG13) to promote civilised towns and cities where the needs of people are given priority.

Setting up a new Government unit for neighbourhood warden schemes to provide pump-priming funding to test out these schemes.

Publishing revised planning policy guidance on Housing (PPG3) which introduces a new sustainable approach to planning for housing. This addresses many of Lord Rogers' recommendations through its main provisions which include:

Targets to put 60 per cent. of new homes on brownfield sites—set at all levels of the planning hierarchy, from regional to local level, and contributing to the achievement of the national 60 per cent. target.

A sequential approach—to ensure that brownfield land is used for development before greenfield land whenever possible.

New policies on land take—to avoid inefficient development and encourage higher intensity development in urban areas around good transport nodes.

Looking again at greenfield land in the system—to ensure that land already allocated for housing meets the new approach.

New car parking standards—removing minimum car parking standards, and substituting a maximum of, on average, 1.5 car parking spaces per dwelling.

A new emphasis on quality development—to stress the need for imaginative design, taking account of what people want and ensuring better links with public transport.

Improved housing choice and affordability—encouraging mixed communities with mixed tenures and strengthening the preference for affordable housing to be provided on-site.

Tackling unpopular housing—by getting local planning authorities to look at how to recycle existing buildings as well as recycle land.

Many other recommendations will be addressed in part or in full by the new power which the Government are giving to local authorities to promote and improve the economic, social and environmental well-being of their area. Other recommendations are also being taken forward in the context of the Government's Housing Green Paper.

Building Control

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made with the setting up of an advisory body on performance standards in building control. [122679]

Ms Beverley Hughes: My Department and the National Assembly for Wales have joined the Association of Corporate Approved Inspectors, the Construction Industry Council, the District Surveyors Association and the Local Government Association in signing a Memorandum of Understanding that establishes a new Building Control Performance Standards Advisory Group.

The Advisory Group's terms of reference are:

to keep under review the effectiveness of the standards and guidance published in "Building Control Performance Standards" (July 1999) and to make recommendations for revisions of the standards and guidance to advise on, and draw up recommendations on, performance indicators for the effective delivery of building control and procedures for the monitoring of building control bodies to consider complaints from building control bodies, other statutory bodies and other parties with an interest in relevant building work, that building control bodies have not acted in accordance with the Building Control Performance Standards; where appropriate, to refer such complaints to relevant other bodies; and/or to make recommendations to the building control bodies concerned on prevention of future non-compliant action.

I welcome the formation of the Advisory Group, which met for the first time on 10 May 2000. I look forward to working with the Group and its member bodies to promote continuous improvement in standards of service in both the public and private sectors of the building control profession.

In addition to representatives of the signatory bodies, there will be a representative of the Building Regulations Advisory Committee and two members representing building users and construction clients.

The Audit Commission has accepted an invitation from the Group to participate in its work as observers.

The first chair of the Group is Michael Finn FRICS who chaired the steering group which drew up the performance standards for building control published in July last year. The Construction Industry Council will provide the secretariat for the Group for an initial period of three years.

Millennium Dome

Ms Ryan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the final shortlist for the proposed uses for the Millennium Dome after the millennium celebration will be announced. [122718]

Ms Armstrong: The Government have announced today that two proposals have been selected to advance to the final stage of the competition. Detailed proposals and indicative financial offers were invited from bids shortlisted in January. These two bids were chosen from a strong field of five bids remaining in the competition.

The bids in the final shortlist are:

Dome Europe, an advanced leisure, business and retail attraction, proposed by the Principal Finance Group of Nomura International plc.

Legacy plc, a high technology industrial campus of workspace, leisure and retail uses, proposed by Robert Bourne.

In reaching this decision the Government have evaluated the bids against the published criteria, and have taken into account the views of umbrella organisations in the area and the public responses to a national consultation exercise held in April. Details of the public consultation results have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

We will now work with the bidders to develop these proposals further, and will proceed to a decision in the summer on the winning proposal.

Raptors

Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was (a) the cost of producing the Langholm report into raptors and (b) the cost of compensation that had to be paid to landowners. [120378]

Dr. Reid: I have been asked to reply.

The subject matter is now devolved. However, the Game Conservancy Trust and the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology carried out a study between 1992 and 1996 of grouse populations on Langholm and other moorland estates in response to concerns about the impact of birds of prey on the number of grouse available during the annual shooting season. The results, published in 1997 as "Birds of Prey and Red Grouse", cost £400,000; the study was funded and guided by a consortium of those with an interest in the subject, which included Scottish Natural Heritage, Buccleuch Estates, RSPB and the Joint Nature Conservation Committee.

The study was undertaken for research purposes: no compensation was paid to landowners.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bovine Tuberculosis

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will publish the report of the independent Husbandry Panel on Cattle TB. [122717]

Ms Quin: The Panel's report is published today. Copies are being placed in the Parliamentary Libraries and will be made widely available. We would like to thank Dr. Clive Philips, the Panel Chairman, and his colleagues for their work. The Government will now consider the Panel's recommendations in consultation with the Independent Scientific Group on Cattle TB and other interested parties before deciding how best to take them forward.

IACS Fraud

Mr. Gray: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many prosecutions for Integrated Administration and Control System fraud his Department has initiated since 1997; and how many of them have resulted in a guilty verdict. [122394]

Ms Quin: Since 1997 there have been 15 prosecutions for fraud against CAP schemes falling under the IACS umbrella. Of these 14 were found guilty, one not guilty.

DEFENCE

Defence Transport and Movements Agency

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets have been set for the Defence Transport and Movements Agency for the financial year 2000–01. [122567]

Mr. Spellar: The Chief Executive of the Defence Transport and Movements Agency has been set the following Key Targets for 2000–01:

Key Target 1:

To meet the Customers' requirements as specified in Customer Supplier Agreements (CSAs):

94 per cent. or more of Agency transactions within agreed criteria.

94 per cent. or more of the services provided under call-off contracts at a satisfactory level.

Customer Satisfaction rating for all Agency services, including call-off contracts, of 85 per cent. or more.

Key Target 2:

To achieve an average 3 per cent. reduction in administrative unit costs.

Key Target 3:

To demonstrate improved net added value.

Key Target 4:

To achieve at least a satisfactory rating in the provision of operational transport and movements support.

Defence Storage and Distribution Agency

Mr. Borrow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets have been set for the Defence Storage and Distribution Agency for the financial year 2000–01. [122569]

Mr. Spellar: The Chief Executive of the Defence Storage and Distribution Agency has been set the following Key Targets for 2000–01:

Key Target 1:

To meet the Customers' requirements as specified in Customer Supplier Agreements (CSAs):

85 per cent. or more of issues to consumers to be within specified supply chain processing times.

95 per cent. or more of receipts to be processed within agreed time limits.

No more than 0.1 per cent. of issues to be subject to an accepted discrepancy report.

The aggregated level and value of stock written off as a result of DSDA actions to be less than the levels agreed in CSAs.

Key Target 2:

To achieve an average 5 per cent. reduction in the unit cost of output.

Key Target 3:

To achieve an average 5 per cent. reduction in receipts processing times.

Key Target 4:

To achieve a 5 per cent. reduction in the cost of quality failures.

British Forces Post Office Agency

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets have been set for the British Forces Post Office agency for the financial year 2000–01. [122570]

Mr. Spellar: The Chief Executive of the British Forces Post Office agency has been set the following Key Targets for 2000–01:

Key Target 1:

To meet the Customers' requirements as specified in Customer Supplier Agreements (CSAs):

96.6 per cent. or more of deliveries of Official Mail and BFPO Private Mail to be within CSA specified times.

The Quality of Service Standard for all classes of mail to be greater than or equal to 94 per cent. of deliveries within CSA specified times.

98.5 per cent. or more of aggregated deliveries of Courier Mail to be within CSA specified times.

Key Target 2:

To achieve an average 3 per cent. reduction in the unit cost of output.

Civilian Personnel Costs

Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate the average annual cost of employing 10,000 MOD civilians. [121805]

Dr. Moonie: £169 million. In calculating this figure, it has been possible to take account of Pay, Employer's Related National Insurance Contributions and Pensions contributions only. Any calculation of overheads such as rents, rates, utilities costs, food, office equipment and services could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Nuclear Test Veterans

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to extend the remit of the National Radiological Protection Board's study of the incidence of multiple myeloma among veterans of the UK's atmospheric nuclear test programme in the 1950s. [121980]

Dr. Moonie: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) on 28 February 2000, Official Report, column 34W.

Dartmoor (Live Firing)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the (a) advertised and (b) actual number of days on which army live firing took place within each of the three ranges in the Dartmoor National Park for the year ended 31 December 1999. [121515]

Dr. Moonie: The advertised and actual number of days on which the Armed Services fired on each of the three firing ranges in the Dartmoor National Park for the year ended 31 December 1999 is as follows:

	Advertised	Actual
Okehampton	78	40
Willsworthy	205	131
Merrivale	137	83

Ships (Lynx Helicopters)

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the number of frigates and destroyers that are operating without the Lynx helicopter. [121603]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 11 May 2000]: At present, there are no frigates and destroyers on current operations without their dedicated Lynx flight. However, 10 other frigates and destroyers are presently at sea on other tasks, such as exercises and training, without their Lynx helicopters.

Typhoon Aircraft

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what air interception capability will exist for Royal Air Force Typhoon aircraft upon the exhaustion of the aircraft's air to air missile armament. [121676]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 11 May 2000]: None. However, it is unlikely that a cannon would be of use in such a scenario as the risk would remain that aircraft could be engaged by missiles from well outside the gun's range.

Property Procurement

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how much was spent by each service and Ministry of Defence agency on new buildings and land in each of the past three years; [121597]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 27 March 2000, Official Report, column 27W, on property procurement, if he will list the new buildings, with a value greater than £100,000, procured by his Department in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98 and (c) 1998–99, indicating their cost and location. [121610]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 11 May 2000]: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Eurofighter

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if the Mauser 27mm cannon specified for the Eurofighter Typhoon aircraft will be installed in aircraft of Tranche 1 of the production programme for the Royal Air Force; [121683]

(2) if the Royal Air Force will procure Mauser 27mm cannon to fit to its Eurofighter Typhoon aircraft with a corresponding stock of spares and ammunition. [121677]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 11 May 2000]: The Mauser 27mm cannon will be installed in Tranche 1 Eurofighter aircraft for the royal Air Force. However, we are not planning to procure stocks of spares or ammunition following our decision not to use the gun, or to fit it to subsequent tranches of aircraft.

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what instruction he gave to the Defence Sales organisation of his Department on the inclusion of Mauser 27mm cannon in Eurofighter Typhoon aircraft for sale to the Greek Air Force. [121679]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 11 May 2000]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State of Defence has given no instructions to officials concerning the weapons configuration for Eurofighter sales to the Greek Air Force. This is a matter for the Greek Government and Eurofighter GmbH with which they are negotiating the sale.

I welcome the benefits to the UK Defence Industry that the proposed sale will bring and my Department will continue to support that sale through the Defence Export Services Organisation, providing advice and assistance where we are able.

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment was made of the cost effectiveness of Mauser 27mm cannon armament for the Eurofighter Typhoon aircraft of the Royal Air Force in (a) airspace policing in peacetime and (b) ground attack missions. [121678]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 11 May 2000]: We have assessed that the minimal operational utility of the Mauser cannon on Eurofighter in any role is outweighed by its support, fatigue and training cost implications, particularly given the capability of the advanced short-range air-to-air missiles with which the aircraft will be armed.

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the benefits of commonality of armament and interoperability for the Eurofighter Typhoon aircraft in the four nation production programme. [121682]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 11 May 2000]: Potential benefits in commonality and interoperability between the four partner nations are a fundamental consideration when taking decisions on the Eurofighter programme.

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what combat advantages will be derived for Royal Air Force Typhoon aircraft from the elimination of the Mauser 27mm cannon not possessed by the equivalent gun equipped aircraft in service with the Italian, German and Spanish air forces. [121684]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 11 May 2000]: The advantages in deleting the Mauser cannon from our Eurofighter aircraft derive from avoiding the support, fatigue and cost implications which we would otherwise have to bear. These implications more than outweigh the minimal combat value in retaining the gun, particularly given the advanced short-range air-to-air missiles with which Eurofighter will be armed.

Iraq

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if RAF aircraft have used cluster bombs against targets in the (a) southern and (b) northern Iraq no-fly zones. [122230]

Mr. Hoon: No.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Millennium Summit

Ms Kingham: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what preparations her Department is making for the UN Millennium Summit in September. [121517]

Clare Short: The Millennium Summit will be an important opportunity for the world's leaders to put the International Development Targets for poverty elimination at the top of the international agenda. The emphasis on poverty elimination in the Secretary General's Millennium Report provides a good starting-point for discussion of this issue at the Summit. My officials will discuss with the UN Information Centre (UNIC) in London whether there are opportunities around the Millennium Report and Summit to raise awareness in the UK of the poverty elimination agenda and the UN's role. My Department, with the FCO, is providing funding for representatives from the least developed countries to attend the Millennium Forum, which will bring together the views of civil society world-wide as a contribution to the Summit.

Zambia

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when she estimates Zambia will reach its (a) decision point and (b) completion point in the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Initiative. [121779]

Clare Short: I hope that Zambia will reach its Decision Point under the revised Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) Initiative within the next nine months. We are disappointed that only five countries have, so far, come forward under the revised Initiative, and are pleased that, as we advocated, the World bank and IMF have agreed to set up a joint committee to oversee the implementation of HIPC. In order to reach its Decision Point and begin to receive debt relief, there are also actions that Zambia has to undertake. The Government have already begun work on developing their interim poverty reduction strategy, which I welcome. They also need to agree quickly and implement a programme of economic reform with the IMF.

In revising the HIPC Initiative last year, it was agreed that Completion Points would be "floating", that is, the requirement would be for countries to fulfil agreed conditions, rather than reaching Completion after three years. It is too early to say, at this stage, when Zambia will reach its Completion Point. I continue to emphasise that, in our view, the main condition for a country to complete the HIPC process should be the production of a high quality poverty strategy, based on sound analysis and extensive consultation.

Anti-drugs Measures

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will have discussions with mycologists at the Royal Botanic Gardens in Edinburgh before endorsing a programme submitted by the UN International Drug Control Programme for field trials of fusarium oxysporum as a weapon against coca growing in Columbia and Peru. [121080]

Clare Short: My Department has not been asked either to endorse or fund the UNDCP's research into the use of fusarium oxysporum as a control agent against coca crops in Colombia. My officials have, however, discussed the planned research with mycologists widely in the UK, including at the Royal Botanic Garden, Edinburgh. I understand that UNDCP are working closely with the UN Environmental Programme to ensure that all precautions are taken and that risks are eliminated.

SCOTLAND

Police Forces

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many police forces in Scotland have the Crown as part of their (a) crest and (b) cap badge. [121463]

Dr. Reid: The crest of the Scottish police service incorporates the Crown. The eight Scottish police forces have a common cap badge incorporating a representation of the Scottish police service crest. Two of the eight forces (Lothian and Borders Police and Fife Constabulary) have individual crests in the form of a coat of arms granted by the Lord Lyon. Both of these also incorporate the Crown.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Regeneration

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the number and value of (a) bids and (b) grants made in each of the last three financial years for which figures are available, for each (i) area-based and (ii) other regeneration-related initiative for which his Department is responsible. [119801]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 20 April 2000]: The information is not available in the format requested for all potentially relevant initiatives. The Department has adopted a range of approaches to provide support for those individuals most affected by deprivation, because we recognise that competitive bidding is not always the most effective method. The following examples demonstrate that range:

in the bidding process for Education Action Zones we received 60 bids for the 25 available places in the first round of Education Action Zones and 123 bids for the 50 available places in the second round for which 48 places were actually awarded. First round zones receive £750,000 in Government grant per year with the zone expected to raise a further £250,000 sponsorship from the private sector. Second round zones receive grant of £500,000 with a further £250,000 available on a pound for pound matched funding basis for every pound sponsorship raised from the private sector; the Neighbourhood Support Fund (NSF) will annually help at least 15,000 of the most disaffected and disengaged 13 to 19-year-olds to re-connect with education, training and employment opportunities. Between 1999–2000 and 2001–02 £60 million will be made available to support some 700 NSF projects that will test the effectiveness of a variety of approaches to re-engaging the disaffected young. Some of these do not involve competitive bidding. The individual members of the Learning Alliance (CSV, NACRO, Rathbone CI, and the YMCA), will be funding NSF projects directly via their local affiliates in the 40 target areas, at a total annual cost for projects of £2 million. The National Youth Agency (NYA), working closely with local authority youth services, will identify potential NSF projects and then select the most promising to fund. The NYA is currently processing applications for NSF support from more than 150 community/voluntary organisations, with a total value of approximately £5 million. The NYA aims to fund 80 projects per annum at a combined yearly cost of £3 million. The Community Development Foundation (CDF) has invited competitive bids from community and voluntary groups and has received more than 1,300 applications for NSF funding, with a total value of around £26 million. Some 400 projects have been approved to date. The CDF will eventually support about 600 projects, at an annual cost of £12 million;

Excellence in Cities (EiC) is not a traditional bidding programme. Forty-seven local authorities, responsible for city schools, have been invited to become part of the programme and are guaranteed funding provided they meet quality assessment thresholds;

the approach for establishing Employment Zones involved an open and competitive bidding process to run a commercial operation where bids were assessed, against published criteria, by independent consultants; to support early years education, we are making specific grants available to Local Education Authorities (from September 1999-March 2002) to almost double the number of three year olds in early education places. While this new money is not geared towards any regeneration initiatives it is being targeted on those children with greatest social need. This money does not form part of any bidding process.

Barristers (Disability)

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what recent representations he has received regarding the exclusion of barristers from the provisions of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995; [120782]

(2) what plans he has to amend the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 to include barristers; and if he will make a statement. [120781]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 8 May 2000]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State received a report on 13 December 1999 from the Disability Rights Task Force, set up by the Government to consult and advise on how to implement comprehensive and enforceable civil rights for disabled people. In its final report, the Task Force made over 150 recommendations. On 13 December, my right hon. Friend announced that the Government would be bringing forward legislation to give effect to the education recommendations of the Task Force. On 30 March, the Government issued an interim response to the report's recommendations in the areas of local government, health and social services, housing, the environment and participation in public life.

Also on 30 March, I informed the House in a written reply that the Government are still considering a number of the recommendations that would require legislative changes to the DDA. One such recommendation is that the employment provisions of civil rights legislation should cover barristers. The Government's final response to the report will be made in due course.

Employment and Social Affairs Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the outcome of the Social Affairs Council held in Brussels on 8 May; and if he will make a statement. [121570]

Ms Jowell: I represented the UK at the Employment and Social Affairs Council held in Brussels on 8 May. There were two items on the agenda: the Broad Economic Guidelines 2000 (BEGs), prepared by Economic and Finance Ministers (ECOFIN) in accordance with Article 99 of the Treaties establishing the European Community; and Article 13 (non-discrimination).

In the discussion on the Broad Economic Guidelines, the UK supported the emphasis on structural reform, but argued that more attention should be given to tackling social exclusion. The Presidency undertook to write to ECOFIN summarising the views of the Employment and Social Affairs Council and said that he had received an assurance that ECOFIN would not be invited to finalise its draft of the BEGs until it had received the views of the Council.

The Presidency reported on the negotiations on the two proposed Directives and the action programme brought forward under Article 13(non-discrimination). The Presidency noted that a number of issues remained to be resolved but hoped to register progress at the SAC on 6 June.

Supply Teachers (Jury Service Cover)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proposals he has to reimburse schools who have to engage supply teachers temporarily to replace teachers who are absent on jury service; and if he will make a statement. [121729]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Department has no plans to reimburse schools for any costs incurred in covering teachers who serve on juries. The arrangements for paid and unpaid leave for jury service are determined under teachers local contracts of employment.

Homophobia Video

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment in how many schools the video, "Beyond a Phase: A Practical Guide to Challenging Homophobia in Schools", is available. [121968]

Jacqui Smith: The Department does not hold this information. I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave on 14 April 2000, Official Report, column 297W.

Civil Servants (Relocation)

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which relocation companies his Department has used when relocating civil servants since May 1997. [122294]

Mr. Wills: During the period in question, the Department has used only one relocation company, Cendant Relocation (UK) Ltd.

New Deal

Mr. Mudie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many New Deal places have been (a) offered, (b) taken up and (c) completed in his Department since the start of the New Deal. [122231]

Mr. Wills: I can confirm that in response to (a) a total of 54 individuals have been offered New Deal placements in my Department, of whom (b) 44 have taken up the offer and in response to (c) a total of 8 placements have been completed.

Mr. Mudie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many New Deal places have been (a) offered, (b) taken up and (c) completed within Leeds City Council since the start of the New Deal. [122228]

Ms Jowell: From April 1998 to May 2000 no New Deal clients have been directly employed by Leeds City Council on the Employment Option.

Groundwork manages the New Deal ESF option in Leeds. Leeds City Council run the ETF programme for Groundwork. Since April 1998, 127 New Deal clients have started the Council's ETF option. Some of these will subsequently have started work for LCC—but the Employment Service does not have details of those engaged or specific numbers.

Universities (ICT Funding)

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the costs of upgrading the existing IT structure within the universities to allow individual academics access to JANET 4, broken down by research council. [122136]

Mr. Wicks: We have allocated approximately £150 million to the Higher Education Funding Council for England (HEFCE) for capital investment in information and communications technology over the period 1999–2000 to 2001–02. The improvement in the backbone to the JANET network, SuperJANET4, is being met from top-sliced funding from all the HE Funding Councils, of which HEFCE's contribution is £40 million. Individual higher education institutions and research councils wanting to enhance their local area networks to exploit the extra bandwidth available will need to fund this from within their annual grant allocation.

Press Officers

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many Press Officers were in post in his Department in (a) May 1997 and (b) May 2000. [121954]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 12 May 2000]: At the beginning of May 1997 there were 20 Press Officers in post at the Department for Education and Employment, serving six Ministers. There are currently 27 Press Officers in post, serving eight Ministers.

School Inspections

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what assessment was made of the ability of Salter Baker Associates (Education) Ltd. to meet Ofsted's quality assurance standards following an audit of the company in summer 1999; and what was the date of the assessment; [121791]

(2) if he will list the documents received by Ofsted from Salter Baker Associates (Education) Ltd. in August 1999; [121792]

(3) on what grounds and on what date Ofsted decided to terminate 14 inspection contracts with Salter Baker Associates (Education) Ltd., in 1999; [121795]

(4) what steps were taken by Ofsted to ensure that matters of concern raised during its quality assurance audit of Salter Baker Associates (Education) Ltd. were addressed prior to the awarding of inspection contracts for autumn 1999; [121796]

(5) what concerns were recorded by the Ofsted Contracts Division during their quality assurance audit of Salter Baker Associates (Education) Ltd., in summer 1999; [121797]

(6) what steps are being taken by the Contracts Division of Ofsted to ensure that companies undertaking inspections facilitate checks on their financial viability; [121798]

(7) what discussions he has had with Ofsted on measures needed to monitor the financial viability of companies undertaking school inspections; and if he will make a statement. [121799]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 15 May 2000]: These are matters for Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools, Chris Woodhead. I have asked him to write to my hon. Friend and to place a copy of his letter in the Library.

Connexions Service

Ms Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the locations of the pilot projects for the Connexions Service; and if he will make a statement. [120848]

Mr. Wicks: I am pleased to announce the extension of the Connexions Service pilots. New pilots are to be established in Durham, Hertfordshire, Central London, Oldham, Merseyside, South Yorkshire, and at the Huntercombe Young Offenders Institution in Oxfordshire. These are additional to the pilots announced by the Secretary of State on 3 February.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 19 April 2000, Official Report, column 563W, on Connexions, how many persons are employed in the National Unit of the Connexions Service in (a) London, (b) Sheffield and (c) elsewhere; how many of them are from (i) Government Departments, (ii) youth and voluntary work and (iii) the private sector; and what is the timetable for employing more persons in the National Unit. [122473]

Mr. Wicks: The structure of the Connexions National Unit will be for the new Chief Executive to determine. We expect a new Chief Executive to take up post and make decisions on the staffing complement of the National Unit by late summer.

Youth Services (Wandsworth)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much money was spent by his Department on youth services in the London Borough of Wandsworth in the last year for which figures are available. [122388]

Mr. Wicks: My Department does not fund Wandsworth's youth service. Youth service funding is provided centrally from the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions to each local authority. In 1997–98, the latest confirmed figures taken from the local authority returns (RO1), Wandsworth spent £2,958,000 on its youth service.

Learning Gateway

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many of the 16 and 17-year-olds in the Learning Gateway have entered learning and training. [122349]

Mr. Wicks: The Learning Gateway provides a client-centred approach, based on one-to-one support from a Personal Adviser, for 16 and 17-year-olds who have drifted away from learning and need additional help to enter mainstream learning opportunities. The Learning Gateway was introduced in September 1999. At the end of March 2000, some 17,500 young people had joined and over 11,000 were still on it. Around 3,500 (60 per cent. of leavers) were known to have progressed to a mainstream education or training opportunity or found a job—an encouraging start for a new initiative dealing with a particularly disadvantaged client group. The Learning Gateway has a key role to play in the development of the Connexions Service—the new youth support service for 13 to 19-year-olds, which will be phased in from April 2001.

TREASURY

Tobacco Taxation

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much money he expects the increased tobacco taxation to raise for expenditure on the NHS in the next three financial years; and if his expenditure projections for the NHS will be sustained irrespective of the yield from tobacco taxation. [120609]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 2 May 2000]: Table A.13 in the Financial Statement and Budget Report gives the projected Exchequer yields from the 5 per cent. real increase in tobacco duty announced in Budget 2000. The Budget 2000 expenditure projections for the NHS are from plans which the Government will deliver.

Funding (Wales)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what representations he has received from the National Assembly for Wales in relation to Objective 1 match funding and the Comprehensive Spending Review; [121736]

(2) what representations he has received from the (a) First Secretary of the National Assembly for Wales and (b) Secretary of State for Wales with relation to (i) the Comprehensive Spending Review and (ii) this year's Comprehensive Spending Review and Objective 1 match funding. [121737]

Mr. Andrew Smith: There have been a number of representations on the 2000 spending review and Objective 1 funding. The implications for the Welsh block arising from Objective 1 funding are currently being considered as part of the Government's Spending Review which is now under way.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he received from the National Assembly for Wales in relation to this year's Comprehensive Spending Review. [121735]

Mr. Andrew Smith: A number of representations have been received in relation to the 2000 spending review. The outcome of the review will be announced in due course.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make available to the National Assembly for Wales, for capital expenditure projects in the industrial and social infrastructure, a population-based share of the sum the Treasury receives as a result of the sale of mobile telephone franchises. [121924]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The receipts from the sale of mobile phone licenses are a UK resource which will be used to reduce net debt. The resulting reduction in the burden of public debt will benefit all parts of the UK for many years to come.

Debt Relief

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps the Government are taking to ensure that the cancellation of third world debt is on the agenda at the G8 Summit in Okinawa. [121766]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Prime Minister and Chancellor of the Exchequer have informed the Japanese Presidency of the G7/8 that we would like to use the opportunity of the Okinawa summit, and the meetings of G7 Finance Ministers running up to the summit, to review and encourage progress on the debt relief initiatives.

Penalty Clauses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the contracts entered into with private sector companies for the provision of goods or services since May 1997 where penalty clauses were triggered for non-performance; and if he will make a statement. [122018]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Since May 1997, the Treasury has not had a contract that has triggered liquidated damages/penalty clauses.

Climate Change Levy

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how he intends to ensure that the climate change levy is revenue neutral in the long term for those industries and individual companies to which it is to be applied; and if he will make a statement. [122126]

Mr. Timms: As the Chancellor stated when the climate change levy was first proposed, the levy package is designed to be revenue neutral for the private sector. Moreover, the levy package is expected to be broadly neutral between services and manufacturing, in that the Government expect manufacturing and services each to pay broadly as much in the levy as they get back via the 0.3 per cent. NICs reduction and the additional support for energy efficiency measures. The Government do not intend to make the levy revenue neutral for each firm or sector, however. As Lord Marshall stated in his report "Economic Instruments and the Business Use of Energy", the design of the levy should ensure > some incentive for all users to save energy at the margin.

As with excise duties, the Government expect that the rates of the levy will keep pace with inflation over time. The value of the NIC reductions to business is also expected to increase over time.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to make an early announcement of financial incentives for the emissions trading scheme for firms taking on binding emissions targets as part of the climate change levy; and if he will make a statement. [122125]

Mr. Timms: Emissions trading will provide a flexible way in which sectors involved in negotiated agreements as part of the climate change levy can meet their individual energy efficiency targets.

In addition, the Government are working closely with the business-led UK Emissions Trading Group (ETG) on the development of a wider emissions trading scheme, and have said that they see merit in the case put forward by the ETG that some form of financial incentive will be required for companies to take on binding emission targets that generate additional emission reductions. Issues being addressed include the links between the wider trading scheme and the negotiated agreements; and the form a financial incentive might take. Further announcements will depend on the progress the ETG and the Government can make in dealing with these outstanding issues.

Pensions

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will hypothecate the proceeds from privatisations, semi-privatisations and outsourcing of services for the purpose of increasing the level of the basic pension. [122105]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 15 May 2000]: No. The Government will be spending an additional £6.5 billion on pensioners over the course of this Parliament, £2.5 billion more than if the basic state pension had been increased in line with earnings. We are helping all pensioners, but targeting help on those who have lost out over the last 20 years. Over half of these additional resources are going to 3 million of Britain's poorest pensioners. As a result of all our measures, including the introduction and uprating of the minimum income guarantee in line with earnings, raising the winter fuel payment to £150 and the introduction of free TV licences for pensioners aged over 75, the poorest pensioners over 75 will be up to £950 better off in cash terms than in 1997.

The Government make their spending decisions based on what is affordable within the prudent control of the public finances. In general, the Government believe that how money is raised should not determine how it is spent, and spending priorities are best determined in the round. The Chancellor's recent Budget continued to build a platform of economic stability from which to deliver high and stable levels of growth and employment, while releasing substantial new resources for its key priorities, including extra support for pensioners.

Insurance Brokers Registration Act 1977

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he plans to take steps to repeal the Insurance Brokers Registration Act 1977. [R] [122168]

Miss Melanie Johnson: In response to a request from the Insurance Brokers Registration Council, the Government have decided that the repeal of this Act will take effect on 30 April 2001.

Institutional Investment

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made on the review of institutional investment by Mr. Paul Myners. [122716]

Mr. Timms: A consultation document is being launched by Paul Myners today, and will be available on the Treasury website (hm-treasury.gov.uk). Printed copies will be available tomorrow, and will be placed in the Library of the House.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Commission (Nice Proposals)

17. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the President of the European Commission to discuss proposals to be agreed at Nice. [120886]

Mr. Robin Cook: I meet the President of the Commission regularly, including at the monthly meetings of the General Affairs Council.

We expect two main issues for agreement at the Nice European Council. First, the agreement to reform of the European Union to prepare it for enlargement, on which we share with France the key objective of securing a reweighting of votes in favour of larger members. Secondly, conclusion of the arrangements for the European Security Initiative, on which France has been our partner since we launched it jointly at St. Malo. The French Presidency is also mandated to take forward the conclusions of the Lisbon European Summit, at which Britain secured Europe's commitment to our agenda of economic reform and full employment.

Chechnya

18. Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had recently with Governments in the north Caucasus regarding the situation in Chechnya. [120887]

Mr. Vaz: My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary have regular discussions with the Russian Government on Chechnya, most recently when Mr. Putin visited London on 17 April, during a telephone conversation on 27 March, and during my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's visit to St. Petersburg on 11 March. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary raised Chechnya during his visit to Moscow on 22/23 February and expects to discuss it again tomorrow when he returns to Moscow for official talks.

Zimbabwe

19. Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement regarding the proposed gift of public money to fund the acquisition of white-owned farms in Zimbabwe. [120889]

23. Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps the Government are taking to assist the holding of free and fair elections in Zimbabwe; and if he will make a statement. [120893]

26. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his latest contacts with the Government of Zimbabwe. [120898]

Mr. Hain: I refer the hon. Member and my hon. Friends to the oral answer my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary gave earlier in the House today to the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), Official Report, column 131.

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the prospects for free and fair elections in Zimbabwe. [122003]

Mr. Hain: We note the recent statement by the Zimbabwe Electoral Supervisory Commission that free and fair elections could not be held under conditions of mounting political violence which has killed at least 19 people in the past three months. We have called all along for a fair election, free from political intimidation. It is not too late for President Mugabe to restore an environment conducive to free and fair elections.

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had regarding independent monitoring of elections in Zimbabwe with (a) the Commonwealth, (b) the European Union, (c) the United Nations and (d) other organisations. [122002]

Mr. Hain: We are working closely with the Commonwealth, EU, UN and other partners to ensure that international election observers are deployed to Zimbabwe as soon as possible, and in sufficient numbers to allow them to observe the pre-election preparations and to speak authoritatively on the conduct of the poll.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the action being taken to agree the presence in Zimbabwe of election, human rights and democracy observers including those from the Organisation of African Unity and the EU. [122268]

Mr. Hain: The Commonwealth Secretary-General and a team of experts and a team from the European Commission are visiting Zimbabwe to prepare for the deployment of Commonwealth and EU observers. We are in touch with the OAU but do not yet have details of its plans.

Indonesia

20. Mr. David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what support the Government are giving to the Government of Indonesia to help them combat the problems of ethnic conflict. [120890]

Mr. Robin Cook: I raised the issue of ethnic tension when I met President Wahid in February. We fully support his efforts to secure stability in the areas of conflict and we welcome signature in Geneva at the weekend of a ceasefire in Aceh. Britain has already funded initiatives to promote reconciliation in Maluku and we are fully supporting the efforts of the United Nations Development Programme in the region. We are ready to help in any realistic and sensible way in reducing ethnic tensions and violence.

Middle East

21. Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of when the peace accords between (a) the Palestinian Authority and Israel, (b) Lebanon and Israel and (c) Syria and Israel will be signed; and if he will make a statement. [120891]

Mr. Hain: I have just returned from Syria and the Lebanon and we continue to work hard to achieve success in the Middle East Peace Process which is at an important stage.

33. Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his current assessment is of the middle east peace process. [120905]

Mr. Hain: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the oral answer I gave today to my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey), Official Report, column 146.

Anglo-Swiss Relations

22. Dr. Palmer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Anglo-Swiss relations. [120892]

Mr. Vaz: UK/Swiss relations are excellent and Switzerland is an important trading partner for the UK.

Cyprus

24. Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress in the application of Cyprus to join the European Union. [120894]

Mr. Vaz: Cyprus's accession negotiations with the European Union have covered 25 of the 31 chapters of the acquis communautaire, comprising the rights and obligations of EU membership. The remainder will be opened this year. Fifteen chapters do not need further negotiation at this stage—the greatest number for any candidate.

The EU's objective is accession, following a political settlement, of a united Cyprus to the EU. It would clearly be easier for the united island to accede to the EU. But the Helsinki European Council in December 1999 agreed that a settlement is not a precondition for accession. We fully support the UN proximity talks preparing for a comprehensive settlement, which are due to resume shortly in New York.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Turkish Prime Minister on his recent statement about Cyprus; and if he will make a statement on that statement. [121932]

Mr. Vaz: The Foreign Secretary has had no recent discussions with the Turkish Prime Minister on the subject of Cyprus. However, we maintain regular contact with the Turkish Government in the context of the current UN settlement process and continue to urge all parties involved to cooperate with the UN Secretary-General constructively and flexibly.

Central America (Street Children)

25. Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent reports he has received relating to street children in central America. [120896]

Mr. Hain: Most of the reports relate to Guatemala and Honduras. The latest were about the murders of two 17-year-old Honduran boys.

We follow this issue with interest and concern, and regularly make representations to Central American authorities. We maintain regular contact with NGOs active on street children issues.

We are active in helping to alleviate the suffering of street children. The FCO is today hosting the Americas Open Day as part of the String of Pearls Millennium Festival. This will include a live world-wide internet broadcast on Street Children in Central America alongside "Toybox" a UK charity we support in Guatemala: A first for the FCO.

Franco-British Co-operation

27. Mr. Casale: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Franco-British co-operation in international affairs. [120899]

Mr. Vaz: The UK and France have achieved a great deal since the UK/French Summits at St. Malo in December 1998 and in London in November 1999, which committed both Governments to strengthening their foreign policy cooperation. In addition to our joint work on the European defence initiative, we have worked together closely on Africa, the Middle East, the Western Balkans and on UN issues.

Non-proliferation Treaty

28. Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the outcome of the non-proliferation treaty review conference in New York. [120900]

37. Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the non-proliferation treaty review conference. [120909]

Mr. Hain: The Review Conference runs until 19 May. The UK delegation will continue to work for a positive outcome to the Conference which will advance the goal of nuclear disarmament.

UN Security Council

29. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his policy is in relation to increasing the number of permanent members of the UN Security Council. [120901]

Mr. Hain: We believe early enlargement of the UN Security Council is essential to make it more representative of today's world.

We support expansion of the Council from 15 members to 24 including five additional permanent seats: two for Germany and Japan plus three for developing countries in Africa, Asia and Latin America.

New Zealand Prime Minister (State Visit)

30. Mr. Neil Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent visit to the UK of the Prime Minister of New Zealand. [120902]

35. Mr. Laxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent visit to the UK of the Prime Minister of New Zealand. [120907]

Mr. Battle: Helen Clark visited the UK on 18 and 19 April. She had very productive discussions with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, and with other senior colleagues. I also had the opportunity to meet her briefly. We attach great importance to maintaining our excellent and close relationship with the government of New Zealand, and were delighted to see Ms Clark here so soon in to her term of office.

Italy

31. Mr. Plaskitt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contacts he has had with the new Government of Italy. [120903]

Mr. Vaz: The new Italian Government were approved by the Italian Parliament on 28 April. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary met Italian Foreign Minister Lamberto Dini at the gathering of EU foreign ministers held under the Portuguese presidency in the Azores 5–6 May.

St. George's and Europe Days

32. Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how his Department's establishments (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) overseas marked (i) St. George's day and (ii) Europe day. [120904]

Mr. Vaz: The FCO does not officially mark St. George's day (or St. David's or St. Andrew's Day). Nor do we issue guidance to our missions overseas, which represent the interests of all the United Kingdom.

On Europe Day, the FCO and missions overseas fly the EU flag alongside the Union Jack. This year, for the first time, the FCO also hosted a Europe Open Day on 9 May to coincide with the London String of Pearls Millennium Festival. Some of our missions overseas also contributed to Europe Day events organised by their host Governments and the local offices of the European Commission.

International Drugs Trade

34. Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made by Her Majesty's Government on tackling the international drugs trade. [120906]

Mr. Battle: UK counter-drugs activity overseas aims to reduce the availability of Class A drugs in the UK. Progress, achieved through co-ordinated inter-Departmental activity on agreed priorities, is being seen in increased seizures of heroin and cocaine en route to the UK/EU, and increased disruption of the criminal groups involved in trafficking. The UK is also active in international forums aimed at strengthening the global framework for tackling the illicit drugs trade, including in the UN and G8. In the financial year 1999–2000 my Department spent £6.7 million on anti-drugs projects overseas.

Peru

36. Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent Peruvian presidential elections. [120908]

Mr. Battle: The UK has played a leading role in calling for higher standards in the Peruvian electoral process, commissioning election campaign reports and providing and financing electoral observers. We welcomed the announcement of the second round on 28 May, and continue to press for opposition access to the media, proper use of state resources and avoidance of the irregularities of the first round.

Stability Pact

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made on implementation of the Stability Pact for south-east Europe. [120879]

Mr. Vaz: The Government are pleased with the progress of the Stability Pact for south-east Europe. I represented Britain at the regional funding conference on 29 March, at which 1.8 billion euro was sought to fund quick start projects in the region. In the event, 2.4 billion euro was pledged. The UK has played a leading role in the Pact, reflecting our position as a key contributor to stability in the Balkans.

Intergovernmental Conference

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in respect of "IGC: Reform for Enlargement", Cm 4595, how many copies were printed; what the cost per copy was to the Government; what the sale price was; how many were distributed free and to whom; if he will estimate the cost per copy to the Government and the sale price if it had been in black and white only; and for what reasons he did not print it in that form. [121038]

Mr. Vaz: 1,500 copies were printed. The cost per the copy to Government was £7.40 and the sale price £11.10. Numerous copies were distributed free of charge to opinion formers and members of the public. The cost per copy of a black and white version would have been £4.47, with a sale price of £6.70.

We decided to publish the White Paper in colour in order to make the material clearer and more accessible to the public.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to "IGC: Reform for Enlargement, Cm 4595", which proposals under discussion in respect of the Enlargement Treaty planned for consideration at Nice in December would require amendment of Acts of Parliament; and when the proposed treaty will be published. [121078]

Mr. Vaz: We hope that the intergovernmental conference negotiations currently underway will be concluded by the end of the year. It is too early to say what the result of those negotiations will be, but the outcome will require ratification by Parliament.

Danube

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received from the Bulgarian and Romanian Governments on (a) removal of obstacles on the Danube and (b) the rehabilitation of ports on the Danube. [121757]

Mr. Vaz: The Bulgarian and Romanian Prime Ministers wrote to their EU and NATO counterparts on 5 April setting out their concerns at the slow progress of the Danube Commission's proposal to the European Commission for clearance of the River Danube. The Danube Commission's proposal does, however, have a number of technical issues on which the EU requires detailed clarification.

Neither government have raised the question of rehabilitation of ports on the Danube, though both have expressed concern at mounting unemployment along the Danube as a result of the halt in river traffic through Serbia.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what estimate he has made of the cost of (a) clearance of the Danube and (b) building a new bridge on the Danube in Novi Sad. [121771]

Mr. Vaz: The estimated cost of clearing the Danube, as set out in the Danube Commission's proposal to the European Commission of 25 January 2000, is 24.1 million euro.

We have made no estimate of the cost of rebuilding a new bridge over the Danube at Novi Sad. We understand that both the Serbian government and the Novi Sad local municipal authorities have announced separate plans to build a replacement bridge at Novi Sad.

Japanese Emperor (State Visit)

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his Department met the Metropolitan police to discuss the security arrangements for the State Visit of Emperor Akihito of Japan in May 1998. [121718]

Mr. Battle: Meetings involving Foreign and Commonwealth Office officials and the police in advance of the State Visit by the Emperor of Japan were held on the following dates: 15, 26 and 29 January and 6 and 8 February 1998. The purpose of these meetings was not to take operational decisions, but to go through successive drafts of the programme and discuss new programme proposals.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will release the minutes of discussions his Department held about the security arrangements which were taken for the State Visit of Emperor Akihito of Japan in May 1998. [121719]

Mr. Battle: Minutes were not taken because the purpose of these meetings was not to take operational decisions, but to go through successive drafts of the programme and discuss new programme proposals. Any outcome of the discussions was subsequently reflected in revised programmes.

EU and NATO

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when and at what level the EU consultation and co-operation mechanism with NATO will be set up. [121753]

Mr. Vaz: The United Kingdom is fully involved in the continuing discussions to ensure the best means of providing full mutual consultation, co-operation and transparency between the EU and NATO. The Presidency will report on progress to the European Council at Feira on 19–20 June.

European Security

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how and at what stage non-EU members will be involved with the shaping and implementation of EU decisions concerning European Security and Defence Identity and ESDP. [121754]

Mr. Vaz: The Portuguese EU Presidency will report on progress to the European Council at Feira between 19–20 June on the mechanisms for involving non-EU European countries in military crisis management.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what evidence has been provided since May 1994 to Governments of states against which British nuclear weapons were hitherto targeted that they are no longer so targeted. [121931]

Mr. Vaz: We have given a number of key public assurances that our nuclear weapons are not targeted at any state, most recently as part of the common statement made by the nuclear weapons states on 1 May 2000 in New York at the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty Review Conference.

China

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent reports he has received concerning the persecution of House Church leaders in China. [122234]

Mr. Battle: We follow the situation concerning the House Church Christian leaders in China closely. The treatment of Li Dexian, who has been detained on a number of occasions, most recently on 11 April, is a particular concern. We raised his case during the fourth round of the UK/China Human Rights Dialogue in Beijing in February, and I have also raised this case more recently with the Chinese Ambassador. We also pressed the Chinese authorities to facilitate the freedom of religious practice in line with the provisions of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights which China signed in October 1998. We will continue to press our concerns with the Chinese authorities at every appropriate opportunity including future rounds of the UK and EU Human Rights Dialogues.

Handcuff Exports

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the serial numbers of those Big Brutus handcuffs exported from the United Kingdom by Hyatt & Co., of Birmingham, since 1 May 1997; when he expects legislation further restricting the sale of oversize handcuffs to be brought forward; and if he will make a statement. [121803]

Mr. Hain: Neither FCO nor DTI has the information requested. Serial numbers are not routinely requested from, or supplied by, companies as part of the export licensing process.

I refer the hon. member to the answer I gave him on 10 March 2000, Official Report, column 873W. We are not aware of any illegal conduct on the part of UK individuals or companies. Should any evidence be produced, we would of course pass it on to the appropriate investigative authorities.

The Government are still considering amending legislation to extend controls to cover large individual cuffs.

Strategic Arms Exports

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the Government's response to the Joint Select Committee report on Strategic Arms Exports will be completed. [122290]

Mr. Hain: We regret the delay in responding to the Report of the joint inquiry conducted by the Foreign Affairs, Defence, Trade and Industry and International Development Committees into the 1997 and 1998 Annual Reports on strategic export controls and aims to do so as soon as possible.

The Report contained a large number of complex recommendations for specific action, which were of interest to several Departments. It has taken longer to formulate a response than would normally be the case.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Public Records

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (1) what response the Secretary to the Advisory Council on Public Records has made to those hon. Members who have asked the Council whether Public Records Act Instrument 12, 1996, permits the Keeper of Public Records to allow constituents to inspect and copy the 1911 decennial census returns for England and Wales; and on which dates since January 1998 the full Council has met under the Chairmanship of the Master of the Rolls to consider similar requests from hon. Members; [121836]

(2) how many hon. Members have written since January to the Chairman of the Advisory Council on Public Records, requesting the Council to consider whether Public Records Act Instrument 12, 1996, permits the Keeper of Public Records to allow their constituents to inspect and copy the 1911 decennial census returns for England and Wales; and what advice the Chairman has given to those hon. Members on the legal issues involved. [121835]

Mr. Lock: The full Advisory Council considered the subject of access to the 1911 census returns on one occasion since January 1998 namely, on 22 October 1998.

The Master of the Rolls, as Chairman of the Advisory Council on Public Records, has received 15 letters from hon. Members since January 1998 concerning access to the 1911 census returns.

The answer sent to hon. Members by the Secretary to the Advisory Council on Public Records, at the request of the Master of the Rolls, is annexed.

On 3 April 2000 the Secretary consulted all members of the Council by post, asking them whether they wished the subject to be put on the agenda for the next meeting of the Council in June. Members approved the line taken in the responses to hon. Members and none requested that the subject be considered again by the full Council.

Access to Census Records from 1901 and 1911

The Master of the Rolls has asked me to thank you for your letter of *, and to reply on his behalf. He has seen and approved the contents of this letter.

I think that your constituent has been briefed by Mr. Denis McCready, who has for some years been campaigning about access to the census records. Mr. McCready himself appealed to the Council on this issue, and the Council considered his appeal on 22 October 1998. I shall set out below the background, then explain the Council's position.

The Public Records Act 1958, as amended by the Public Records Act 1967, specifies the normal term for the closure of public records, and the procedure for changing that period, as follows:

> Public records in the Public Record Office ... shall not be available for public inspection until the expiration of the period of thirty years beginning with the first day of January in the year next after that in which they were created, or of such other period, either longer or shorter, as the Lord Chancellor may, with the approval, or at the request, of the Minister or other person, if any, who appears to him to be primarily concerned, for the time being prescribe as respects any particular class of public records. (c5(1))

It is thus the responsibility of the Lord Chancellor and (in the case of the Office for National Statistics, for census records) the Economic Secretary to the Treasury to decide whether and for what period the normal thirty year term will be varied. The Lord Chancellor always seeks the advice of the Council before making such a decision. Neither the Master of the Rolls (as the Council's chairman) nor the Keeper of the Public Records has any authority in the matter, so neither has the power unilaterally to release closed records.

In a Schedule to an Instrument signed by Lord Gardiner, the Lord Chancellor, on 20 June 1966 all decennial census returns were closed for 100 years. I enclose a copy of the Schedule. Mr. McCready has suggested that this schedule is invalid because it does not specify the "class" of records, as required by s5(1) of the Act. Mr. McCready is using the term "class" in its technical sense in the Public Record Office where it has until recently meant a particular series of records identified by letters and a number (such as AIR 21 on the same schedule). However, as you know, the interpretation of an Act of Parliament depends on definitions contained within the Act (there is none for "class" in the Public Records Act), the Interpretation Act, or normal dictionaries. The word "class" in the Act should thus be understood to have its normal meaning of a category, such as (in this instance) "Decennial Census Returns".

Mr. McCready has also pointed out that no undertaking of closure for 100 years was given to individuals when the 1901 and 1911 censuses were taken, and suggested that this means that there could be no breach of confidence by releasing them after a shorter period. The Home Secretary on 26 October 1998 in a Written Answer to a Parliamentary Question gave the terms of the undertakings of confidentiality stated on the 1901, 1911 and later census schedules (Hansard cols 55–6). That on the 1901 schedule reads:

> The Return is required for carrying out the provisions of the Census Act. The contents of the Schedules will be treated as confidential; they will be published in General Abstract only, and strict care will be taken that the Returns are not used for the gratification of curiosity, or for other purposes than those of the Census.

Those for 1911 read, on the front and on the back of the schedule:

> The contents of the Schedule will be treated as strictly confidential.

> The contents of the Schedule will be treated as confidential. Strict care will be taken that no information is disclosed with regard to individual persons. The returns are not to be used ... for any other purpose than the preparation of Statistical Tables.

In 1981, the Government for the first time spelt out on the census schedules the period that it considered would need to pass before the duty of confidence owed as a result of such undertakings would be discharged:

> Your replies will be treated in strict confidence. After the census, the forms will be locked away for 100 years before they are passed to the Public Record Office.

In answer to Parliamentary Questions the Government has reiterated that it considers that 100 years is the period which should pass before the duty of confidence is discharged. In a written answer to Lord Teviot in the House of Lords on 14 October 1997, the Lord Chancellor said that:

> the maintenance of public confidence in the census is paramount. It would be unwise to amend retrospectively the period of closure as the credibility of assurances about recent and future censuses would be affected if the Government is seen to be departing from previous assurances.

The present Government therefore adheres to the guidelines, set out in the previous Government's White Paper Open Government of 1993 (Cm 2290), for determining the extended closure of records (annex C, p 90). These specify that records of the decennial census of population are to be closed for 100 years.

The Council concluded in October 1998 that the Government's grounds for the closure of the census records were valid, but that it might be possible to overcome the problem for future generations by giving a lesser commitment in forthcoming censuses. It therefore decided not to ask the Lord Chancellor to initiate any reconsideration of the matter, and informed Mr. McCready of its views. As you will appreciate, in the absence of any change in policy by ministers there was nothing that the Council could ask the Master of the Rolls or Keeper to do. There has been no change since 1998 that would justify asking the Council to reconsider, and so far as the 1901 census is concerned the records will become open at the beginning of 2002 in any case, in a searchable digital format that has been widely welcomed by genealogical bodies.

Penalty Clauses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the contracts entered into with private sector companies for the provision of goods or services since May 1997 where penalty clauses were triggered for non-performance; and if he will make a statement. [122020]

Mr. Lock: Of the contracts entered into by the Lord Chancellor's Department since May 1997, only that with CSL Group Ltd. has triggered penalty payments.

Family Law

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the whole of the Family Law Act 1996 will be operational; and what additional costs the Government will incur as a result. [121721]

Jane Kennedy: Parts I, III and IV of the Family Law Act 1996, with the exception of section 60, are already in force. In relation to Part II of the Act, I refer the hon. Member to the written parliamentary answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) on 17 June 1999, Official Report, column 213W. The position remains the same.

Section 60 of the Act permits the making of Rules of Court to allow third parties to apply for orders under Part IV on behalf of victims of domestic violence. The Government are currently considering whether it is appropriate to implement the provisions of section 60. The cost implications of implementation will be considered as part of this process.

Judgments

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department on how many occasions since May 1997 he has had cause (a) to reprimand or (b) take other action about the length of time taken by a judge to deliver judgment following the end of the trial. [121716]

Jane Kennedy: The Lord Chancellor, as Head of the Judiciary, deals with allegations of judicial misconduct. There have been two occasions where retrials have been necessary because of judicial delay. The Lord Chancellor decided in both to make ex gratia awards of compensation in respect of costs incurred. On both occasions the Judge had resigned or retired.

On a third occasion the Lord Chancellor agreed with the Lord Chief Justice that a Judge should be released from sitting to enable him to complete a number of outstanding judgments. On a fourth occasion the Vice Chancellor issued a rebuke and warning following a delay which was severely criticised by the Court of Appeal. The Lord Chancellor wrote to the Judge, supporting the Vice Chancellor's action.

The Lord Chancellor and the senior judiciary are working to put systems in place to ensure that if there is any possibility of undue delay in the delivery of a judgment, that it is identified early and remedial action taken.

Michael Abatan

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will call for a report on the recent trial in Hove relating to the assault on Michael Abatan in Brighton in January 1999, in particular the evidence directed to be withheld from the jury. [122479]

Jane Kennedy: The conduct of trials rests entirely in the hands of the judiciary, and the directions they give are based on representations made by the prosecution and defence counsel. It would be inappropriate to call for a report as the judiciary are independent of the Government and administration.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensioner Savings

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the percentage of pensioner households with savings of (a) up to £1,000, (b) between £1,000 and £3,000, (c) between £3,000 and £6,000, (d) between £6,000 and £12,000 and (e) over £12,000. [122235]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the table.

Savings	Percentage of pensioner benefit units
Up to £1,000	38
Between £1,000 and £3,000	11
Between £3,000 and £6,000	10
Between £6,000 and £12,000	11
Over £12,000	29

Notes:
1. Components may not sum to 100 per cent. owing to rounding.
2. Pensioner benefit units are defined as those benefit units where either the head or spouse is aged 60 or over.
3. Questions on assets are a sensitive part of the FRS questionnaire and have relatively low levels of response, hence higher levels of imputation, compared to other parts of the survey. Responses are imputed in around one in 10 cases. Evidence also suggests some under-reporting of capital by respondents.

Retirement Pension

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) men and (b) women were in receipt of a state retirement pension and were over 100 years old on 1 May. [122076]

Mr. Rooker: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

The latest population projections for those over 100 years at mid-2000

	Number
Male	1,000
Female	7,000

Notes:
1. Figures are rounded to the nearest thousand.
2. National Population Projections supplied by the Government Actuary's Department for mid-year 2000.

Expatriates (Pensioners)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the estimated number of British citizens who have emigrated overseas and are in receipt of a State Retirement Pension which has been frozen because they are living in countries without a reciprocal pension upgrading agreement with the UK; and if he will make a statement. [121981]

Mr. Rooker: Some 470,000 people overseas are in receipt of a UK State Retirement Pension which has been frozen. The Department's records are unable to differentiate between a British citizen and a pensioner from another country who, through having worked and paid National Insurance in this country, is entitled to a UK State Retirement Pension. Therefore the Department can provide only the total figure.

The total annual cost of uprating all frozen UK pensions paid overseas to the rate paid to pensioners resident in the UK would be some £300 million a year.

Our priority is to concentrate any resources that may become available on pensioners resident in the UK. We have done much already for them but, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in the Budget, we plan to do more. That is why we have no plans to unfreeze.

Winter Fuel Payment

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if pensioners qualify for winter heating allowance if living abroad for all or part of the year; and if he will make a statement. [121808]

Angela Eagle: The Winter Fuel Payment scheme relates only to people aged 60 and over who are ordinarily resident in Great Britain. Eligible people living in Northern Ireland get similar payments through mirroring legislation.

If someone lives only part of the year abroad and their normal home is in Great Britain they are eligible for a payment; but someone whose normal place of residence is outside Great Britain is not eligible.

The payments are aimed at mitigating harmful climatological effects that are particular to the British winter. Great Britain has a variable winter climate, which means that there are short spells of very cold weather rather than long ones. Weather conditions can also change rapidly over a few days, and winter mortality rates are higher in Great Britain than in most other European countries. The payments are therefore aimed at older households in Great Britain to ensure they are able to turn up their heating when it is cold.

National Insurance Numbers

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many newly-issued national insurance numbers have gone missing and how many missing national insurance numbers have been traced to (a) asylum seekers and (b) other persons subject to immigration control in each of the last three years for which figures are available; what estimate he has made of the extent to which national insurance numbers are misappropriated (i) generally, (ii) by asylum seekers and (iii) by other persons subject to immigration control; what action he is taking to investigate this; and if he will make a statement. [121829]

Mr. Rooker: There are no missing National Insurance numbers; all numbers issued are recorded on the Departmental Central Index (DCI). There are some numbers, however, that will have been created, typically when someone invents a fictitious identity. We know of 716 such cases.

I announced on 27 March plans to ensure that our defences against identity fraud are strengthened. We have found from a pilot in Balham, South London, that a combination of dedicated resources, better training, specialist equipment and effective liaison between Government Departments, particularly with the Immigration and Nationality Department, leads to improved performance in this area. Staff in Balham, using these techniques, have detected 225 cases where fraudulent identity documents were used, all of which resulted in an arrest.

While data are collected on the number of false identities detected, they are not available in the required format to supply details specific to asylum seekers and those subject to immigration control. The Home Office and my Department work closely to monitor cases involving immigration offenders, 9,256 such cases have been referred. These are checked against DCI, any found to be claiming benefit are referred for investigation by both the Benefits Agency and the Home Office. Data are not available on the outcome of those investigations.

Benefit Claim Packs

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when (a) Attendance Allowance and (b) Disability Living Allowance claim packs will be available in the South Shields constituency. [122398]

Mr. Bayley: The Supply Operations Group Print Contract Management Team has liaised with Newcastle Disability Benefit Centre (DBC) and established their requirement. As a result, Tactica Solutions are issuing 500 copies of each claim pack to the DBC today.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will launch an inquiry into the failure of the Group 4 contractor to supply Disability Living Allowance and Attendance Allowance claim packs to disability benefits centres in the north-east of England. [122397]

Mr. Bayley: Based on the existing annual usage information, Tactica Solutions, one of the contractors who supply print items (ie: claim packs, forms and leaflets) to the Benefits Agency, printed adequate stocks of the Disability Living Allowance and Attendance Allowance claim packs to meet demand into May 2000.

However, an increase in demand in March and April exhausted stock more quickly than anticipated. This was made worse by the fact that stocks were being run down in anticipation of revised versions of these claim packs becoming available. As it takes an average of six weeks to produce a claim pack, the sudden upsurge in demand created a gap in supply.

New usage figures have now been negotiated with the supplier to take account of the most up to date demand information. This will lead to an increase in stock held that should more accurately reflect customer requirements.

The current shortage has now been rectified and Tactica Solutions have the products in stock.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Sexual and Reproductive Health Policy

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to discuss sexual and reproductive health policy with her European counterparts at the forthcoming European Council meeting. [122489]

Clare Short: I will be discussing a range of development issues with my European colleagues at the forthcoming Development Council meeting, including EC policy on HIV/AIDS.

Debt Decision Day

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to mark Debt Decision Day on 23 July; and if she will make a statement. [122099]

Clare Short: The Prime Minister and the Chancellor have informed the Japanese Presidency of the G7/8 that we would like to use the opportunity of the Okinawa Summit (21–23 July), and the meeting of the G7 Finance Ministers running up to the Summit, to review and encourage progress on the debt relief initiative.

The Government are committed to keeping up the momentum in the run up to, and beyond, Okinawa, and will make every effort to see that resources are released for the eradication of poverty in HIPC countries.

Penalty Clauses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the contracts entered into with private sector companies for the provision of goods or services since May 1997 where penalty clauses were triggered for non-performance; and if she will make a statement. [122012]

Clare Short: My Department's standard contracts do not contain penalty clauses. In cases of poor performance we can withhold payment. We do not keep a central record of where poor performance has resulted in payment being withheld and this information could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Defence Systems Ltd.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what checks her Department carried out on the suitability of Defence Systems Ltd. prior to awarding the company a contract to clear mines and unexploded munitions in Kosovo. [122129]

Clare Short: When NATO troops entered Kosovo in June 1999, we invited a number of mine/unexploded ordnance (UXO) clearance organisations to submit capability statements so that self-contained rapid response teams could be immediately provided to deal with the mine threat in Kosovo. Five organisations, including DSL, were selected for an initial period of two months, on the basis of experience in stated capabilities, quality of key personnel, experience in humanitarian mine action, ability to deploy quickly the requisite skills, equipment and back-up, value for money and knowledge of the region.

The United Nations Mine Action Co-ordination Centre (UNMACC) in Pristina later requested the services of these organisations, including DSL, for two further phases: another three months of emergency work; a phase for the year 2000 to address the mine/UXO threat in a more structured way. For the present phase, DSL and the other organisations were invited to submit detailed proposals which were assessed as above, in the light of their earlier performance in Kosovo and their ability to meet UNMACC's future needs. Before entering into a long-term contract with DSL, we consulted a range of Government departments, as is our normal practice in such cases.

DSL has been accredited by UNMACC for work in Kosovo and has been commended both as a field operator and as a co-ordinator of mine action activities in southern Kosovo.

Sierra Leone

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the supply of (a) food and (b) medical supplies to the Kambia region of Sierra Leone. [122026]

Clare Short: Kambia District, situated in the Northern Province, remained volatile after the signing of the peace agreement last July. Although access was, and is difficult, food security assessments were carried out in January and February 2000 by Caritas Makeni and Community Action through Progress (CAP) who are local implementing partners of Children's Aid Direct (CAD). CAD are supported by the Department for International Development.

The CAD programme began in Kambia in March. So far it has been limited to assessments and targeting and registration of beneficiaries. The distribution of inputs will commence as soon as the security situation allows.

Halabja

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance her Department is giving to people of Halabja in the current year. [122130]

Clare Short: We are supporting the work of Professor Christine Gosden of Liverpool University to develop a prioritised programme, in conjunction with the universities in northern Iraq and the recently established post-graduate school at Halabja. This will benefit the victims of chemical and biological weapon attacks on the Kurds, principally at Halabja in northern Iraq. The programme will include developing proposals for palliative care, curative treatment, and neutralising environmental contamination. We shall consider providing more substantive assistance on the basis of these proposals. Other donors such as Switzerland, Sweden, Finland, Norway, Italy and the Vatican have shown an interest in providing humanitarian and other support.

Analogue TV Switch-off

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment has been made of the viability of his Department's timetable for the switching off of analogue television transmitters. [121486]

Janet Anderson: We will be making regular assessments of the estimated timescale for the switch-over from analogue to digital transmission in the formal two-yearly reviews which I announced last autumn. The first of these reviews will be in autumn 2001. They will measure progress against the key tests of availability of digital services; affordability; and take-up of digital equipment. The Viewers' Panel, which we are setting up, will provide advice at each review on the extent of progress towards digital television from the viewers' point of view.

BBC News 24

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what criteria will be used to assess the performance of BBC News 24 in the Government's review; and if he will make a statement. [121487]

Janet Anderson: We aim to announce our proposals for the reviews of the BBC's digital services in due course.

Seaside Resort Regeneration

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what measures he will take to encourage take up of Lottery funds to regenerate seaside resorts. [122364]

Kate Hoey: As a result of the National Lottery Act 1998 and Policy Directions issued by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, distributors are already doing much to ensure Lottery money is distributed more equitably. Research into the impact of the National Lottery on the coalfields and other areas, soon to be published, should help to identify what more can be done to ensure that those in every area, including seaside resorts, have access to grants from the National Lottery.

Television Licence

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what the total cost was of administering the television licence system (a) in cash terms and (b) as a percentage of BBC licence fee revenue in each of the last 10 years. [122451]

Janet Anderson: The cost administering the television licensing system in the 10 years to 1998–99, the latest year for which figures are available, was as follows:

Cost of administering the television licensing system

Year	£ million	As a percentage of licence fee revenue
1989–90	81.0	6.6
1990–91	84.3	6.2
1991–92	91.5	6.2
1992–93	92.5	5.8
1993–94	89.2	5.3
1994–95	91.0	5.2
1995–96	95.0	5.2
1996–97	96.9	5.1
1997–98	109.5	5.5
1998–99	133.1	6.1

Concessionary Television Licences (Rotherham)

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many concessionary television licences have been withdrawn in Rotherham in (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999 in (i) council-run old peoples' homes and (ii) privately-run old peoples' homes. [122450]

Janet Anderson: Since 1991, the BBC has had statutory responsibility for the administration of the television licensing system, including the Accommodation for Residential Care concessionary licence scheme. The day-to-day management of the scheme is carried out by TV Licensing as agent for the BBC. I understand from the BBC that information on the concessionary scheme is not held in the form requested.

Communications White Paper

Ms Keeble: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on consultation on the Communications White Paper. [123002]

Mr. Chris Smith: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and I have already announced an invitation for any comments on the Communications White Paper to be submitted to us by 23 June. As a further contribution to the debate and discussion on the issues at the heart of the White Paper, we have also asked a number of external experts individually to prepare policy papers on a variety of related subjects, which will form the basis for discussion at a seminar in July and which will be published on the internet.

The experts are:

Quentin Thomas (Chair)

David Cleevely

Elizabeth Forgan

Andrew Graham

Janice Hughes

HEALTH

Motor Neurone Disease

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what support the Government provide to research into motor neurone disease; what involvement the Motor Neurone Disease Association has had in the channelling of Government resources into this research; what support the Government provide to the Motor Neurone Disease Association; what the level of Government funding will be for research into motor neurone disease in the next three years; and if he will make a statement. [120735]

Mr. Denham: The Government support research into motor neurone disease through the Medical Research Council (MRC) and the Department of Health.

The MRC is the main Government agency through which we support research on the causes and treatment of disease and receives most of its income via grant-in-aid from the office of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. In 1999–2000, the MRC spent approximately £1.6 million on motor neurone disease and on basic work on the function of motor neurones. They are also funding relevant underpinning research, for example on nerve function and damage. The MRC involve the Motor Neurone Disease Association (MNDA) whenever they consider an application for clinical trials in motor neurone disease.

The Department funds research to support policy development in health and social care, and to support effective practice in the National Health Service. The Department also provides NHS support funding for research sponsored by charities, such as MNDA, and by the MRC that takes place in the NHS. The current commitment of centrally commissioned research projects relating to motor neurone disease is approximately £241,000. Information about expenditure on NHS service support and devolved Departmental research in the NHS are not held centrally. The total level of Department of Health support for motor neurone disease may therefore be higher than the expenditure for centrally commissioned research.

Project details of Department funded research can be found on the National Research Register (NRR). This is available in the Library and most medical libraries on CD Rom, and on the Internet: http://www.doh.gov.uk/nrr.htm.

It is not possible to predict what the future level of Government expenditure will be on specific areas of research as new research proposals are regularly being considered and commissioned.

The Government do not provide financial support directly to the MNDA.

Beef (Cattle over 30 Months)

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if there is a ban on the import of meat and meat products from cattle of over 30 months into this country; [121434]

(2) if the ban on the sale of meat products from cattle over 30 months old includes gelatine and other edible by-products; [121433]

(3) what checks are carried out on imports of meat and meat products to the United Kingdom to ensure that they are not from cattle over 30 months old. [121435]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 9 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that there is no restriction on the import of meat and meat products from cattle over 30 months, but the ban on sale of beef for human consumption from cattle aged over 30 months at slaughter applies to both home produced and imported supplies. The only exceptions to this ban are for meat from specialist grass-reared United Kingdom herds under the Beef Assurance Scheme (BAS) and meat from 14 non-EU countries that traditionally supplied the UK and have no history of BSE. As far as home supplies and meat imported into licensed premises are concerned, the ban is enforced by the Meat Hygiene Service. The carcase or part of a carcase of any bovine animal that is found to be more than 30 months old at slaughter (or over 42 months for BAS animals) is sterilised or stained immediately as an animal by-product. Local authorities are responsible for enforcement at other points in the supply chain.

Imported gelatine and other edible by-products are not subject to the over 30 months rule. However, they are subject to controls on the use of specified risk materials in their production. The UK introduced these national SRM controls from 1 January 1998, pending the implementation of Community measures. Imports of gelatine and other edible by-products must be accompanied by a certificate confirming that they are SRM-free or that they are from animals born, reared and slaughtered in Australia or New Zealand.

Specified Risk Material

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the recommendations of the Scientific Steering Committee about extending the Specified Risk Material regulations in force in Britain to all EU member states. [121439]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 9 May 2000]: The Scientific Steering Committee advises the European Commission on matters relating to the risks from BSE. It is for the Commission to decide, in the light of that advice, whether any proposals for measures to manage those risks at European Union level need to be made.

Harefield Hospital

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his plans are for the future of Harefield Hospital; and if he will make a statement. [121708]

Mr. Denham: Kensington and Chelsea and Westminster Health Authority has undertaken formal public consultation over proposals to move inpatient paediatric services from Harefield Hospital to the Royal Brompton Hospital. A decision to pursue these proposals has been contested by Hillingdon Community Health Council and it will, therefore, be referred to Ministers for a final decision. Any decision on the future location of Harefield Hospital's paediatric transplantation services would require the consideration of the National Specialist Commissioning Advisory Group.

These proposals must be set in the context of longer term plans. Following detailed planning and assessment by National Health Service organisations in West London and the Imperial College of Science, Technology and Medicine, a preferred option has been identified for the future of specialist inpatient services in West London, including cardiothoracic services. This would see services that are currently provided at Harefield Hospital located in a new building on the Paddington Basin site, alongside other West London specialist cardiothoracic services currently provided at the Royal Brompton and St Mary's Hospitals.

An Outline Business Case is due to be submitted to the London Regional Office of the NHS Executive assessing a number of options, including that for the Paddington Basin. Full public consultation will be held in the summer of 2000 before any decisions are made.

NHS Dentistry (Cheltenham)

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of the adult population in Cheltenham are registered with an NHS dentist. [122006]

Mr. Hutton: Information on dental registrations in individual constituencies is not collected by the Department. In the Gloucestershire Health Authority area 31 per cent. of the adult population was registered with a National Health Service dentist at 31 March 2000.

In Cheltenham patients who are not registered with a NHS dentist can receive treatment under the personal dental service scheme. On Monday to Friday emergency patients can access treatment via the health authority's dental helpline. Gloucestershire Health Authority has submitted proposals for a dental access centre in Cheltenham. A decision about this scheme will be made shortly.

Violence against NHS Staff (Shropshire)

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps each health trust in Shropshire is taking to reduce the incidence of violence against NHS staff; and if he will make a statement. [121761]

Mr. Denham: We are determined to ensure that National Health Service staff are never faced with intimidation and violence, which is unacceptable and will not be tolerated. In addition to the national 'NHS Zero Tolerance Zone' campaign, each of the three local trusts in Shropshire are taking independent action to protect staff from violent and aggressive behaviour.

The Royal Shrewsbury Hospitals NHS Trust have introduced the People Management Standards Document, which states that all staff in high risk areas will receive prevention of violence training by an approved organisation.

The Princess Royal Hospital NHS Trust have recently updated their Dealing with Violence and Aggression Policy. Measures include logging abusive incidents, and the use of a 'Safe Haven' room for patients showing extreme aggression.

Shropshire Community and Mental Health Services NHS Trust have carried out risk assessments in all work areas, to identify potential areas of weakness. Areas of activity resulting from this include additional staff training, and issuing mobile phones, pagers and personal alarms where appropriate.

Hospital Care Beds

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many acute hospital care beds there are in NHS hospitals in the Greater London area. [122077]

Mr. Denham: The average daily number of available acute hospital care beds in the London region in the financial year 1998–99 was 17,022.

Bed data are not collected by general geographical area. The area covered by London Regional Office has been used as the closest approximation of Greater London.

General Social Care Council

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he intends to establish the General Social Care Council; and if he will make a statement. [122766]

Mr. Hutton: We propose to establish the General Social Care Council on 1 October 2001.

Originally we had intended to establish the new Council on 1 April 2001. However, the GSCC Advisory Group, set up to consider the requirements for a well functioning Council, has recommended October 2001 as a more appropriate start date. This will allow sufficient time to complete the many tasks that have to be undertaken for the Council to begin its important work. The Care Standards Bill, which is currently before this House, proposes vital functions for the GSCC that will increase the level of safety offered to the public. We see it as being in the best interests of the public and the GSCC itself that sufficient time is allowed in order to deliver a Council that is ready and able to take forward these vital functions.

The GSCC Advisory Group will be continuing its role until the Council is established in shadow form.

Female Circumcision

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance his Department issues to chairs of local authority social services committees concerning the operation of the Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985. [122492]

Mr. Hutton: As well as being illegal, female circumcision is an extremely unpleasant practice with lasting mental and physical effects on those girls on whom it is carried out. We have issued no specific guidance on this matter to chairs of social services committees but our wider advice, set out in "Working Together to Safeguard Children" on child protection procedures is clear. The Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985 makes female circumcision, excision or infibulation (female genital mutilation (FGM)) an offence, except on specific physical and mental health grounds. A local authority may exercise its powers under section 47 of the Children's Act 1989 if it has reason to believe that a child is likely to be or has been the subject of FGM.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles operated by his Department were manufactured (i) in the UK, (ii) in the EU and (iii) elsewhere. [122258]

Ms Stuart: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Dystonia

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have been diagnosed as having dystonia in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [119914]

Mr. Denham: The table shows a count of finished consultant episodes (FCEs) in National Health Service hospitals in England where the primary (main) diagnosis was dystonia, for the years 1994–95 to 1998–99.

FCEs where the primary diagnosis was dystonia—NHS hospitals England 1994–95 to 1998–99

Data year	FCEs
1994–95	1,414
1995–96	1,953
1996–97	1,967
1997–98	2,477

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Minimum Wage

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many employers, broken down by size of firm, have been fined for paying less than the minimum wage. [122534]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The National Minimum Wage (NMW) Act provides for officers to issue a financial penalty against an employer who does not comply with an enforcement notice. So far, 141 enforcement notices have been issued. Only one of these has required follow up action with a penalty notice fining the employer for each day of non-compliance with the enforcement notice. The company concerned employs between 0–10 people.

It is also a criminal offence to refuse or wilfully neglect to pay the NMW. So far it has not been necessary to use these criminal powers, though we will do so in appropriate circumstances.

Cosmetic Surgery

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the operation of regulations pertaining to advertising of cosmetic surgery. [122307]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 16 May 2000]: I am satisfied that the powers given to the Director General of Fair Trading by the Control of Misleading Advertisements Regulations 1988, together with the self-regulatory system operated by the Advertising Standards authority, are effective in controlling advertising in the United Kingdom. However, the Government recognise that advertising controls alone may not be sufficient in the field of cosmetic surgery to ensure that the information patients receive is of an acceptable standard and my colleagues in the Department of Health are therefore considering how best to take this matter forward.

Chief Scientific Adviser

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 11 May 2000, Official Report, column 445W, what engineering skills and qualifications will be required of the Government Chief Scientific Adviser. [122496]

Ms Hewitt: The Government's Chief Scientific Adviser will need to have a first class international reputation in science or engineering. Candidates for the post are likely to be Fellows of the Royal Academy of Engineering or of the Royal Society. In addition to being excellent in their own disciplines candidates will need to have an understanding of a wide range of science and engineering issues.

Post Office

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has set the financial target for the Post Office for 2000–01; and if he will make a statement. [122924]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Government are setting the Post Office a return on capital employed target of 13 per cent. in 2000–01 and this translates into an operational pre-tax profit target of £392 million in 2000–01. This target excludes the network of post offices, where the PIU report is awaited, and the non-operational interest arising from past surpluses held on the Post Office's balance sheet. This target will be subsumed within the overall post-tax profit target for the Post Office as a whole, as described in the White Paper.

As already announced, the 'dividend' that the Government effectively take out of the Post Office is set at 40 per cent. of the post-tax profits of the business as a whole. This is subject to a dividend floor payment which this year will be raised from 80 per cent. to 90 per cent. of the dividend that would be paid if the Post Office meets its overall profit target.

In order to help the Post Office to plan for the medium term, the Government are also setting an indicative financial target for 2002–03 of 13 per cent. return on capital employed (ROCE) in the Post Office's operational business, excluding the network of post offices and any non-operational interest arising from past surpluses. Return on capital employed is defined as profit before interest payable and tax, but after operating interest receivable, divided by operating capital employed.

I have set the Post Office's financial target and dividend floor for 2000–01, and the indicative financial target for 2002–03 in the light of external benchmarking, the likely regulatory environment, market expectations, the Post Office's approved Strategic Plan for 1999–2004, and other projections from the Post Office.

Communications White Paper

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on consultation on the Communications White Paper. [123003]

Mr. Byers: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport and I have already announced an invitation for any comments on the Communications White Paper to be submitted to us by 23 June. As a further contribution to the debate and discussion on the issues at the heart of the White Paper, we have also asked a number of external experts individually to prepare policy papers on a variety of related subjects, which will form the basis for discussion at a seminar in July and which will be published on the internet.

The experts are:

Quentin Thomas (Chair)
David Cleevely
Elizabeth Forgan
Andrew Graham
Janice Hughes
Mark Oliver
Damian Tambini
George Yarrow.

Export Credit (Military Goods)

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many times countries which have been granted export credit for military goods have defaulted on their repayments in each of the last 10 years. [122246]

Mr. Caborn [holding answer 16 May 2000]: The following list details the countries on which ECGD has paid claims in each of the last 10 years as a result of payment defaults in relation to export credits for defence equipment.

Gas Transporters

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the companies, organisations and public bodies he has consulted over the removal of geographic exclusivity of licensed areas for gas transporters. [122324]

Mrs. Liddell: In October 1998, my Department published a consultation paper on the future of gas and electricity regulation. Among other things, this paper invited views on the abolition of geographic exclusivity. In October 1999, the Government's proposals for legislation in this area were published. That document set out the Government's decision to abolish geographic exclusivity. It also contained a list of those who had responded to the consultation paper, leaving aside only those who had requested confidentiality. Copies of that document were placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

British Energy and AES

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the reference to the Competition Commission of British Energy and AES. [122330]

Dr. Howells: This reference has been made by the Director General for Electricity Supply under the terms of the Electricity Act 1989 and the Competition Commission will report to him at the end of their inquiries.

Parental Leave

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the terms of reference of the Parental Leave Monitoring Group and the review of maternity pay and leave and parental leave. [122360]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Parental Leave Monitoring Group will assess the impact of parental leave and look at the take-up of the new right by men and women. We are currently considering the terms of reference of the group in the light of the review on maternity pay and parental leave. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made an announcement on 9 May setting out the scope of the review on maternity pay and parental leave.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the Parental Leave Monitoring Group will meet. [122359]

Mr. Alan Johnson: We are currently considering the terms of reference of the group in the light of the review on parental leave and maternity pay and a meeting will be convened in due course.

Domestic Fuels

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will investigate the sales methods used by suppliers of domestic gas and electricity for new residents who are taking over previous contracts. [122353]

Mrs. Liddell: The Office of Gas and Electricity Markets (Ofgem) is responsible for regulating the activities of gas and electricity suppliers. It imposes a licence condition in respect of sales and marketing practices, which has recently been extended to 31 March 2002. Ofgem closely monitors the sales and marketing activities of suppliers, and is working with the industry to ensure that abuses are avoided. Where necessary it will take formal action against individual suppliers under the licence condition.

Genes (Patents)

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many UK patents have been granted for (a) human genes, (b) animal genes and (c) plant genes. [121305]

Dr. Howells: Patents are only available for inventions for new technical solutions. Under the Patents Act 1977 and a recent EC Directive on the legal protection of biotechnological inventions, genes as they exist in nature cannot be the subject of patent rights. However, material—including genes—isolated from its natural environment by means of an inventive technical process may be subject to patent rights. To be patentable, such inventions would have to satisfy the general criteria for patentability that the invention is new and would not be obvious to someone in the technical field.

To date, approximately 50 patents relating principally to human genes or variants thereof; approximately 10 patents relating to animal genes or variants thereof; and, approximately nine patents relating to plant genes or variants thereof have been granted by the United Kingdom Patent Office.

Animal Welfare

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to promote the development of internationally-agreed animal welfare standards in the context of the WTO negotiations building on existing work in the Council of Europe. [120123]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 20 April 2000]: I have been asked to reply.

We strongly supported the requirement in Article 8 of Directive 98/58/EC for the European Commission to report on the scope for developing wider international acceptance of EU farm welfare standards. Their report—which is overdue—will be a key element in defining how to approach this issue. For our own part, we have argued for the Office International des Epizooties to extend its activities to animal welfare: and we will take all opportunities offered by international gatherings such as the Animals 2000 World Congress of the World Society for the Protection of Animals to make contracts and advance this question.

DVLA

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the differences between DVLA's procedures for processing applications for vehicles purchased from (a) car importers and (b) traditional dealers. [121316]

Mr. Hill: When presented with an application for the registration of a new vehicle the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency (DVLA) needs to be satisfied that (a) the vehicle is new (b) it meets type approval requirements and (c) VAT has been/or will be paid. Longstanding arrangements allow franchise dealers to register new vehicles without producing documentary evidence. This facility is not currently available to independent commercial importers.

The Agency is developing similar arrangements for importers. It is intended that a revised manual system of registration which will not require documentary evidence will be available to them by the end of the summer. An electronic system should become operational in 2001.

Sub-post Offices

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the documents and publications produced by his Department and Agencies that are available at sub-post offices. [121627]

Ms Beverley Hughes: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, West and Hessle (Mr. Johnson), on 15 May 2000, Official Report, column 23W.

Tunnels (Fire Resistance)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what initiatives are being pursued to introduce fire-resistant materials in new tunnels. [121722]

Mr. Hill: For roads, there are a number of initiatives directly or indirectly concerned with fire and safety issues in tunnels. They are being undertaken by European and other international expert bodies. If these initiatives indicate it is appropriate that more fire resistant materials should be introduced into tunnels, they will be included into the UK's current tunnel design standards.

Following the fire in the Channel Tunnel, research has been done into increasing the resistance of concrete tunnel linings under conditions of extreme and prolonged heat. This research has been adopted by the designers of the Channel Tunnel Rail Link (CTRL) and fire protected concrete will be used in the new rail tunnels under London and the Thames.

Penalty Clauses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the contracts entered into with private sector companies for the provision of goods or services since May 1997 where penalty clauses were triggered for non-performance; and if he will make a statement. [122011]

Ms Beverley Hughes: It is not the policy of the Department of the Environment Transport and the Regions to use penalty clauses in its contracts as they are not legally enforceable. Legally valid clauses which require the contractor to make payments when in default have been invoked in 17 contracts since May 1997.

Jet-skis and Water Bikes

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the Government's policy is on bringing in new legislation to give local authorities control over jet skis and wet bikes; and if he will make a statement. [121926]

Mr. Meacher: Local authorities have the power to regulate personal watercraft, such as jet-skis and water bikes, through local byelaws. For instance, strict speed limits may be imposed to exclude watercraft from specific areas. My Department's Review of Byelaw Powers for the Coast recommended, among other things, that local authorities should be given a new power to create bathing-only zones and more general powers to regulate activities on the coast which affect the wider environment, such as the use of personal watercraft. We shall introduce legislation where it is needed to implement the Review's recommendations. In the meantime, we have published a voluntary code of best and safe practice for leisure craft users, and we are exploring options for a voluntary boat registration and identification scheme, which would include jet-skis.

Mersey Basin Campaign

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the role of the Mersey Basin campaign in relation to youth and community involvement in the North West Region. [122071]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Secretary of State is aware of the achievements of the campaign in involving local communities in the care and maintenance of watercourses through the Mersey Basin Trust initiatives such as Stream Care, Waterside Revival and Green Action Grants. In addition through its Water Detectives resource packs for schools, the Campaign involves young people in the caring for their local rivers and streams.

A612

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions his Department has had with Nottinghamshire County Council about the impact of a Gedling relief road on the A612 Nottingham to Burton Joyce at the junction of Shearing Hill and Burton Road. [122151]

Mr. Hill: There have been no discussions on this subject so far. The junction lies within the area of the Greater Nottingham Local Transport Plan which is being prepared jointly by Nottinghamshire County and Nottingham City Councils and will be submitted to Government by the end of July. It will form the basis for Government funding allocations for local transport initiatives and major local road schemes for the five year period 2001–06.

Climate Change Levy

Mrs. Fiona Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received in relation to the proposed Climate Change Levy being applied to combined heat and power where electricity sales made to licensed suppliers are subsequently sold on to business consumers; and what representations he has received on the effect on future investment in combined heat and power by commercial investors. [122150]

Mr. Meacher: Thirty-five responses to the Government's proposals in the consultation document, "A Quality Assurance Programme for Combined Heat and Power", commented on the proposed arrangements for sale of electricity from combined heat and power installations to other users, in relation to the Climate Change Levy. One company has informed the Government that it has decided to defer its decision to proceed with two CHP proposals, citing a number of factors including the proposed provisions for the operation of the Climate Change Levy.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has to extend the number of industrial sectors able to enter into negotiated agreements with Government in respect of the Climate Change Levy; and what particular plans he has to extend negotiated agreements to those manufacturing sectors currently excluded. [122123]

Mr. Meacher: In his Budget statement on 21 March 2000, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer confirmed that negotiated agreements will be open to those installations operating processes covered by Parts A1 and A2 of the forthcoming Pollution Prevention and Control Regulations.

A final consultation paper on these Regulations was recently published, by the Department of Environment, Transport and the Regions, with the objective of laying the Regulations in Parliament before the summer recess. As part of these wider consultations on the Regulations, and as is set out in the consultation paper, the Government are considering which processes currently covered by Part B of the PPC Regulations should, given their environmental effects, be more appropriately regulated under Part A2. Any processes that do move to regulation under Part A2 will become eligible for entry into the agreements.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the compatibility of the principle of rebates contained in the Climate Change Levy negotiated agreements with the European Commission's draft guidelines on state aid for environmental protection; and if he will make a statement. [122124]

Mr. Meacher: The Climate Change Levy agreements seek to deliver significant improvements in energy efficiency in exchange for a reduction in the standard rate of levy. This reduction counts as operating aid and is the subject of a current State Aids notification. The Government have linked the availability of the aid to helping to achieve an important environmental policy objective that the Commission shares: ie, the need to reduce emissions of greenhouse gases. The Government believe they have prepared a robust, balanced case which will deliver significant environmental benefits while also helping to safeguard international competitiveness.

In parallel, the European Commission's draft revised guidelines on State Aids for environment protection are being discussed with member states. The UK is playing a full part in these discussions and I understand the current draft is being revised further in the light of member states' comments.

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what decisions he has come to following the Government's consultation on the proposed CHP Quality Assurance programme, in relation to the exemption of Good Quality CHP from the Climate Change Levy; and if he will make a statement. [123005]

Mr. Meacher: The Chancellor announced in the pre-Budget Report in November 1999 that Good Quality CHP was to be exempted from the Climate Change Levy. The Government's proposals for determining 'Good Quality' were set out in the consultation paper "CHPQA—A Quality Assurance Programme for Combined Heat and Power", issued in January.

Over 130 detailed responses to the proposals were received. There was general agreement that the proposed Quality Index (QI) approach provided a sound basis for measuring the thermal efficiency and environmental quality of the range of CHP installations of different sizes, type and fuel use, and for determining eligibility for exemption from the Climate Change Levy, and for other purposes. The consultation also identified a number of detailed improvements to the proposals.

There was also general agreement that a QI score of 100 was the appropriate level at and above which installations should be eligible for full exemption from Climate Change Levy—that is to say, exemption of all heat and of all generated electricity used on site or sold directly to other users. There will be an interim commissioning period of 12 months for industrial installations, and 24 months for community heating installations, during which the threshold will be a QI of 95.

There was also agreement that the proposed CHP Equivalent Generation Limit (CHP EGL) methodology provided a robust basis for determining the entitlement to partial Levy exemption for installations with a QI of less than 100. But respondents argued that the datum used in the calculation of CHP EGL for a scheme should be 100, rather than the figure of 110 in the consultation proposals, and the Government accept the case for this.

Special provisions for simplified metering and monitoring arrangements for small-scale CHP schemes will apply to installations of 2 MWe or less, representing almost 90 per cent. of installations, rather than 1 MWe as previously proposed.

The operation of CHPQA will be reviewed in the light of experience. Any changes made will apply to subsequent CHP developments, and will not be applied retrospectively to existing CHP schemes.

The provisions for exemptions from the electricity supply licensing requirements are relevant to the operation of direct sale of electricity from Good Quality CHP. The Department of Trade and Industry's document, "Electricity (Class Exemption from the Requirements for a Licence) Order 1997 Proposed Amendments" sought views on possible changes, to facilitate CHP and other embedded generation. DTI are now considering responses, and will announce their conclusions shortly.

I am grateful for the valuable contribution from CHP users and suppliers and other interested parties in developing these arrangements for the detailed operation of CHP's exemption from the Climate Change Levy—a measure which gives crucial recognition to the environmental, climate change and other benefits of CHP, alongside the exemption of Good Quality CHP from business rates and Government's other supporting initiatives.

My Department will shortly publish a detailed consultation response, setting out the decisions in full. Meantime, I have placed a note with further details of the key elements in the Library.

Aviation

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will he seek access to (a) cabotage rights and (b) ownership of US carriers by UK carriers in the forthcoming UK-US bilateral aviation negotiations. [122080]

Mr. Mullin: This Government will continue to press for the removal of all barriers to fair competition in the UK-US aviation market, including the refusal of cabotage rights and the restrictions on foreign ownership of US carriers. However, as cabotage and foreign ownership and control are banned by US law, it would require a change in US law to remove these barriers. The timetable for their removal must therefore extend beyond the horizon of the current round of negotiations.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received regarding the problems experienced with the theoretical knowledge examinations for the JAA Air Transport Pilot Licence; and what action he intends to take as a result of these representations. [122483]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 16 May 2000]: The Civil Aviation Authority (CAA) is responsible for the day-to-day aviation safety regulation, including the licensing of pilots. The CAA shares the concern of those in the aviation industry and other interested parties over the recent disappointing results of those candidates who participated in the Joint Aviation Requirements Flight Crew Licensing (JAR-FCL) examinations. It is also aware of the importance of achieving a smooth transition to the new JAR-FCL examinations, but this change has been less smooth than originally was hoped. The CAA is keen to maintain a high level of standards within the UK, but none the less is looking closely into the failure rate of these examinations. I shall write to the hon. Member shortly with details of the CAA's findings and actions.

Vulnerable People (Support)

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about Government plans for providing support for vulnerable people; and how he intends to take forward, "Supporting People". [122566]

Mr. Raynsford: Britain is fortunate in having an effective and valuable stock of supported and sheltered housing, providing much-needed help to people such as older people, the mentally ill, the disabled and those with drink and drug problems.

As with most services, things can always be improved. The Government value the supported housing sector and through "Supporting People" we want to improve how supported housing is funded to make sure the highest quality of services are given, in the areas it can be most effective.

The "Supporting People" programme offers vulnerable people the opportunity to improve their quality of life through greater independence. It promotes housing-related services which are cost-effective and reliable, and which complement existing care services. It is a working partnership of local government, service users and support agencies.

Users will benefit from the increased range and focus of support services that will be provided through the partnership of councils and support agencies under "Supporting People". The programme will raise the priority of support services and encourage councils to take a more strategic approach to provision, integrating it fully with social and health services, housing, neighbourhood renewal and community safety.

While stakeholders broadly welcomed "Supporting People" in initial consultation, there are many challenges to be faced, and many complex issues to be worked through.

Today I have published a short document, "Together towards 2003", with an Action Plan of clear goals that must be achieved in order to prepare for the full roll out of "Supporting People" in April 2003. These are:

May 2000

Consultation paper on Phased implementation

Consultation paper on Managing the changeover

July 2000

Consultation paper on Administrative arrangements and decision-making processes

Consultation paper on Charging for services

October 2000

Consultation paper on Quality and monitoring

November 2000

Announcement on Phasing

Initial guidance to local authorities on administration arrangements

April 2001

Consultation on the principles of the Distribution Formula

October 2001

The Complete Package of guidance on implementing "Supporting People". This will include guidance on administrative structures, financial arrangements, continuation arrangements, needs assessment methodology and supply assessment. It will ensure diversity and equality of service delivery and enable authorities to plan their resource allocation

April 2002

First allocations to authorities based on the Distribution Formula, including transfer arrangements from current spending to new formula

December 2002

Readiness review—this will provide data on the main problem areas which will inform the provision of additional guidance.

The process of implementation has started today with the publication of two short consultation papers on phased implementation and managing change. Implementing the programme is a demanding task, which can be effectively achieved only by drawing on the knowledge and experience of local authorities, registered social landlords and other providers of support services.

I want to reassure providers and users that there will be no sudden changes to the support services as a result of the shift to "Supporting People".

We will be providing advice and support to councils, agencies and users throughout the transition period through the publication of guidance, a series of conferences and a quarterly newsletter. We will be disseminating results from research, pilot projects and advisory groups. People will also be able to refer to a dedicated website and helpline for more advice.

I am placing the consultation papers and a summary booklet about "Supporting People" in the House Library. They are also available on the DETR website at www.supporting-people.detr.gov.uk.

GM Trial Sites

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what consultations he had with (a) organic growers and (b) the Soil Association in Herefordshire about the siting of the GM trials at Kempley, Gloucestershire and Preston Wynne, Herefordshire; and if he will make a statement. [122038]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 15 May 2000]: There has not been any specific consultation with organic growers or the Soil Association about the siting of farm scale evaluations of GM crops at Kempley or Preston Wynne.

However, my Department and the Ministry for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food have been in dialogue with UKROFS (United Kingdom Register of Organic Food Standards) and the Soil Association about the Farm Scale Evaluations. MAFF has also been encouraging discussions between organic farmers and the GM industry body, SCIMAC, and have established a forum aimed at finding ways that the two systems can operate successfully alongside one another.

National Air Traffic Services

Mr. Temple-Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he plans to publish further information on the design of the NATS public-private partnership. [122974]

Mr. Mullin: The Government have today published an information brochure on the NATS PPP. A copy has been placed in the Library of the House and will shortly be available on the DETR website.

CABINET OFFICE

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles operated by her Department were manufactured (i) in the UK, (ii) in the EU and (iii) elsewhere. [122267]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Government Car and Despatch Agency operates a fleet of vehicles, in the following table, for the Government as a whole. Seven of these vehicles are own by GCDA but operated by the Cabinet Office (Infrastructure Division).

	(a) Cars	(b) Commercial vehicles	Total
(i) UK	60	16	76
(ii) EU	130	41	171
(iii) Elsewhere	0	0	0
Total	190	57	247

In addition, one vehicle is leased by the Cabinet Office (Infrastructure Division) from Lex, which is made in the UK.

Statutory Instruments (Wales)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many statutory instruments have been referred by Government departments to the National Assembly for Wales; and if he will list the dates on which a response was received from the Assembly in each case. [122456]

Mr. Stringer: There is no general provision for statutory instruments to be referred by Government Departments to the National Assembly for Wales. The Government of Wales Act 1998 and the National Assembly for Wales (Transfer of Functions) Order 1999 both contain provisions which require that certain instruments are either subject to consultation with the National Assembly for Wales, or are subject to their consent being obtained.

Other contacts takes place on an information basis, as covered in the bilateral concordats between Government Departments and the National Assembly for Wales. No central record is kept of such informal contact in relation to statutory instruments; and the information could only be collected at disproportionate cost.

Regeneration Initiatives

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will list the number and value of (a) bids and (b) grants made in each of the last three financial years for which figures are available, for each (i) area-based and (ii) other regeneration-related initiative for which her Department is responsible. [119802]

Mr. Stringer: The Cabinet Office is responsible for the Better Government for Older People programme and the Drug Action Teams listed by DETR as under (ii) other regeneration-related initiatives.

For the Better Government for Older People (BGOP) programme it is not possible to distinguish between direct/indirect government grants, redirected existing LGA provision, local partner funding and other contributions without incurring disproportionate costs. The Cabinet Office provides a small grant each year to help support the central co-ordination of the BGOP pilots and this figure is included in the expenditure totals.

Better Government for Older People (BGOP)

Bids for pilot projects	64	—	64
Accepted	28	—	28
All expenditure (£)	322,154	597,285	919,439

Notes:
1. The BGOP was launched in 1998–99 and ends in 2000–01. All pilots were approved in 1998–99.
2. The Local Government Authorities concerned, together with their local partner organisations, meet all the costs of their pilot projects.

The Home Office's Drugs Advisory Service award grants to the Drugs Action Teams (DATs) for development. These grants are awarded on the basis of population, not bids.

Drug Action Teams

	1998–99	1999–2000	Total
Number of Drug Action Teams	98	106
Development Funding 'Grants' from Central Government	2,989,700	5,035,000	8,024,700

Notes:
1. Development Funding began in 1996–97. The expenditure is provided through the Drugs Advisory Service part of the Home Office. However details of expenditure for 1997–98 are not readily available.
2. In addition to grants the Drugs Action Teams (DATs) receive funding and resources from a variety of sources including local agencies.
3. There are 111 DATs to be funded in 2000–01.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will list for each (a) area-based and (b) other regeneration-related initiative for which her Department is responsible (i) the amount budgeted and (ii) the total expended in each financial year for the planned lifetime of each initiative. [119794]

Mr. Stringer: The Cabinet Office is responsible for two of the programmes listed by DETR under 'other regeneration-related initiatives'—The Better Government for Older People and The Drug Action Teams. It is not possible to provide information as specifically requested. The Cabinet Office does not have accounting responsibility for the majority of expenditure made on these two initiatives.

The Better Government for Older People programme was launched in 1998 and runs until end of 2000. The pilot projects are fully paid for by Local Government Authorities and their partners. The Cabinet Office contributes a small grant toward the central co-ordination of the pilots. Total cost of the programme for each financial year is as follows: 1998–99 (£322,154), 1999–2000 (£597,285), and expected expenditure in 2000–01 (£500,000).

The Drugs Action Teams (DATs) receive funding and resources from a variety of sources, including local agencies and it is not possible to provide total expenditure figures that would be on a consistent basis. DATs receive 'development funding' from central Government, based on population data and paid through the Drugs Prevention Advisory Service at the Home Office. Information available for expenditure on development is for 1998–99 (£2,989,700) and 1999–2000 (£5,035,000). Expenditure forecasts for 2000–01 will be no lower than in 1999–2000. Resources for 2000–01 and beyond are subject to the Cross Cutting Review on Drugs as part of the 2000 Spending Review.

War Pensions

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) men and (b) women are in receipt of a war pension. [121477]

Mr. Bayley: The administration of the war pensions is a matter for the Chief Executive of the War Pensions Agency, Mr. Gordon Hextall. I have asked him to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Gordon Hextall to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 17 May 2000:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many (a) men and (b) women are in receipt of a war pension.

The latest data available is from 30th November 1999. The total number of war pensions in payment at that date was 299,124. This is comprised as follows:

	Number
War Disablement Pensions
Women	9,201
Men	234,390
Widows/Widowers pensions
Widows	54,714
Widowers	7
Others	812
Total	299,124

The number of "others" include: 52 war orphans' pensions; 163 war parents' pensions, 23 adult dependants' pension; 1 unmarried dependant's pension; and 573 child allowances paid alone.

If I can be of any further assistance, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Housing Benefit (Scotland)

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the total estimated expenditure was on Housing Benefit in Scotland in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000, for (i) public sector tenants, (ii) housing association tenants and (iii) other private sector tenants. [122089]

Angela Eagle: The information is in the table.

Total Housing Benefit expenditure in Scotland for public sector tenants, housing association tenants and other private sector tenants

Local authority tenants	700	709

Note:
The figures for 1998–99 are an estimate and those for 1999–2000 are based on the latest forecast.

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list, for (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98 and (c) 1998–99, the gross expenditure on (i) rent allowances and (ii) rent rebates for each local authority in Scotland. [122088]

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what account he will take in his reform of Housing Benefits of the differences between the English and Scottish housing systems; what plans he has to ensure that (a) tenants on the lowest incomes and (b) vulnerable households do not suffer financial loss from any changes to the Housing Benefit system; and what measures he plans to ensure that changes to Housing Benefit take account of other benefit and social policy reforms. [122086]

Angela Eagle: In our recent Housing Green Paper "Quality and Choice: A Decent Home For All" we acknowledge the importance of making sure that Housing Benefit and housing policies work together, and that the Government are sensitive to the housing policy aims and objectives of the devolved administrations.

Housing Benefit provides valuable support so that those with low incomes can meet their rent. A basic principle of any reform is that those who are most in need should continue to be able to afford reasonable rents.

We are determined to modernise Housing Benefit to improve customer service, tackle fraud and error and improve incentives to work. The Housing Green Paper contains proposals and ideas to reform Housing Benefit, and seeks the views of interested parties by 31 July 2000. We will take these views into account as we continue to work to improve Housing Benefit.

State Pension

Dr. George Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 8 May 2000, Official Report, column 275W, on the state pension, if he will identify separately the costs of (a) a £5 increase at 75–79 years and (b) a £10 increase at 80 years, if each increase were to be implemented without the other. [122251]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the table.

	£5 increase at 75	£10 increase at 80
Gross cost	1,100	1,200
Net cost after income-related benefits offset	750	800
Net cost after income-related benefits offset and taxation	700	700

Notes:

1. Part (a) of this question has been interpreted as a £5 increase for all those aged 75 and above rather than 75–79, otherwise people would receive a £5 increase at 75 then lose it again at age 80.
2. All costs are in £ million, rounded to the nearest £50 million, and are for 2000–01. Figures may not sum due to rounding.

3. Other benefits, whose rates are linked to the basic State pension, are not included.
4. Gross costs estimated by the Government Actuary's Department.
5. Income-related benefits offsets estimated by Analytical Services Division, Department of Social Security.
6. Income tax receipts estimated by the Inland Revenue.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles operated by his Department were manufactured (i) in the UK, (ii) in the EU and (iii) elsewhere. [122254]

Mr. Bayley: The Department has a total of 2,753 cars and commercial vehicles currently on its fleet.

Breakdown of the place of origin

	Cars	Commercial vehicles	Total
UK	1,1717	61	1,778
EU	883	26	909
Elsewhere	60	6	66
Total	2,660	93	2,753

Note:
Some caution should be exercised with the figures in the table. The largest single make of car owned by the Department is Vauxhall and the totals for the UK above include 397 Astras and 60 Cavaliers. There is no guarantee that every one of these cars was built in UK—some may have been built elsewhere in the EU. This is true of a further 114 cars of other makes on the fleet also shown above as built in UK. Disproportionate cost would be involved in trying to establish individually where all these units were manufactured.

For information on cars provided by the Government Car and Despatch Agency I refer my hon. Friend to the Written Answer which will be provided by my right hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Decommissioning

6. Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of when the decommissioning section of the Belfast agreement will be implemented. [121150]

Mr. Mandelson: The Government regard the recent IRA statement as a very significant development, including for the first time a definite commitment to put weapons completely and verifiably beyond use.

We believe we can now build on this announcement so that the Good Friday Agreement can be implemented in all its aspects.

11. Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of when he expects the decommissioning provisions of the Belfast agreement will be implemented. [121155]

13. Mr. Mates: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made on the decommissioning of illegally held arms and explosives. [121157]

19. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made in the process of decommissioning illegally-held weapons and explosives. [121163]

22. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the state of the peace process with regard to decommissioning. [121166]

23. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made on the decommissioning of illegally held arms and explosives. [121168]

26. Mr. Forth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made on the decommissioning of illegally held arms and explosives. [121170]

Mr. Ingram: I refer the right hon. Member and the hon. Members to the answer given earlier by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

17. Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the current status is of the de Chastelain commission; and if its role will be extended beyond 22 May. [121161]

Mr. Ingram: The role of the IICD will continue to be as stated in the joint declaration by the two Governments on 5 May:

> The IICD will continue its task under the Agreement. The Governments will now ask the IICD to consider urgently, in consultation with representatives of the paramilitary organisations, whether there are any further proposals for decommissioning schemes which offer the Commission greater scope to proceed in a more effective and satisfactory way with the discharge of this basic mandate, and to report. The Governments will make further reports as necessary. Those reports will be published promptly by the two Governments.

21. Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what his policy is towards the inclusion of political representatives of paramilitary groups in the Northern Ireland Executive without the decommissioning of illegally held arms and explosives. [121165]

Mr. Mandelson: Our policy is to achieve both devolution and decommissioning on terms consistent with the Good Friday Agreement. With the British and Irish Governments' Joint Statement on 5 May and the IRA statement of 6 May, I believe there is now a basis for making progress in achieving both objectives.

EU Structural Funds

8. Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he last met European Commissioners to discuss EU structural funds allocated to Northern Ireland. [121152]

Mr. Ingram: On 25 November 1999 I met with Commissioner Neil Kinnock (Vice President Administrative Reform) over dinner at Hillsborough Castle but was unable to meet Commissioner Barnier (DG Regio) during his visit on 4 February 2000 due to political developments in relation to the suspension of devolution.

I hope to have the opportunity to meet Commissioner Barnier on 18 May in London.

Devolution

9. Sir Raymond Whitney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps have been taken to re-establish the Northern Ireland Executive and Assembly. [121153]

15. Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps have been taken to re-establish the Northern Ireland Executive and Assembly. [121159]

27. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the prospects for re-establishing the Executive in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement. [121171]

Mr. Mandelson: I refer the hon. Members and my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson).

Peace Process

10. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current state of the peace process. [121154]

Mr. Mandelson: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my statement to the House on 8 May.

14. Mr. John Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he last met the Irish Prime Minister to discuss progress towards peace. [121158]

16. Mr. Ivan Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he last met the Irish Prime Minister to discuss progress on the peace process. [121160]

Mr. Mandelson: I last met the Irish Prime Minister during an intense period of negotiations at Hillsborough on 4 and 5 May.

Exiles

12. Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take further steps to gather statistics on the numbers of those exiled from their homes in Northern Ireland by paramilitary organisations. [121156]

Mr. Ingram: Currently the RUC record figures relating to reported intimidation but paramilitary expulsions cannot be separately identified. Figures on exclusions are particularly hard to calculate, since those affected are often reluctant to notify the police. Exclusions can also vary from temporary decisions to leave a town or area within it and total "exclusion" from Northern Ireland. We would be prepared to explore ways with the police in which the quality of these statistics could be improved, but it is not easy to gather accurate statistics in this area.

Security

18. Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the security situation in Northern Ireland. [121162]

Mr. Ingram: The main paramilitary groups are maintaining their ceasefires and the recent IRA statement reflects a real reduction in the threat from that quarter. There remains a threat from dissident paramilitaries who are opposed to the Good Friday Agreement, and the security forces will continue to thwart attempts by these groups to undermine the peace process.

Victim Support

20. Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the impact of the Government's programmes for victim support. [121164]

Mr. Ingram: Victim Support, which is funded by £737,000 from Government, dealt with 33,000 referrals of victims of crime during 1999–2000. The Government have also committed more than £6.25 million over three years to support victims of the Troubles. An evaluation of the Small Grants Scheme operated by the Community Relations Council is currently under way, and we have agreed to review the Core Funding Programme for victims groups, which is being administered by the Northern Ireland Voluntary Trust, during the 2001–02 financial year.

Goidelic Languages

23. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals he has to promote tuition in Goidelic languages. [121167]

Mr. George Howarth: The Education (Northern Ireland) Order 1998 gave the Department of Education the power to fund a body which has as its objective the encouragement or promotion of Irish-medium education. Work is currently in hand to establish a new body, Comhairle Na Gaelscolaiochta, for this purpose. An Irish-medium curriculum materials unit has been established in St. Mary's University College, a College of the Queen's University of Belfast, under the auspices of the Education and Library Boards' Curriculum Advisory and Support Services, to provide a central source of Irish-medium expertise to support schools throughout Northern Ireland. The Northern Ireland Council for the Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment provides GCSE and GCE A level examinations through the medium of Irish in subjects as required.

Giant's Causeway

25. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the destruction by fire of the facilities at the Giant's Causeway. [121169]

Mr. Ingram: The fire at the Giant's Causeway Visitor Centre destroyed 80 per cent. of the building. Senior Government officials met Moyle District Council on 4 May to discuss the development of a permanent replacement and the provision of temporary buildings in the interim so that services to visitors can be maintained. The Council has been asked to liaise with Government on a way forward.

British-Irish Council

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how often he has attended meetings of the British-Irish Council. [121151]

Mr. Mandelson: I attended the first and only meeting to date of the British-Irish Council on 17 December 1999.

Further meetings will follow the restoration of the Northern Ireland Assembly and Executive.

Belfast Port

Mr. Borrow: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the future of Belfast Port. [121143]

Mr. Ingram: A proposal by Belfast Harbour Commissioners involving the transport of the Port of Belfast to the private sector, with a view to establishing a public/private partnership, with Government retaining a 'golden' share interest, is under consideration. A further option, involving the restructuring of the Port while retaining its trust port status, is also being examined at present.

Given the vital role of the Port in relation to the Northern Ireland economy, its future is a matter of considerable importance not only to the port authority and port users, but also to those in industry and commerce in Northern Ireland. I am hopeful that the Executive will be restored before the end of this month and I am sure that the future of the Port of Belfast will be high on its agenda.

Sheltered Accommodation (Burglaries)

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the number of burglaries at sheltered accommodation complexes in Northern Ireland from January 1997 to date; how many within the control of each housing association have been burgled; what has been the total number of occasions on which burglaries have occurred; how many residents have lost property; and what has been the estimated total value of property stolen. [121231]

Mr. Ingram: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about window and double-glazing installations in sheltered accommodation complexes which make them vulnerable to burglars; and if he will require housing associations to take immediate measures to improve security at their properties. [121232]

Mr. George Howarth: It is deplorable that burglars are targeting the elderly in this way. The problem with certain window and double-glazing installations is not, however, confined to sheltered accommodation complexes. It applies to other housing, residential and non-domestic premises where such glazing was used. Those double-glazed windows most at risk were probably installed in the late 1980s/early 1990s, and it would appear that some window types may be more vulnerable than others. Where problems are identified, additional measures can be incorporated in the existing frame to enhance security. Housing associations have already undertaken a number of modifications. In 1991, the Department introduced a new requirement for housing association developments that "the design of doors and windows minimise the risk of forced entry". The Department will write to all associations drawing attention to the current situation. It will consult with the Northern Ireland Federation of Housing Associations on whether any additional guidance is needed, and if the programme of identification and modification can be accelerated.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will ensure that elderly residents within sheltered accommodation do not suffer financial loss as a result of burglaries arising from structural or glazing installation inadequacies at these complexes. [121233]

Mr. George Howarth: No. Housing Associations are required to insure property against structural damage and it is the responsibility of individuals to insure the contents of their properties against theft or damage.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions the RUC has had about appointing a co-ordinated task force to deal with burglary from sheltered accommodation; how many individuals have been charged with burglary from sheltered accommodation since January 1997; what convictions have been achieved; and what penalties have been imposed in each case. [121234]

Mr. Ingram: The Royal Ulster Constabulary is not aware of a problem specific to burglaries from sheltered dwellings. If the hon. Member would care to provide me with more details I would be happy to look into the matter.

The information requested on detection and convictions is not readily available and could be provided only at a disproportionate cost.

PRIME MINISTER

Interception of Communications Act

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Prime Minister what arrangements have been made to appoint a Commissioner under section 8 of the Interception of Communications Act following the expiration of Lord Nolan of Brasted's appointment on 10 April; and if he will make a statement. [122801]

The Prime Minister: Lord Justice Swinton Thomas has accepted an appointment as the Interception of Communications Commissioner for a period of three years from 10 April 2000. I thank his predecessor, Lord Nolan of Brasted for the great contribution he made during the six years he spent as Interception Communications Commissioner.

Sanctions

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will discuss with Kofi Annan the allowing of sanctions against (a) Serbia and (b) Iraq to be lifted on goods relating to bona fide scientific and technological work, essential to food testing and civil manufacturing industry. [121302]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to him by the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) on 8 May 2000, Official Report, column 258W.

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 17 May. [122108]

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with Ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I will have further such meetings later today.

eEurope

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which targets announced following the European Council meeting in Lisbon on eEurope in March and agreed to by the United Kingdom have been fully implemented; and what is the timetable for implementing the remaining targets. [122444]

Mrs. Liddell: I have been asked to reply

The Special European Council in Lisbon in March reached a number of conclusions under the heading of "An information society for all". The chief conclusions with targets were:

- The adoption as rapidly as possible during 2000 of pending legislation on the legal framework for e-commerce, on copyright and related rights, e-money, distance selling of financial services, jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments, and the dual-use export control regime; and also the promotion of consumer confidence in e-commerce, in particular through alternative dispute resolution systems;
- The conclusion as early as possible in 2001 of work on legislative proposals following the Commission's 1999 review of the EU's telecoms regulatory framework; meeting the frequency requirements for future mobile communications systems in a timely and efficient manner; and completing fully integrated and liberalised telecommunications markets by the end of 2001;
- Work towards introducing greater competition in local access networks before the end of 2000 and unbundling the local loop;
- Ensuring that all schools in the EU have access to the Internet and multimedia resources by the end of 2001, and that all teachers needed are skilled in the use of the Internet and multimedia resources by the end of 2002;
- Ensuring generalised electronic access to main basic public services by 2003;
- With the support of the EIB, making available in all European countries low cost, high-speed interconnected networks for Internet access and fostering the development of state-of-the-art information technology and other telecom networks as well as the content for those networks, with specific targets in the eEurope action plan.

The Special European Council asked the Commission to produce a comprehensive action plan with targets as part of its eEurope initiative, which identifies ways to reinforce a digital culture among European businesses, schools, individuals and public administrations. The Commission is expected to publish shortly a draft action plan with targets, for agreement by Heads of State and Government at the Feira European Council in June. We expect the action plan to include these and other areas related to developing the information society.

As the earliest of the targets identified above is the end of this year, most of the related activity is still in progress. However, the Council and the European Parliament have given an important lead by fast tracking the adoption of the E-Commerce Directive, which sets the legal framework for e-commerce in Europe by removing barriers to cross-border electronic business and providing legal certainty on issues such as the liability of intermediary service providers, e-contracts and information to be provided to consumers. Adoption is expected in the next few weeks, with implementation in all member states to follow within 18 months.

Treaty of Nice

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the dates in 2000 for (a) negotiating sessions and (b) other meetings on the draft Treaty of Nice. [120808]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 5 May 2000]: A timetable for the intergovernmental conference negotiations until the end of the current Portuguese Presidency is available in the Library of the House of Commons. The French Government have yet to publish a timetable for their Presidency, which runs from 1 July until the end of the year.

British Embassy Vehicles

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 2 May 2000, Official Report, column 68W, on British Embassy vehicles, what the (a) cost, (b) make and (c) model was of the motor vehicles leased for use by British diplomatic representatives in Germany since 1 May 1997. [121508]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 11 May 2000]: Posts in Germany currently spend a total annual cost of DM 438,005.52 (£136,876.73 @ 3.20) on leased vehicles. The annual costs since 1 May 1997 would not be too different. The make and model of the vehicles currently being used are:

Stability Pact for South Eastern Europe

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what factors underlay the decision taken at the Lisbon Summit to involve commissioners Solana and Patten in implementation of the Stability Pact for South Eastern Europe. [121976]

Mr. Vaz: The Lisbon European Council invited High Representative Solana and Commissioner Patten "to enhance co-ordination with the Stability Pact and other efforts of the international community". This is intended to maximise the international community's overall contribution to the Balkans by making co-ordination among the different players as effective as possible.

The Danube

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what proposal was made by the Regional Funding Conference on 30 March to reopen the Danube for international and local traffic; [121830]

(2) what grant the European Commission has given to finance removal of obstacles in the Danube. [121831]

Mr. Vaz: On 25 January the Danube Commission submitted a proposal for clearance of the Danube to the European Commission. The European Union has provisionally agreed to finance 85 per cent. of the total 24.1 million euro cost of the clearance work, conditional on the Danube Commission providing clarification on outstanding technical questions.

The Danube Commission proposal was also cleared by the European Investment Bank and included in a list setting out EIB projects at the Stability Pact Regional Funding Conference on 30 March. The EIB has not, however, agreed additional funding for the proposal.

British Council

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the reduction has been in the number of London-appointed British Council staff serving overseas since 1997; and if he will make a statement on the impact of these reductions on the work of the British Council. [121823]

Mr. Hain: The number of London-appointed British Council staff serving overseas has been reduced by 6 per cent. since 1997–98. This reduction has been partly offset by the appointment of skilled local managers in the Council's local offices.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to increase the programme funds available to British Council offices in developing countries. [121822]

Mr. Hain: The British Council performs a valuable role and should be properly funded. It is already able to bid against a range of FCO programme funds; for example, it manages some 50 per cent. of Human Rights Projects Fund activities. Its freedom to bid for access to these funds will continue.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his policy is on changing in the funding of the British Council when it is required to operate in additional countries. [121828]

Mr. Hain: The British Council is funded through grant-in-aid, voted by Parliament, for its activities world-wide rather than through specific grants for individual countries. We expect the Council to reshape its representation around the world as required, including opening new offices, within the resources it has from the FCO and other Government Departments, the private sector and paid for services. Technology now allows the Council also to reach target audiences in a different way.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the (a) percentage reduction in the value of the British Council's DFID-funded contract work since 1996–97 and (b) impact of this reduction on the British Council's work in developing countries. [121821]

Mr. Hain: The value of the British Council's DFID-funded contract work has been reduced by 55 per cent. since 1996–97. The resulting drop in income has led to extensive restructuring in overseas directorates in developing countries and a reduction of staff in the UK and abroad. Council operations in South Asia and sub-Saharan Africa have been most affected.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will restore the British Council's grant in aid to its real terms level before 1995–96. [121827]

Mr. Hain: The FCO and the British Council experienced cuts in funding in the period from 1995–96 until this Government had the opportunity, in the last comprehensive spending round, to arrest the decline. It is unrealistic to expect that the FCO and the British Council will receive increases that will recoup these cuts quickly. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary is pressing for a much-needed increase in FCO resources across the board. I expect the Council to achieve an increase in its grant in aid broadly in line with the settlement for the FCO as a whole as it performs a valuable role and I always try to visit its offices abroad while on ministerial visits to demonstrate my support.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the percentage reduction in the number of UK-based staff at the British Council since 1996–97; and if he will make a statement on the impact of the reduction on the Council's work. [121820]

Mr. Hain: The number of UK-based staff at the British Council has been reduced by 23 per cent. since 1996–97. These cuts have resulted in a reduction in the range of services offered to international students in the UK and in the size of the Council's network of regional offices in the UK. Reductions in the number of subject advisers and geographical managers in the Council's London and Manchester offices, and in personnel and finance officers, have affected the support provided to overseas operations.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the percentage reduction in corporate overheads at the British Council since 1995–96. [121826]

Mr. Hain: Corporate overheads at the British Council have been reduced by 23 per cent. since 1995–96.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the British Council country directorates which have no full-time London-appointed staff. [121824]

Mr. Hain: The following 16 British Council country directorates have no full-time London-appointed staff: Albania, Algeria, Belarus, Bolivia, Brunei, Caribbean, Denmark, Eritrea, Estonia, Finland, Lithuania, Macedonia, Malta, Norway, Swaziland and Switzerland.

Georgia Presidential Visit

Mr. Bruce George: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the President of Georgia will visit the UK. [121802]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 15 May 2000]: We are looking forward to an early visit by President Shevardnadze. When the Secretary of State visited Georgia in February he invited President Shevardnadze to visit the UK. We have now offered dates to the Georgian Government and are awaiting their response.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles operated by his Department were manufactured (i) in the UK, (ii) in the EU and (iii) elsewhere. [122259]

Mr. Battle: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office's policy is to purchase vehicles on the basis of value for money. We are also required to comply with the UK's international obligations under the EC Public Procurement Directives. The statistics cover vehicles in the UK and at posts overseas. The majority of our fleet is manufactured in the UK.

DEFENCE

Joint Nuclear, Biological and Chemical Regiment

Mr. Anthony D. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the long term location of the Joint Nuclear, Biological and Chemical Regiment currently based at RAF Honington. [123004]

Mr. Spellar: The Joint Nuclear, Biological and Chemical Regiment, which was established as a joint initiative in April 1999, following recommendations arising from the Strategic Defence Review, will be permanently based at RAF Honington.

The Regiment was established at RAF Honington as a successful joint initiative in April last year, following the recommendations of the Strategic Defence Review, and was fully operational by December. The Regiment's operational capability will comprise nuclear, biological and chemical detection, reconnaissance and survey and will combine these aspects with expertise in decontamination techniques. This is a critical enabling capability—and the Regiment will be invaluable in reducing the risk to our armed forces who deploy in dangerous areas like the Gulf.

Sierra Leone

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many flights by Antonov 124/100 aircraft have been chartered by his Department to West African destinations associated with the crisis in Sierra Leone; on what dates; what loads were carried in each case; and how many refuelling stops were required en route. [122533]

Mr. Hoon: As of 1200 hours 16 May, five Antonov 124/100 sorties have been chartered by the MOD to West African destinations associated with the crisis in Sierra Leone: three flights on 8 May 2000; one flight on 9 May 2000; and one flight on 13 May 2000. Each flight carried between 61 tonnes and 82.5 tonnes of store and equipment. Refuelling stops were not required.

Naval Funding

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the Royal Navy's budgeted fund allocation for 2000–01; and what was the corresponding budget for the previous five years. [122113]

Mr. Spellar: The operating costs of the Ministry of Defence are managed by 11 Top Level Budget (TLB) holders. Major equipment and research programmes are managed separately. Prior to 2000–01 there were three discrete TLBs covering the main activities of the Royal Navy, however, from 2000–01 a new tri-service TLB has been created to manage the Departments logistics activities—the Chief of Defence Logistics (CDL) TLB. This budget includes the costs of the Navy as well as the Army and RAF and it is not possible separately to identify the single service elements; the budget is managed as a whole. Equipment procurement costs are also managed centrally the Defence Procurement Agency (DPA) and are therefore also excluded.

For 2000–01 the budgets set for the two remaining Navy TLBs is £1,693 million. The total budget for the CDL TLB is £4,854 million.

The Navy Budget for the previous five years was as follows:

Year	£ million (actuals)
1995–96	3,879
1996–97	3,761
1997–98	3,714
1998–99	3,765
1999–2000	3,698

Lord Levy

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 27 March 2000, Official Report, column 25W, if Lord Levy has requested any further defence briefings since 25 March 1999. [118284]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 11 April 2000]: No.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 27 March 2000, Official Report, column 25W, for what reason Lord Levy was given a briefing on Syria by the Chief of Defence Intelligence; and if Lord Levy received security clearance prior to receiving that briefing. [118283]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 11 April 2000]: On 25 March 1999, the Chief of Defence Staff asked the Chief of Defence Intelligence (CDI) to see Lord Levy, as he judged that this would be of benefit to him prior to his visit to the Middle East carrying messages for the Prime Minister. Lord Levy did not receive security clearance for this specific meeting as he already holds the appropriate clearance.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence from which officials Lord Levy has received briefings on the Middle East. [119671]

Mr. Hoon: I refer to my answer of 27 March 2000, Official Report, column 25W. Lord Levy has not been briefed on the Middle East by any other Ministry of Defence officials.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 27 March 2000, Official Report, column 25W, (1) what assistance was offered by Lord Levy to the Chief of Defence Staff during his visit to Israel last September; [118280]

(2) which meetings Lord Levy attended during the Chief of Defence Staff's visit to Israel; and what was the subject of those meetings; [118279]

(3) to which Israeli officials Lord Levy made representations regarding the Chief of Defence Staff's visit to Israel; [118305]

(4) what preparatory work was done in Israel by Lord Levy for the Chief of Defence Staff's visit last September; [118304]

(5) if the Chief of Defence Staff discussed arms sales during his visit to Israel. [118285]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 11 April 2000]: The British embassy in Tel Aviv prepared and arranged the Chief of Defence Staff's visit to Israel. Lord Levy and HM Ambassador accompanied the Chief of Defence Staff to a call on Prime Minister Barak. A range of matters of mutual interest were discussed. Arms sales were not discussed.

Bahrain

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the Chief of Defence Staff visited Bahrain; whom he met; what topics were discussed; and who was in his accompanying delegation. [118286]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 11 April 2000]: General Sir Charles Guthrie last visited Bahrain between 25 and 27 February 2000. He met the Amir of Bahrain, the Crown Prince, the Prime Minister, the Defence Minister, the Chief of Staff of the Bahrain Defence Force, Vice Admiral Moore of the US Navy and UK personnel deployed in Bahrain. They discussed aspects of the UK's bilateral relationship with Bahrain and a variety of regional issues. General Guthrie was accompanied on the visit by his Deputy Principal Staff Officer and Aide De-Camp. Our Ambassador to Bahrain was present during the calls on Bahraini officials and the Defence Attaché escorted throughout.

Nuclear-powered Submarines

Mrs. Gilroy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list the maximum design accidents assessed by the Nuclear Powered Warships Committee following a near instantaneous loss of primary circuit coolant which are in place for the Swiftsure and Trafalgar nuclear powered submarines in operation near and in the Devonport Royal Dockyard; what is the anticipated frequency of MDA per reactor year; what is the core inventory in terms of the fission products Kr, Xe, I, Te, Cs, Sr, and Ru for the nominated MDA for a reactor that (a) is at Plant State A and (b) has recently been derated to Plant State B on the basis of the Standard Core History for the average reactor in-core life for the currently operational Core Z fuel charge; if he will place in the Library copies of his Department's BR1, BR 3018, BR 3019, BR3020, BR 3025 and BR 3030 documents and where appropriate the documents that have superseded them; and if he will make a statement; [121412]

(2) if, in relation to the refitting and refuelling of Royal Navy nuclear-powered submarines at Devonport Royal Dockyard, he will provide the Reference, MDA or Design Basics Accidents (a) applicable to periods (i) when the boat is under repair in the dry dock facility, other than when refuelling, (ii) when the boat is being defuelled in preparation for refuelling for the nuclear reactor, including the transition of the irradiated fuel to the dockyard storage locality and (iii) when the boat is out of commission and awaiting decommissioning without and with irradiated fuel in the reactor core and (b) relating to the treatment, packaging and storage of past and present arisings of radioactive waste undertaken and held at the Dockyard; and if he will make a statement. [121348]

Mr. Spellar: Response plans for a nuclear accident during submarine operations, including refitting, refuelling, fuel and waste handling, within HM Naval Base and the Royal Dockyard, Devonport are firmly based on detailed analysis and comply with appropriate legislation (in particular the Ionising Radiations Regulations). Probabilistic techniques are employed where appropriate in this analysis.

The radioactive inventories and source terms used in this analysis are classified, because they are related to sensitive information about the design of naval propulsion reactors. I am, therefore, withholding this information under Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. However, work is underway within my Department to respond to the forthcoming Radiation (Emergency Preparedness and Public Information) Regulation (REPPIR) which are expected to require that some aspects of the hazard assessments are made available to the public. Some information of this nature is already available in the document DEVPUBSAFE.

I am placing a copy of Joint Service Publication JSP392 (Instructions for Radiological Protection , which replaced Book of Reference BR3020) together with BR3030 Vol. 1, in the Library of the House. The other documents listed are classified and I am, therefore, withholding them under Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Project Allenby Scoping Study

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library a copy of the Project Allenby Scoping Study Executive Summary. [121942]

Mr. Spellar: Yes. I have arranged for a copy of the Project ALLENBY Scoping Study Executive Summary to be placed in the Library of the House.

Anti-personnel Mines

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many joint operations which took place outside the UK in the last three years involved the use of anti-personnel mines. [122092]

Mr. Spellar: UK armed forces were involved in 15 joint operations involving the use of anti-personnel landmines over the last three years, primarily involving operations in the Balkans. However, in no instances were UK armed forces responsible for their use.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Ranger anti-personnel mines are being used for training purposes. [122091]

Mr. Spellar: The UK has retained 2,088 Ranger Anti-Personnel Mines for training purposes in accordance with Article 3 of the Ottawa Convention. The retention of these mines is included in the UK's annual return to the UN Secretary General, in the UK Article 7 report for the period 1 August 1999 to April 2000.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which countries retain stocks of Ranger anti-personnel mines. [122090]

Mr. Spellar: It is not for the Government to provide information on other countries' mine holdings. Details of APL stocks held by parties to the Ottawa convention can be found, however, on the UN website www.un.org.

Regional Brigades

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what were the terms of reference for the Scott review of regional brigades; when it will be complete; and if he will place a copy in the Library. [121941]

Mr. Spellar: The Regional Brigade Study is due to report in June 2000 following which proposals will be put in the CinC LAND and Ministers. I have arranged for a copy of the Terms of Reference to be placed in the Library of the House.

Type 22 Frigate

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the annual running cost of a Type 22 frigate. [121705]

Mr. Spellar: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) on 12 May 2000, Official Report, columns 511–12W.

Naval Vessels

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects the two new LPD class ships to enter service with the Royal Navy. [121703]

Dr. Moonie: HMS Albion and HMS Bulwark, the two Landing Platform Dock (Replacements), are planned to enter service with the Royal Navy in 2003.

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when HMS Fearless and HMS Intrepid were commissioned. [121701]

Mr. Spellar: HMS Fearless was commissioned on 25 November 1965. HMS Intrepid was commissioned on 11 March 1967.

Eurofighter

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the cost of one (a) Mauser 27mm shell, (b) Advanced Short Range Air to Air Missile and (c) Advanced Medium Range Air to Air Missile. [121681]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 11 May 2000]: The unit cost of a 27mm Mauser High Explosive round is estimated to be in the region of £63. Based on prices in the most recent MOD contracts, the unit price of an Advanced Medium Range Air to Air Missile (AMRAAM) is in the order of £380,000 and that of an Advanced Short Range Air to Air Missile (ASRAAM) in the order of £200,000. All figures include VAT and are at September 1999 prices. Unit prices will vary depending on batch sizes, including orders from other customers.

Departmental Building Costs

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the projected costs of reconstructing his Department's building in Whitehall; and if he will make a statement. [122310]

Dr. Moonie: A contract to carry out the long overdue modernisation of the MOD's London headquarters was signed with Modus Services plc earlier this month. Main Building falls well short of modern standards. The redevelopment will result in the modern flexible working environment needed to provide effective direction and support to the armed forces. The costs to the Ministry of Defence will be some £55 million per annum at March 2000 prices over the 30 years of the Public Private Partnership contract. This encompasses the short-term decant arrangements as well as the long-term provision of a wide variety of services to both the redeveloped Main Building and the Old War Office Building. These two buildings will then be the only buildings containing headquarters staff in the central London area, allowing five other buildings to be disposed of.

Fishery Protection and Patrol Vessels

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the (a) Castle class and (b) Island class fishery protection and patrol vessels by (i) completion date and (ii) lay off date; and what plans he has for their replacement. [122464]

Mr. Spellar: (i) The Castle and Island Class patrol vessels were commissioned as follows:

	Commissioned Castle Class
Leeds Castle	1981
Dumbarton Castle	1982
Island Class
Shetland	1977
Guernsey	1977
Lindisfarne	1978
Anglesey	1979
Alderney	1979

(ii) On current plans these vessels are intended to have ship life of about 30 years and, as part of the normal planning process, the ordering of replacements will be considered as they reach the end of their lives.

Sea Patrol

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many days from 1 January 1999 to date the patrol ship Atlantic (North) has been on patrol at sea. [122463]

Mr. Spellar: A ship is allocated to the Atlantic Patrol Task (North) for 365 days of the year. From 1 January 1999 to 30 April 2000, a ship was actually on patrol in the area on this task for 224 days. This does not include days in transit by ships to or from the area.

HMS Endurance

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when HMS 'Endurance' (a) left the United Kingdom and (b) will return to the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement about the length of this deployment. [122466]

Mr. Spellar: HMS Endurance left the United Kingdom on 5 January 2000 and returned on 2 May. The length of this deployment was shorter than normal due to an extended refit period.

Ballistic Missile Defence Research

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much the UK Government has spent per year since 1991 on ballistic missile defence research; and how much of each year's expenditure was on pre-feasibility programmes. [121793]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 15 May 2000]: The cost of the Pre-feasibility Programme, undertaken in 1994–96, was approximately £4.5 million. The Technology Readiness and Risk Assessment Programme (TRRAP), which emerged from the Strategic Defence Review (SDR) and which is scheduled to run for three years from July 1998, has approved funding of £12 million within MOD's Corporate Research Programme. In addition approximately £500K per annum has been expended since 1991 on technical studies and experiments in collaboration with the US.

Fleet Air Arms

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many flying hours were flown by the Fleet Air Arms in (a) 1995–96, (b) 1996–97, (c) 1997–98, (d) 1998–99 and (e) 1999–2000; and what is the (i) budget and (ii) planning assumption for 2000–01. [122114]

Mr. Spellar: The answer is as follows:

Fleet Air Arm flying hours	Total hours flown
1995–96	57,593
1996–97	54,065
1997–98	56,679
1998–99	53,532
1999–2000	55,346

On current planning, in Financial Year 2000–01, some 63,000 flying hours are expected to be flown by Fleet Air Arm aircraft which now come under Commodore Naval Aviation, Joint Helicopter Command and Joint Harrier Force. The total estimated fuel budget for these aircraft for this year is in the order of £8.8 million. This will of course be subject to adjustment in the light of operational and other considerations.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Select Committees

Mr. Pearson: To ask the President of the Council when the Government plan to publish their response to the Liaison Committee's First report, Shifting the Balance: Select Committees and the Executive, HC 300. [122923]

Mrs. Beckett: I intend to publish the Government's response tomorrow.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Policing (Somerset)

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to allocate additional cash for policing in Somerset; and if he will make a statement. [121214]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 9 May 2000]: Somerset and Avon Police Authority set a budget this year of £181.2 million, an increase of 4.5 per cent compared with last year. In addition, the force will benefit from a number of initiatives to help tackle crime. Distribution of resources between the counties of Avon and Somerset will reflect the Chief Constable's judgment of priorities at different times and is not subject to Government determination.

Under the Crime Reduction Programme, over £2 million has been allocated so far to Avon and Somerset for the Reducing Burglary, Targeted Policing and Closed Circuit Television (CCTV) initiatives.

Five Reducing Burglary bids have been approved with programme funding amounting to £0.3 million. Under the latest round of the Targeted Policing Initiative, two proposals with a combined value of just over £1 million have been approved for further development: one combating robbery in central Bristol, the other increasing the use of court confiscation orders against property criminals and drug dealers in Avon and Somerset. Another £1 million has been allocated to fund nine projects in Avon and Somerset under the CCTV initiative.

Additionally, through the Crime Fighting Fund, Avon and Somerset will receive resources for additional recruits above and beyond the number that would otherwise have been recruited.

Police Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he gives police forces and authorities on the purchase and leasing of vehicles which are manufactured in the United Kingdom. [122153]

Mr. Charles Clarke: None. It is the responsibility of chief officers in England and Wales, together with their police authority, to determine which vehicles they purchase or lease. Decisions will be based on the operational needs of the force but must comply with European Union procurement law.

Framework Arrangements, centrally negotiated by Police Information Technology Organisation, enable forces to benefit from agreed discounts. These Arrangements cover a variety of vehicles, including motorcycles, and also vehicle spare parts.

Child Abuse

Ms Southworth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many criminal convictions have been secured against adults charged in relation to child abuse more than three years after the alleged offences took place in each year since 1990; [122292]

(2) how many adults employed in a position of trust have been charged in relation to child abuse more than three years after the alleged offences took place in each year since 1990. [122293]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The requested information cannot be determined from the data collected centrally.

Operation Care

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 24 November 1999, Official Report, column 119W, on Operation Care, as a result of the police investigations into child abuse, how many people who were convicted pleaded not guilty; how many (a) suspects and (b) offenders there were; how many separate complaints of child abuse were received; how many people were acquitted after trial; how many people were arrested but had no further action taken against them; how many persons have been charged and are awaiting trial and how long they have been waiting; how many persons are on police bail; with respect to each investigation how many victims have applied for compensation; how much each individual has received; and how many victims have not applied for compensation. [121698]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand that Operation Care is a continuing investigation, and the information which follows is accurate as of 11 May.

Four people convicted on charges arising from Operation Care had pleaded not guilty. 407 persons were classified as offenders or suspects. The number of separate complaints relevant to this operation is not readily available, but is at least 759. Four people were acquitted after trial; 12 people were arrested but had no further action taken against them; 17 people have been charged and are awaiting trial. Of these latter, four have been awaiting trial for up to one year, a further seven for up to 18 months, a further three for up to two years, and a further three for up to 31 months. (Delays in trial are sometimes due to defence requests.) Twelve people are on police bail. 108 people have applied for compensation to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority and 32 people have received awards as shown in the table. The precise number of complainants who have not applied for compensation is not known.

Amounts paid in compensation	Number of people
£1,000	5
£2,000	7
£2,500	1
£3,000	7
£5,000	1
£6,000	2
£6,300	1
£7,500	3
£10,000	1

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 24 November 1999, Official Report, column 119W, on Operation Care, if he will list the forces that (a) have carried out and (b) are carrying out investigations into institutional child abuse; what is the name of each investigation and its terms of reference; when each investigation (i) commenced and (ii) ended; which are continuing; what period of time is covered by each investigation; how many people have been (A) charged, (B) arrested and (C) convicted and sentenced; and how many people who have been convicted and sentenced have appealed. [121697]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information is not collected on the number of investigations into institutional child abuse or on the numbers of people arrested, charged or convicted as a result. But a survey was carried out last year on behalf of the Association of Chief Police Officers Crime Committee to establish how many forces in England and Wales had been or were currently investigating claims of institutional child abuse. During the period covered by the questionnaire (1 January 1998 to 30 June 1999), 32 forces said they had been, or were, currently investigating such allegations. Many of the remaining forces stated that they had been engaged in such inquiries at other times.

Police Forces (Funding)

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers in each force area are currently being employed using funding through the (a) single regeneration budget and (b) discretionary local authority funds. [121712]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information on the number of police officers employed using Single Regeneration Budget funding is not available centrally.

It is also not possible to determine how many officers are recruited using discretionary local authority funds. Force budgets are treated as a whole and distinctions are not made between those officers financed by local authority and central grant funds.

Crime Clear-up Rate (London)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the clear-up rate for criminal offences in the Metropolitan police area in the last 12 months. [121975]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The most recent available data from the Metropolitan police relate to the year ending 31 March 2000. This indicates that their clear-up rate for recorded crimes in that year was 16 per cent.

Wrongfully Convicted Prisoners

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners have been released by the Court of Appeal on grounds of wrongful conviction since the Criminal Cases Review Commission was set up; and how many cases are awaiting consideration. [121938]

Mr. Charles Clarke: To date, 27 of the cases heard by appellate courts following a referral by the Criminal Cases Review Commission have resulted in the conviction being quashed or the sentence being reduced. Twelve appellants were in custody at the time and were released due to the Court's decision. At present, 45 cases referred by the Commission are awaiting an appeal hearing. At the end of April, the Commission had 462 applications under review, and 921 awaiting review.

Mr. Johnny Kamara

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the case of Mr. Johnny Kamara and the formal quashing of his conviction by the Court of Appeal on 9 May following consideration by the Criminal Cases Review Commission. [121943]

Mr. Charles Clarke: It is a matter for the greatest regret when anyone suffers punishment as a result of a miscarriage of justice. I welcome the decision of the Court of Appeal to quash Mr. Kamara's conviction, and that of the Criminal Cases Review Commission to refer the case to the Court.

Racial Abuse

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases of racial abuse were recorded in (a) each police authority and (b) each constituency in the past five years. [121720]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information on the number of racist incidents recorded by the police is published annually by the Home Office in "Statistics on Race and the Criminal Justice System" for each police force area. Information is not collected centrally by constituency.

It is not possible to identify which of these incidents could be described as racial abuse.

Racially Motivated Crime

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were (a) charged and (b) convicted of racially motivated crimes in each of the past five years (i) in England and (ii) in Wales. [121726]

Mr. Charles Clarke: No information is collected centrally on the number of persons charged or on the number convicted of a racially motivated offence.

Information is available on those cautioned or convicted of any offence identified as racially aggravated by the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. The statistics currently available cover the period October 1998 to September 1999 (December 1999 for the Crown court) in England and Wales. These show that 326 persons were cautioned by the police, 486 persons convicted at magistrates courts and 84 at the Crown court.

Humberside Police

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many anti-social behaviour orders have been issued in the Humberside police area. [121935]

Mr. Charles Clarke: As I stated in my reply to the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) on 21 February 2000, Official Report, column 824W, records of the numbers of anti-social behaviour orders applied for are not currently held centrally. We are not aware of any issued in the Humberside police area since the relevant provisions of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 came into force in April last year.

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the disbanding of Humberside police's Drug Squad. [121934]

Mr. Charles Clarke: This is an operational matter for the Chief Constable of the Humberside police. Inquiries have established, however, that there are no plans to disband the force's Drugs Squad.

Penalty Clauses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the contracts entered into with private sector companies for the provision of goods or services since May 1997 where penalty clauses were triggered for non-performance; and if he will make a statement. [122025]

Mr. Straw: It is not my Department's policy to include penalty clauses in contracts. However, available details about contracts my Department has entered into with private sector companies for the provision of goods or services since May 1997 where financial compensation or damages were triggered for non-performance are given in the table.

Crime Fighting Fund

Mr. Hope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he intends to accelerate police recruitment under the Crime Fighting Fund; and if he will make a statement. [122564]

Mr. Straw: I announced in the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Burgon) on 9 February 2000, Official Report, column 172W, that all 43 forces in England and Wales had successfully bid for a share of the Crime Fighting Fund (CFF) to recruit 5,000 police officers over and above the number they had otherwise planned to recruit over the next three years commencing April 2000. These were to be phased on the basis of 1,000 recruits this year (2000–01), 2,000 in 2001–02 and 2,000 in 2002–03. I also gave details of the number of police officers each force had been allocated.

Since then, and as a result of the funding decisions outlined by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Budget, I was able to announce in my reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham) on 27 March 2000, Official Report, columns 1–3W, that part of the £91 million provided in the Budget for modernising the police service in England and Wales would be used to accelerate the CFF with a view to delivering the 5,000 recruits within the first two years of the scheme.

I have consulted the police service and police authority representatives and I am now pleased to announce that forces will be able to recruit up to a maximum of 3,000 new recruits in year one of the scheme (2000–01), rather than 1,000 as announced in February, and the remaining 2,000 in year two (2001–02). Tripling the number which can be recruited during the current financial year will cost about £24 million above and beyond the £35 million which has already been provided for the current allocation. Further decisions on funding for the police service for 2001–04 will be announced as part of the Spending Review 2000 in the summer.

The table shows the revised distribution of officers allocated to each force under the accelerated scheme.

My officials have today written to each chief constable and each police authority to explain the funding arrangements under the scheme. I have placed a copy of the letter in the Library.

The funding for each force will be determined once each force has provided a profile of their planned recruitment during the first year. This will help ensure that funding can be maintained for forces to recruit up to the maximum in year one. Forces are also being given the opportunity, by prior agreement, to revise their CFF allocations if they are experiencing difficulty in recruitment by deferring part of their allocation to year two and those who are able to, to accelerate some of their year two allocation into year one. No force will be able to exceed its overall total CFF allocation and any increase may be limited by the total CFF budget for year one.

Metropolitan Police Vehicles

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the average daily number of Metropolitan police vehicles off the road for repairs in each month of this year; and if he will make a statement. [122362]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that the average daily number of vehicles off the road for repairs in each month of this year was as follows: January—532; February—427; March—405; and April—864.

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many vehicles the Metropolitan police had in (a) March 1997 and (b) March 2000. [122363]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that in March 1997 there were 4,160 vehicles; in March 2000 there were 3,991.

Hunting with Dogs

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) by whom it was decided to widen the initial remit of his Department's inquiry into hunting with dogs; and what factors led to this decision; [122527]

(2) if he will list the persons involved (a) within and (b) outside his Department in drawing up the remit of the Burns inquiry; [122525]

(3) what was the role of Baroness Jay in determining the remit of his Department's inquiry into hunting with dogs; what role she has played in the inquiry; and if he will make a statement. [122526]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The terms of reference of the Committee of Inquiry into Hunting with Dogs were drawn up by Home Office Officials, in consultation with Lord Burns, and approved by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Baroness Jay has had no role whatsoever either in drawing up the terms of reference or in the Inquiry itself.

The remit has always been about hunting with dogs—not shooting or retrieval of quarry with dogs. The question of "widening" the Terms of Reference is a misunderstanding.

Female Circumcision

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance his Department issues to chief constables concerning training for the policing of the Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985. [122491]

Mr. Charles Clarke: New Government guidance "Working Together to Safeguard Children" which is available in the Library and which has been circulated to chief officers of police, recommends that in local areas where there are communities who traditionally practice female genital mutilation, the policy of Area Child Protection Committees (on which the police are represented) should focus on a preventive strategy involving community education.

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many (a) arrests and (b) convictions have been made under the Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985; [122490]

(2) how many (a) arrests and (b) convictions have been made under (i) the Children Act 1989 and (ii) the Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998, in relation to the practice of female genital mutilation in the UK and abroad. [122494]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Arrest data are not collected centrally by individual offence.

The Home Office Court Proceedings Database show no defendants proceeded against under the Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985. Information collected under the Children Act 1989 and the Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998 does not distinguish such offences from others within these Acts.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles operated by his Department were manufactured (i) in the UK, (ii) in the EU and (iii) elsewhere. [122257]

Mr. Straw: The information requested is given in the table. It has not been possible to identify the exact origin of all the vehicles as this would require individual chassis numbers which are not readily to hand.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Seed Purity

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action the Government are taking to address the issue of seed purity. [122925]

Ms Quin: We are taking several new steps to ensure seed purity, in addition to the current consultation on the importation and labelling of seeds. These include pressing internationally for agreed standards, testing of seed imports to the UK and working with the industry on a Code of Practice. The need for action in this area is highlighted by the recent information we have received from Advanta Seeds UK that some of its conventional rapeseed sold and sown in 1999 and 2000 in several EU member states, including the UK, contained about 1 per cent. of genetically modified rapeseed. The genetic modification in question has already been assessed and cleared for food use and for field trials in the UK. We have consulted both ACRE (The Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment) and the Food Standards Agency who have confirmed the view that there is no risk to public health or the environment.

Forest Enterprise

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what arrangements are being made for the quinquennial review of the Forest Enterprise Executive Agency. [122800]

Mr. Morley: As an executive agency, Forest Enterprise is subject to review every five years—part of the process of continuous improvement of Government services promised in the "Modernising Government" White Paper of March 1999. Forest Enterprise was established as an executive agency on 1 April 1996 and its review has now started. Stage 1 is concerned with getting the organisation right, and its conclusions will be reported to Forestry Ministers in July. Stage 2, which is concerned with improving the agency's performance, will be completed in December.

The review will include wide ranging consultation with Forest Enterprise's customers, visitors and other interested parties, who are invited to contact the Secretary to the Forestry Commissioners, at 231 Corstorphine Road, Edinburgh EH12 7AT or to visit the Forestry Commission's website at www.forestry.gov.uk/fereview.

Over-30-months Scheme

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the weight limit on payments for cattle entering the over-30-months scheme will be removed; and if he will make a statement. [122926]

Ms Quin: On 12 May the Beef Management Committee agreed a Commission proposal to remove the weight limit on payments for all cattle entering the over-30-months scheme. This will take effect for all cattle entering the scheme on or after 5 June. This delivers on a key element of the Government's Action Plan for Farming. It is worth £20 million a year in payments to UK farmers and will also increase asset values. It will be of particular benefit to those running suckler heards.

Pig Industry

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate his Department has made of the number of UK pig slaughterings per week over the last two years; and what are his projections for next year. [121763]

Ms Quin: The table gives UK weekly clean pig slaughterings for the past two years. Estimates of slaughterings for future years are not prepared on a weekly basis, but a Eurostat estimate of UK slaughterings for the year 2000 as a whole amount to 13.5 million heads.

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he will take, with regard to the recently announced aid package for United Kingdom pig farmers, to ensure that the complexity of meeting the scheme's requirements does not deter the industry from accessing the funds available. [121767]

Ms Quin: The Pig Industry Restructuring Scheme is being developed in close consultation with the National Pig Association and the Meat and Livestock Commission to ensure as far as is possible that the scheme is relevant to the needs of pig producers. Clearly the scheme must also remain within UK and EU law and meet any financial propriety concerns.

Agriculture Council

Mr. Browne: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the outcome of his negotiations at the March Council Meeting of EU Agriculture Ministers in respect of export refunds for the UK spirit industry. [121971]

Ms Quin: The EU Agriculture Council on 20 March agreed on conclusions to guide the Commission in its strategy for accommodating budgetary and WTO pressures in the fixing of export refunds for processed products. My right hon. Friend the Minister emphasised to the Council the importance of export refunds to the cereals-based spirit drinks industry, notably Scotch whisky. He urged the Commission to recognise this concern in its implementation of export refund reductions. A statement to this effect was recorded in the minutes of the Council.

Discussions with the Commission on the implementation of the strategy are continuing at official level. Our aim is to achieve the best outcome possible for all sectors affected, including the spirits sector.

Civil Servants (Relocation)

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which relocation companies his Department has used when relocating civil servants since May 1997. [122296]

Mr. Morley: My Department has used the following companies:

Move	Firm
1. Move of officials between our Whitehall offices, Nobel House on Millbank, and St. Christopher House in Southwark.	Planned in house with removals by Rockshields Ltd.
2. Move of officials from Tolworth and St. Christopher House to 1A Page Street, London SW1	Planned in house with removals by Bishops Move Ltd.
3. Move from offices at Alphington Road, Exeter to new offices at Clyst St. Mary	Planned by Vickery Holman with removals by Pickfords Business Services Ltd.
4. Move from offices at Wistaton, Crewe to Electra Way, Crewe	Planned by Edmund Kirby with removals by Bishops Move Ltd.
5. Move of Central Science Laboratory at Slough to Sand Hutton, near York	Planned by Robert Shanks and Associates with removals by Burton and Smith Moving Ltd.

Imported Carcases

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the number of imported carcases over the last two years; and what are his projections for next year. [121764]

Ms Quin: Although import statistics are not collected in this form, it is unlikely that much pigmeat imported into the UK over the last two years was in the form of pig carcases. In 1998 the UK imported 188,000 tonnes of pork and 231,000 tonnes of bacon and ham. The equivalent figures for 1999 were 212,000 tonnes and 227,000 tonnes.

Estimates of future imports are not available.

Animal Slaughtering

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the incidence of animals being illegally slaughtered without pre-stunning in abattoirs. [121957]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 15 May 2000]: Slaughter in an abattoir without prior stunning is not illegal if it is carried out by a religious method and in accordance with the requirements set for religious slaughter. The Government would prefer all animals to be stunned before slaughter, but are committed to maintaining this exemption from the requirement to stun, in recognition of the wish of certain communities to slaughter animals in accordance with their religious beliefs. That does not mean that we do not seek to apply improved welfare standards and we do meet representatives of religious organisations to discuss their issues.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles operated by his Department were manufactured (i) in the UK, (ii) in the EU and (iii) elsewhere. [122265]

Mr. Morley: Country of manufacture is not routinely provided by suppliers and so the information is not readily available. Although it is possible to obtain the information from main dealers it would mean having to extract the chassis number of each vehicle in the Departmental fleet to enable the dealership to trace its country of origin. With some 550 official vehicles in use throughout the Department and Agencies, this could be done only by incurring disproportionate cost.

Zimbabwe (Import Licences)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations were made to the European Commission concerning permitted maximums in import licences for agricultural products from Zimbabwe; and if he will make a statement. [120852]

Ms Quin: No representations have been made by the Government. Any other representations are a matter for the European Commission.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Criminal Defence Service

Angela Smith: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when he will introduce the Criminal Defence Service. [122927]

Mr. Lock: The Lord Chancellor has agreed to a request from the Legal Services Commission to postpone the introduction of the Criminal Defence Service from 2 October 2000 to 2 April 2001. This will allow additional time for preparation by the professions and for the implementation of the new arrangements by criminal defence lawyers. The Legal Services Commission is notifying the professions by letter accordingly. This delay will have no substantial effects on the reform programme, including the development of the salaried defender service.

Consultation papers on the establishment of the salaried defender service and on the choice of representative will be published shortly.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles operated by the Lord Chancellor's Department were manufactured (i) in the UK, (ii) in the EU and (iii) elsewhere. [122248]

Mr. Lock: The Lord Chancellor's Department operates a total of 636 cars of which (i) 251 were manufactured in the UK, (ii) 373 in the EU, and (iii) elsewhere.

Eleven commercial vehicles are operated by the Department. Of these 10 were manufactured within the UK. The place of manufacture of the other commercial vehicle, in use by the Northern Ireland Court Service, is unknown and does not therefore appear in the table.

The breakdown of vehicles operated by the Lord Chancellor's Department is shown in the table.

Trials (Health Problems)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many people who have been (a) brought to trial and (b) involved in a trial as an accused person have in the past 20 years been excused from trial due to (i) physical and (ii) mental ill-health. [122079]

Jane Kennedy: The information requested is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, figures are available, from 1986 onwards, for defendants who have been found unfit to plead at the Crown court. They do not, however, take into account the nature of the defendant's illness.

WALES

Comprehensive Spending Review

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what meetings he has had with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in relation to this year's Comprehensive Spending Review. [121740]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I meet the Chancellor regularly and discuss a range of issues, including the Government's Spending Review which is currently under way.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has made on behalf of the National Assembly for Wales in relation to this year's Comprehensive Spending Review. [121739]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I represent the interests of Wales in the Government's Spending Review that is currently under way. This is a very significant part of my job, and I can assure you that I attach a great deal of importance to it. I can guarantee that the Assembly's views will be fully taken into account when the final decisions are made.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles operated by his Department were manufactured (i) in the UK, (ii) in the EU and (iii) elsewhere. [122252]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I refer the hon. Member to the answer being given to him by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office.

My Department operates no vehicles other than those provided by the Government Car and Despatch Agency.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Eco-schools Scheme

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the contribution that the eco-schools scheme makes to the teaching of curriculum subjects. [121933]

Jacqui Smith: The Eco-schools Programme is managed in the UK by Going for Green, a charitable trust. My Department is aware of the programme and the contribution it can make to environmental awareness in schools, and I recently visited a school to present an eco-schools certificate. We also discuss it as part of our regular liaison with the Department of Environment, Transport and the Regions.

Penalty Clauses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the contracts entered into with private sector companies for the provision of goods or services since May 1997 where penalty clauses were triggered for non-performance; and if he will make a statement. [122021]

Mr. Wicks: There are none to list as the Department for Education and Employment does not include penalty clauses in its contracts.

Objective 3 Funding

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which areas of England and Wales are covered by the European Social Fund Objective 3 Funding; when the funding scheme will come into operation; and if he will make a statement. [122101]

Ms Jowell: In England, Objective 3 will cover all the English regions, except for the Objective 1 areas of Merseyside, Cornwall and South Yorkshire. I expect the European Commission to approve our plan in June, and for bidding rounds to be held in all regions before the end of July. In Wales Objective 3 will cover the seven unitary authorities outside the Objective 1 area of West Wales and the Valleys. The Welsh plan has been prepared by the National Assembly for Wales, and I understand that approval from the Commission is expected in time for the programme to come into operation either in the summer or in the early part of the autumn.

Female Circumcision

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what guidance his Department issues to local education authorities concerning the operation of the Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985. [122495]

Jacqui Smith: Our advice in "Working Together to Safeguard Children", which we published jointly with the Department of Health and the Home Office earlier this year, highlights the importance of focusing on preventative strategies in relation to female genital mutilation. Copies of "Working Together" were sent to all local education authorities. Furthermore, our advice to schools and local education authorities on child protection procedures in Circular 10/95, "Protecting Children from Abuse: The Role of the Education Service" makes clear that, if school staff have reason to believe that a child is at risk from any form of abuse, they should report their suspicions immediately to the school's designated teacher for child protection. The designated teacher will refer any concerns to the appropriate professional agencies to investigate further.

Institute for Learning and Teaching

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on (a) membership and (b) industrial relations at the Institute for Learning and Teaching in higher education. [122169]

Mr. Wicks: The Institute for Learning and Teaching (ILT) is an independent body. 1,100 applications for membership have been received in the six months of recruitment which has taken place so far. The ILT is taking steps to increase awareness of the benefits of membership among those eligible to join. I understand that both the AUT and NATFHE have representation on the Transitional Council of the ILT and that their contribution is greatly valued by the Institute.

Hearing-impaired Children

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what guidance his Department has given to local education authorities about making educational provision for children with a hearing loss (a) over and (b) under the age of two years in order to support their language and educational development. [122249]

Jacqui Smith: The Code of Practice on the Identification and Assessment of Special Educational Needs includes guidance on the steps to be taken to identify and meet the needs of children with sensory impairments, including hearing difficulties. The Code of Practice also contains a chapter offering guidance on assessments of special educational needs for children under the age of five, which includes specific guidance on the assessment of children under the age of two. Local education authorities are under a statutory duty to have regard to the Code of Practice.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps he is taking to ensure that take-up of training by teachers wishing to undertake the mandatory training for teachers of the deaf is sufficient to meet national demand. [122250]

Jacqui Smith: Prime responsibility for the in-service training of teachers rests with local education authorities and schools, who are in the best position to determine their needs and respond to demand in the light of local circumstances. In recognition of the importance of training, the Department is supporting expenditure of £26 million in the 2000–01 financial year through the Standards Fund to help LEAs with the costs of training teachers of children with special educational needs, including training in the mandatory qualifications. The Teacher Training Agency has also been conducting a review of the courses leading to mandatory qualifications.

Correspondence

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire will receive a substantive reply to his letter of 29 March on behalf of his constituent Dr. Irwin. [122331]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 16 May 2000]: A reply to the right hon. Member's letter was issued on 15 May.

Connexions

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the optimum mix of delivery of the Connexions Service through private, voluntary and public partners as referred to in paragraph 7.12 of Connexions: the best start in life for every young person. [122454]

Mr. Wicks: The Connexions Service: prospectus and specification, which was published on 4 May, invites prospective partner organisations to come together to agree how the Connexions Service can operate most effectively in their area and to produce outline Partnership Proposals. Partnerships will need to ensure that the mix of public, private and voluntary sector provision is appropriate to the needs of the particular area and that these decisions are based on the quality of existing provision. Partnerships will need to demonstrate in their Business Plans to be produced in the autumn that public, private and voluntary sector providers have been given a fair opportunity in each area to offer relevant services, on the basis of the quality of existing provision. The Connexions Service National Unit, through its assessment and approval of partnership Business Plans and subsequent monitoring of service delivery, will ensure that an appropriate mix of public, private and voluntary sector providers are involved.

Class Sizes

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the average class size in each infant school in Cleethorpes constituency since 1995. [122347]

Ms Estelle Morris: Information on individual schools is not normally published. Where individual school information is published, as in the School Performance tables, the information is first checked with the schools concerned. The latest available information on infant class sizes in the parliamentary constituency of Cleethorpes is shown in the table.

Provisional national estimates of infant class sizes in England for January 2000 was recently published in a Statistical First Release "Class sizes in Maintained schools in England: January 2000" on 12 April 2000. Prior to this, information on infant class sizes for September 1999 was published in Statistical First Release "Infant class sizes in England: September 1999" on 21 January 2000. Copies of both publications are available from the Library.

TREASURY

Prudential Assurance Company

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects the talks initiated in March 1996 between his Department and the Prudential Assurance Company regarding a modification of 10 per cent. distributable surplus to reach an outcome. [122487]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 16 May 2000]: When discussions of this kind take place and a conclusion is reached, the company concerned makes an announcement. Information about proposals of this kind may be confidential or price sensitive, and therefore subject to statutory restrictions on disclosure.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles operated by his Department were manufactured (i) in the UK, (ii) in the EU and (iii) elsewhere. [122204]

Mr. Timms: All vehicles operated by the Treasury are provided by the Government Car and Dispatch Agency (GCDA). GCDA are an agency of the Cabinet Office and I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Cabinet Office.

NIRS2

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the total cost of the difficulties encountered with the NIRS2 computer system; and what percentage of that cost will be recouped from Andersen Consulting. [122104]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 15 May 2000]: Andersen Consulting has worked with the Inland Revenue to resolve the problems experienced with the NIRS2 system. All the costs in undertaking this work have been met by Andersen Consulting. The cost to Andersen Consulting is approximately £20 million.

Tax Rates (Businesses)

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to extend to unincorporated small businesses the new lower 10 per cent. starting tax rate levied on the initial £10,000 business profits. [122357]

Dawn Primarolo: Unincorporated businesses are subject to income tax whereas small companies are subject to corporation tax. Income tax rates are applied to total income from all sources; therefore profits from unincorporated business activities are aggregated with an individual's other income, and the appropriate rates charged after deduction of personal allowances. A 10p income tax band was introduced in Budget 1999 and increased in Budget 2000. As with the whole tax system, this band is kept under constant review. Any future changes will be announced in the normal way.

Press Officers

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many press officers were employed by the Treasury in (a) May 1997 and (b) May 2000. [122381]

Miss Melanie Johnson: In May 1997, HM Treasury employed 5 press officers (besides the Head of Communications) and at May 2000 the number is 5.5.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many households in (a) Scotland and (b) Paisley, South which are eligible for the Working Families Tax Credit are (i) single parent families where the woman is the sole earner, (ii) single parent families where the man is the sole earner, (iii) couples, where the male is the sole earner, (iv) couples, where the female is the sole earner and (v) dual income families. [122371]

Dawn Primarolo: It is estimated that 98,800 families in Scotland have been awarded the Working Families Tax Credit to the end of March 2000, of which 1,400 were in Paisley, South.

The breakdown requested for Scotland is as follows:

Family type	Number with Working Families Tax Credit awards at March 2000
Single parent—female earner	61,100
Single parent—male earner	2,100
Couple—male sole earner	21,800
Couple—female sole earner	8,500
Couple—both earning	5,400
Total	98,800

There are too few cases in the 5 per cent. sample used for these analyses to provide a complete breakdown for Paisley, South. It is estimated that 1,100 families with WFTC awards in Paisley, South were single parents where the woman is the sole earner.

VAT (Renovations and Conversions)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received in the past six months requesting that value added tax be (a) reduced and (b) removed on building renovations and conversions; and if he will make a statement. [122127]

Dawn Primarolo: Treasury Ministers have received about 5,550 letters since last November asking for changes to the rate of VAT on building, renovation and maintenance work. The vast majority of these letters have asked for a reduced rate rather than removal of VAT. The removal of VAT from repairs and renovations is illegal under agreements with our European partners.

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to reduce the level of value added tax levied on building renovations and conversions; and if he will make a statement. [122121]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government have no present plans to introduce a reduced rate for building renovations and conversions.

Mortgage Tax Relief (Scotland)

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the total cost of mortgage tax relief was in Scotland in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98, and (c) 1998–99; and what was the estimated cost in 1999–2000. [122087]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The estimated costs of mortgage interest relief in Scotland for 1996–97, 1997–98 and 1998–99 are published in Table 5.3 of "Inland Revenue Statistics 1999", a copy of which is in the House of Commons Library. The provisional figure for 1999–2000 is £130 million.

Economic and Monetary Union

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the estimates covering expenditure on the national changeover plan; and the dates on which they were approved by the House. [121811]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Details of expenditure on national changeover planning were included in the second Outline National Changeover plan which was published on 9 March. A copy of the Plan is in the Library of the House.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what date and in which forum the decision was taken to proceed with a national changeover plan. [121809]

Miss Melanie Johnson: In his statement to the House in October 1997, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the Government would > begin now to prepare ourselves so that, should we meet the economic tests, we can make a decision to join a successful single currency early in the next Parliament.—[Official Report, 27 October 1997; Vol. 299, c. 587.]

The first Outline National Changeover Plan was presented to the House by the Prime Minister on 23 February 1999.

Indirect Taxation

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place a copy of the document entitled, "The simulation of indirect tax reforms: the IFS simulation model for indirect taxation", in the Library. [121741]

Dawn Primarolo: A copy of "The simulation of indirect tax reforms: the IFS simulation model for indirect taxation", published by the Institute for Fiscal Studies in 1990, has been available in the House of Commons Library since 1995.

Funding (Wales)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what meetings his Department has had with the (a) National Assembly for Wales and (b) Office of the Secretary of State for Wales in relation to the Comprehensive Spending Review. [121738]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Officials from my Department meet officials from the National Assembly for Wales and the Office of the Secretary of State for Wales regularly to discuss a range of issues.

Contributions Agency

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes have been made in the past year by the Contributions Agency in its policy on employment of civil servants between the ages of 60 and 65 years. [121321]

Dawn Primarolo: The Contributions Agency (CA), a former agency of the Department of Social Security (DSS), ceased to exist with effect from 1 April 1999 when, as part of the transfer arrangements with the Inland Revenue, all CA functions and associated staff moved across to the Revenue.

Prior to the transfer with the Revenue the CA, in line with other Government Departments and agencies, had delegated responsibility to formulate their own retirement age policy. Their policy, operated under the central DSS policy framework, provided for a normal retirement age of 60 for all staff. As part of the transitional arrangements on moving to this policy, some staff had been granted extensions of service up to a maximum retention date of 31 July 1999.

As part of the negotiations prior to the transfer, the Revenue undertook to honour any commitments given to staff in respect of extension of service in place at 31 March 1999. This undertaking was embodied in the terms and conditions package negotiated with the relevant trade unions, and accepted by CA staff by way of a ballot. Thus after the transfer any former member of the CA who had been granted an extension of service was able to remain with the Revenue until the expiry of that extension, up to the maximum retention date of 31 July 1999. Where an extension was not agreed at 31 March 1999, then staff would subsequently retire in line with Revenue retirement age policy, which at the time of the transfer was similar to CA policy, in providing for a normal retirement age of 60.

The Revenue has recently introduced a concession to the normal retirement age of 60, whereby staff with less than 25 years pensionable service at age 60 may be retained until this level of pensionable service is attained, or reach age 65, whichever is the earlier. This concession was part of a package of terms and conditions changes attached to a Modernisation Agreement with the Public and Commercial Services Union (PCS) accepted as part of the revised 1999 pay offer. The concession took effect on 21 January 2000.

On a wider front, the Revenue is carrying out a review of its current retirement age policy and, following consultation with the relevant trade unions, any resultant policy changes will be announced in due course.

Tax

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the aggregate burden of additional taxes on trade, industry and commerce since May 1997. [121351]

Dawn Primarolo: Details of the Budget measures can be found in the relevant tables of the July 1997, March 1998, 1999 and 2000 Red Book. Many of these measures are of particular benefit to trade, industry and commerce.

Barnett Formula

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what Barnett formula comparability factors are being used for (a) Scotland, (b) Wales and (c) Northern Ireland for each Department in the 2000 Spending Review; and if he will make a statement. [121085]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Barnett comparability factors which were used in the 1998 Comprehensive Spending Review were included in the Statement of Funding Policy published by the Treasury last year. The 2000 spending review is currently underway and will report in due course.

Mobile Phone Licences

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what sum he expects to receive from allocation of licences for the new generation of mobile telephones; and what assessment he has made of the effects of (a) his proposed use of it to redeem national debt and (b) such planned redemption on the maximum annual debt in sterling he can incur under the Maastricht protocol or stability pact. [121076]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The total sum of the completed bids from the auction of licences for spectrum to support third generation mobile services in the UK was £22.5 billion. Within any given level for total public spending, less on debt interest will mean more is available for other public services. Total spending will be unchanged from the spending envelope set in the Budget in line with the Government's neutral view of the economy's trend growth and in line with the fiscal rules. The Budget forecast that the stability and growth pact reference levels of 3 per cent. of GDP for the deficit and 60 per cent. for debt are achieved comfortably throughout the next five years.

Manufacturing Jobs

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of the jobs created in the United Kingdom since May 1997 have been in the manufacturing sector. [120840]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested, the proportion of jobs created in the UK since May 1997 that have been in the manufacturing sector, is not available.

Household Incomes

Mr. Cox: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average income per week per household in the London Borough of Wandsworth. [122384]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Pullinger to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 17 May 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent question asking about the average household income of Wandsworth. I am replying in the Director's absence.

No household income estimates are available from ONS at London borough level.

The latest figures published by ONS for household income by region, up to 1997 were published in Regional Accounts 1997: part 2, Economic Trends no. 551, October 1999. This publication is available in the House of Commons Library.

In this publication income of the household sector is defined on a national accounts basis. In addition to private households, this includes charities, voluntary and other non-profit organisations and quasi-corporations.

The published figures are normally presented in terms of total annual household income per head of population. Converted to weekly averages published regional estimates for London (the smallest area published that includes Wandsworth) are as follows:

1995: £282
1996: £303
1997: £312.

Employment Statistics (Greater London)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) people were unemployed and (b) job vacancies there were in the Greater London area on 1 April. [122078]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Pullinger to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 17 May 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent question on unemployment and job vacancies in the Greater London area. I am replying in the Director's absence.

Estimates of economic status are available from the Labour Force Survey (LFS). The measure of unemployment derived from the LFS is defined on a consistent and internationally recognised basis set out by the International Labour Organisation (ILO) and counts as unemployed people who are a) without a paid job, b) available to start work within the next two weeks and c) have either looked for work in the last four weeks or are waiting to start a job already obtained.

The latest seasonally adjusted estimates from the Labour Force Survey covering winter (December-February) 1999/2000 show there were 268,000 ILO unemployed in the Greater London area.

In the closest aggregation of Jobcentres to the Greater London area there were 36,100 unfilled vacancies in March 2000 the latest date for which data are available. Jobcentre vacancies do not represent the total number of vacancies available in the economy. Latest estimates suggest that about a third of all vacancies nationally are notified to Jobcentres. This proportion may vary between regions.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of leavers aged 16 to 18 years entered higher education following completion of A-levels from (a) sixth forms in independent schools, (b) sixth forms in maintained schools, (c) sixth form colleges and (d) other further education colleges in the last year for which figures are available. [120920]

Mr. Wicks: The available information, for entry to full-time higher education, is given in the table. Equivalent data for part-time admissions are not available.

Connexions Service

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the timetable is for the mapping of current provision of services to be undertaken by the Connexions Service as referred to in paragraph 7.20 of "Connexions: the best start in life for every young person". [122453]

Mr. Wicks: As part of their proposals, each pilot area has been asked to submit a timetable for completing their mapping exercise. We expect all pilots to complete an initial exercise by September 2000. In submitting proposals for the wider introduction of the Connexions Service from April 2001 we expect further mapping will have started before the end of the year.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if personal advisers will be provided for pupils in independent schools through the Connexions Service. [122702]

Mr. Wicks: The Connexions Service will provide access to high quality guidance and support to all 13–19 year olds, giving particular priority to those young people who are most at risk of encountering obstacles to a successful transition to adulthood.

Civil Servants

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants, excluding members of the senior Civil Service, in his Department for 1999–2000; and to what extent the pay awards were staged. [121649]

Mr. Wills: The headline pay settlement was 2.5 per cent. on the pay bill and, together with the additional funds from staff turnover, staff in post received performance-related increases averaging 3.9 per cent. The increases were not staged.

Open Government

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many applications for information he received under the Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information in the last parliamentary session; and how many were granted. [121853]

Ms Hodge: The Home Office holds responsibility for the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information and monitoring its operation and effectiveness, and will respond to this question on behalf of Government as a whole. I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by the Secretary of State for the Home Department today, Official Report, columns 216–17W.

University Buildings

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps he has taken to assess the structural integrity of university buildings constructed in the 1960s. [122696]

Mr. Wicks: Higher education institutions are autonomous bodies. Each university is responsible for the maintenance and repair of its own estate. No survey has been carried out to look specifically at 1960s buildings, but in 1997 the Higher Education Funding Council for England commissioned a survey to review the condition of the whole higher education estate. As a result of the survey, the Higher Education Funding Council for England introduced a "poor estates" initiative, setting aside £200 million for higher education estates funding up to 2000.

Teachers

Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many teaching posts are (a) vacant and (b) filled by supply, temporary and agency teachers in (i) state primary schools and (ii) state secondary schools in (1) Barnet Local Education Authority and (2) Greater London areas; and what proportions of the total the figures represent. [122735]

Ms Estelle Morris: The following table shows the number of vacant teaching posts and the number of posts covered by teachers in occasional service in the maintained nursery, primary and secondary sector in Barnet local education authority and Greater London at January 2000.

	Teacher vacancies		Teachers in occasional service
	Full-time vacant posts	Vacancy rate	Number of agency teachers	Number of other occasional teachers	All occasional teachers	Occasional teacher rate
Nursery/Primary
Barnet	30	2.8	30	10	40	3.6
Greater London	520	2.0	1,200	540	1,730	6.1
Secondary
Barnet	20	1.6	20	10	30	2.2
Greater London	410	1.8	680	190	870	3.5

Note:
Totals may not sum to component parts because of rounding

A qualified teacher vacancy refers to a full-time permanent appointment (or an appointment of at least one term's duration) at 20 January 2000 which was advertised but not filled. Vacancies include those filled on a temporary basis unless filled by someone with a fixed term contract of one term or more. Supply, temporary and agency teachers on a contract of at least one month cannot be separately identified from teachers in regular service.

Teachers in occasional service collected on Form 618G provide cover for a variety of reasons e.g. vacancies, training courses and sickness absence.

Further Education Funding Council

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he expects the Further Education Funding Council to publish its tariff value of courses for 2000–01. [122734]

Mr. Wicks: The tariff document for 2000–01 is due to be published on 22 May 2000.

Funding and Research Council

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the terms of reference for the review of the funding and research council. [122138]

Ms Hewitt: I have been asked to reply.

Overall responsibility for funding university infrastructure in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland is with the devolved Administrations. For England, the responsibility is with the Higher Education Funding Council for England.

In addition, my Department, together with the Wellcome Trust and the HEFCE, is responsible for the £750 million Joint Infrastructure Fund initiative, which provides for research infrastructure and equipment in UK universities. My Department is also responsible, together with the Higher Education Funding Councils and the Department of Higher and Further Education, Training and Employment, for the Joint Research Equipment Initiative for university research equipment.

Competition for funds from the JIF has been very strong. There have been many high quality applications and we have been able to fund only the most outstanding. Under the terms of the JIF scheme there can be no re-submission of unsuccessful applications.

JIF was set up as a one-off fund to boost university infrastructure. The Government are giving careful consideration to the need for a follow-on programme. This includes exploration of options other than allocation based on competition through bidding.

The 1997 Dearing Report of the National Committee of Inquiry into Higher Education drew attention to the need to invest in university research infrastructure in order to ensure that the UK remains at the forefront of scientific research. Dearing's recommendations were based on the 1996 "Survey of Research Equipment in UK Universities" undertaken by the Policy Research in Engineering, Science and Technology Unit at the University of Manchester (PREST). Dearing also drew on Segal Quince and Wicksteed's 1997 "Review of Dual Support: The Funding Gap" study of overall research funding in universities.

I understand that the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals of the Universities of the United Kingdom expects to publish shortly an updated study by PREST, part funded by CVCP and HEFCE, of the present state of research equipment provision and needs in UK universities.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Robert Hamill and Gregory Girvan

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if disciplinary proceedings will be instituted against officers present at the location of the attack on 27 April 1997 in Portadown town centre on Robert Hamill and Gregory Girvan. [119709]

Mr. Ingram: The Independent Commission for Police Complaints are actively considering whether disciplinary proceedings will be instigated in this particular case.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many witness statements have been taken by the Royal Ulster Constabulary inquiry team investigating the murder of Robert Hamill. [119710]

Mr. Ingram: There have been 301 witness statements taken to date.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

University Funding and Infrastructure

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the universities awarded funding for research infrastructure as part of the Joint Infrastructure Fund Competition, indicating how much funding each will receive. [121665]

Ms Hewitt: The Joint Infrastructure Fund (JIF) has made 109 awards worth just under £600 million to 39 universities. The final two rounds of awards will be announced in November 2000 and March 2001.

The successful universities are listed. The value of Round 2 and Round 3 awards are subject to negotiation with successful applicants and will be announced later this year. Round 1 figures are shown in the table.

[1] JIF Rounds 1–3

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) which organisations are responsible for funding infrastructure requirements in universities; [122139]

(2) what models are being considered for the replacement of the Joint Infrastructure Fund. [122137]

Ms Hewitt: Overall responsibility for funding university infrastructure in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland is with the devolved administrations. For England, the responsibility is with the Higher Education Funding Council for England.

In addition, my Department, together with the Wellcome Trust and the HEFCE, is responsible for the £750 million Joint Infrastructure Fund initiative, which provides for research infrastructure and equipment in UK universities. My Department is also responsible, together with the Higher Education Funding Councils and the Department of Higher and Further Education, Training and Employment, for the Joint Research Equipment Initiative for university research equipment.

Competition for funds from the JIF has been very strong. There have been many high quality applications and we have been able to fund only the most outstanding. Under the terms of the JIF scheme there can be no re-submission of unsuccessful applications.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what his policy is on funding proposals which have not been successful in gaining an allocation from the Joint Infrastructure Fund; [122165]

(2) what provision will be made for financing research infrastructure once the funds from the Joint Infrastructure Fund have been allocated; [122164]

(3) what analysis has been made of the volume of investment required in research infrastructure in universities to bring infrastructure in particular subject areas up to the standards of major international competitors. [122166]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given today to her written question 122138, Official Report, column 193W.

Insolvency Legislation

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans his Department has to act on the recently published consultation document on reform of insolvency legislation. [121661]

Dr. Howells: The consultation document, "Bankruptcy: A Fresh Start"—which is the formulation of outline suggestions for possible changes to the law—marks the end of the first stage of the review. The consultation period ends on 30 June. A lot of detailed work will be needed before decisions are made about whether and, if so, how bankruptcy law should be changed. This will be informed by responses to the consultation.

EU Research and Development Reports

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what categories of reports are funded under the call for proposals for indirect research and technological development actions in the framework of the specific programme for research, technological development and demonstration in the field of improving the human research potential and the socioeconomic knowledge base, referred to in European Community Document (2000/c 74/08); and if he will make a statement. [121493]

Ms Hewitt: European Community Document 2000/c 74/08 refers to a call for proposals under the Strategic Analysis of Specific Policy Issues (STRATA) activity of the programme, Improving the Human Research Potential and the Socio-Economic Knowledge Base (IHP). The call identifier is IHP-STRATA-00–1.

Under the call the Commission has invited proposals to produce reports on a number of specific issues relating to science and technology policies, these include:

European science and technology policies and national and global systems;

Articulation between research, training and development and other policies within the European institutional environment;

Management of change in science and technology policy; and Collaboration in science, technology and innovation: changing needs and opportunities for policy.

Research

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the Government's research priorities and the research priorities of (a) the United States and (b) Germany. [122133]

Ms Hewitt: This Government's overall priorities for science and technology were set out following the Comprehensive Spending Review in "Forward Look 1999 (Cm 4363)". They are:

Maintaining the excellence of UK Science—ensuring UK science is and remains world class;

Promoting business exploitation—supporting the development and exploitation of new and existing technologies, particularly through encouraging partnerships and the flow of people between universities and business; and

Ensuring effective use of science and technology by Government Departments—in support of their policy, regulatory, and procurement responsibilities.

Details of the specific research priorities of individual departments, Research Councils and other bodies are also set out in "Forward Look", copies of which are available in the Library of the House. These priorities are being reviewed in the context of the current Spending Review.

In the USA, the main priorities for civilian research set out in the federal budget for Financial Year 2000 are:

All areas of Biomedical research, in particular human genomics and also plant genome research;

Fundamental information technology research; and

Bio-complexity—research on inter-dependencies between the elements of specific environmental systems.

The German Federal Government research priorities set out in their 1999 science research budget include the areas of biotechnology, production engineering, marine and polar research, lasers, IT and sustainable development.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much has been provided by each of the research councils and the four funding councils for spending by the universities on equipment to support scientific research programmes by subject area in each year since 1994. [122135]

Ms Hewitt: Data in respect of the Research Councils and the Higher and Further Education Funding Council (England) are as set out.

Details of awards so far made from the Joint Infrastructure Fund were provided in my answer to my hon. Friend's written question 121665 answered today, Official Report, column 193W.

The funding of Higher Education Institutions in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland is the responsibility of the devolved administrations.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles operated by his Department were manufactured (i) in the UK, (ii) in the EU and (iii) elsewhere. [122253]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 17 May 2000]: Other than hire cars and vehicles supplied by the Government Car and Despatch Agency, for which my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Cabinet Office responded on 17 May 2000, Official Report, column 141W, my Department operates 19 cars, manufactured as follows:

UK or EU: 2[1]

EU: 2

Elsewhere: 1.

[1] Due to some models being simultaneously manufactured in more than one country, it is not possible to be more specific without unjustifiable expense.

Post Offices

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when his Department plans to bring forward proposals for developing the future business potential of the Post Office network; and if he will make a statement. [121310]

Mr. Byers: Completion of the installation of the Horizon system, a modern automated IT platform, throughout the Post Office network in 2001 will provide the potential to develop a range of new business opportunities. In addition to automated network banking on an agency basis, Horizon would provide an important part of the infrastructure for a universal bank offering basic banking services accessible at post offices. We also see opportunities for post offices to develop a key role in e-commerce services and scope for a further development of their role as one-stop shops for many Government services and transactions. We are also looking at the role post offices may be able to play in fulfilling our objective of making the Internet accessible to all by 2005.

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to support the development of a post office universal bank; and if he will make a statement. [121308]

Mr. Byers: The Government strongly support co-operation between the banks and the Post Office to develop a universal bank offering basic banking services to all. The Horizon project to equip the post office network with a modern on-line IT platform, towards which the Government are contributing nearly £500 million, has the potential to provide an important part of the infrastructure for such a bank. A universal bank accessible through post offices would complement the agency network banking service which the Post Office already provides under arrangements with Girobank/ Alliance and Leicester, LloydsTSB, Co-operative and Barclays Banks.

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he plans to bring forward detailed proposals relating to subsidies for post offices; and if he will make a statement. [121309]

Mr. Byers: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Competitiveness, on 11 May 2000, Official Report, column 439W.

Green Transport

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the key buildings for which his Department (a) submitted and (b) did not submit green transport plans by March. [122561]

Dr. Howells: In line with the target set in the Integrated Transport White Paper for the introduction of green transport plans for key government buildings we have completed plans for the Department's three key buildings—Atholl House, St. Mary's House and Westfield House.

Petrol

Ms Jenny Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he has taken to facilitate a meeting between representatives of petrol retailers and petrol wholesalers to discuss a code of practice. [122361]

Dr. Howells: I said during the petrol retailing debate in January that I was happy to broker a meeting if the concerned parties wished to meet and were prepared to compromise where necessary. Such a meeting has not yet been requested, but I intend to take the initiative and invite relevant parties to meet. However, it is sensible to receive advice from the Director General of Fair Trading on the future of the 1966 undertakings first. I expect to receive this soon.

Climate Change Levy

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the impact of the climate change levy on the competitive position of the United Kingdom's horticultural industry. [120805]

Ms Quin: I have been asked to reply.

It is not possible to say with precision what the effect of the climate change levy will be on the competitive position of the United Kingdom's horticultural industry. This will depend, among other things, on the extent to which individual sectors and firms within the industry are exposed to international competition, the future energy use of the industry and the extent to which the industry takes up the various incentives offered under the levy to improve energy efficiency.

The Government have sought to design the climate change levy in a way that maximises its environmental effectiveness while protecting the competitiveness of UK firms. With respect to the horticultural industry the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in Budget 2000 that the Government intend to introduce a package of measures to help protect its competitiveness. Subject to State Aids clearance from the European Commission this will include:

A special package of support for horticulture allocated from the energy efficiency fund. This package will aim to improve energy efficiency across the sector and will include activities such as the provision of site specific advice for individual businesses;

An extension to the list of investments qualifying for enhanced capital allowances to include thermal screens. This will provide a further fiscal incentive for horticultural businesses to invest in energy saving technologies, and;

A temporary 50 per cent. discount on the levy for a period of up to five years to the horticulture sector while the energy efficiency measures targeted at the sector take effect.

DEFENCE

Biological Warfare

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the (a) role of the 1 Field Laboratory Unit that operated a biological warfare agent detection facility during the 1990–91 Gulf conflict and (b) work of that unit in detecting biological warfare agents. [123219]

Mr. Spellar: The 1997 "Gulf Veterans Illnesses: A New Beginning" policy statement set out a number of commitments to help address the health concerns of Gulf Veterans. One of these commitments was to review specific incidents of suggested biological warfare exposures and the activities of 1 Field Laboratory Unit. As part of this commitment I am today publishing a paper entitled, "A Review of the Activities of the 1 Field Laboratory Unit and Suggested Biological Warfare Agency Detections During Operation Granby".

As a result of our review of the available information we assess that UK troops were not subject to attack by or exposed to biological warfare agents during the Gulf conflict. There were alarms on some detectors, many of which were recognised to be false by the system operators at the time. On one occasion, a biological substance was detected and samples returned to the UK for testing. The tests concluded that this was not caused by a biological warfare agent. Our review re-examined this incident and concludes that the evidence suggests that the detection was caused by natural biological material.

Defence Aviation Repair Agency

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what performance targets have been set for the Defence Aviation Repair Agency for 2000–01. [123220]

Mr. Spellar: Key Targets have been set for the Chief Executive of the DARA for financial year 2000–01. The targets build on the progress already made by the Agency since it formed in April 1999 and are as follows:

Key Target 1—Quantity

To achieve 95 per cent. of the agreed programme of work weighted by value.

Key Target 2—Cost

To keep within the approved full operating cost budget, within a tolerance of +1 per cent. while delivering the agreed programmes of work.

Key Target 3—Timeliness

To meet 95 per cent. of the agreed Turn-Round-Times for fixed wing and rotary aircraft within a tolerance of +5 per cent. or five working days, whichever is the greater.

Key Target 4—Quality

To achieve a customer standard index rating of 75 points or higher, made up from:

A. To achieve 98 per cent. acknowledgement of Customer Concerns within two working days—20 points.

B. To achieve 95 per cent. of Investigations and Response to Customer Concerns within 56 days or as agreed—40 points.

C. To achieve a 5 per cent. reduction from the FY99–00 baseline of DARA Attributable Customer Concerns, as a percentage of quantity—15 points.

Key Target 5—Efficiency

Efficiency 1: The development of the appropriate basis and measurement system for reporting efficiency as a Trading Fund—such as an indexed measure of the contribution of DATA to the DLO Lean Support Initiative.

Efficiency 2: To achieve a 15 per cent. increase in repayment work revenue from a FY99–00 outturn baseline.

Army Base Repair Organisation

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what performance targets have been set for the Army Base Repair Organisation for 2000–01. [123221]

Mr. Spellar: Key Targets have been set for the Chief Executive of the ABRO for financial year 2000–01. The targets build on the progress already made by the Agency since it formed in April 1993 and are as follows:

Key Target 1—Quantity

To complete 95 per cent. of all Sensitive and Significant programmes within the times agreed with the customer.

Key Target 2—Timeliness

To complete 95 per cent. of District Load tasks within the priorities agreed with the customer.

Key Target 3—Efficiency

To increase manpower utilisation by 3 per cent.

Key Target 4—Working Towards Trading Fund Status

ABRO to proceed to shadow trading by 1 April 2001.

Gulf (Reserve Forces)

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if members of the Reserve Forces who served in the Gulf are entitled to attributable pensions benefits. [123222]

Mr. Spellar: Attributable benefits for Reserve Service were introduced in 1980, and the regulations are contained in the Naval and Marine Pay and Pensions (Non-Effective Benefits and Family Pension) Order 1999, the Army Pay Warrant 1977, and the Queen's Regulations for the Royal Air Force. It has been the practice since 1980 to award attributable benefits only where members of the Reserve Forces are medically discharged from the Reserves at an end of a period of active duty. During periods of recalled service for operations, individuals in the regular reserve forces could claim benefits only if they were medically discharged at the point of demobilisation. We have now taken legal advice, which suggests that Army reservists are, under current regulations, eligible to claim attributable benefits if they are medically discharged from the reserve at any time. Our legal advisers have also identified some anomalies in the regulations for the other Services.

We therefore propose for the future that all members of the volunteer reserves and regular reserves should be eligible for attributable benefits if they are medically discharged from the reserve forces at any time for reasons attributable to reserve service. The existing anomalies in the regulations, under which reservists are treated differently depending on which Service they come from, will be removed. We shall re-examine claims from Gulf Reservists under the interpretation of the regulations we now believe to be correct. We shall also consider any new claims.

Gulf War Illnesses

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the RAND Corporation report entitled, "A Review of the Scientific Literature as it Pertains to Gulf War Illnesses, volume II: Pyridostigmine Bromide". [123223]

Mr. Spellar: The RAND report, which is a comprehensive compilation of published literature on pyridostigmine bromide (PB) and its relationship to Gulf Veterans' Illnesses (GVI), has now been carefully reviewed and a written assessment of the report has been produced. I am placing a copy of this assessment in the Library of the House.

The RAND report does not present any new work on pyridostigmine bromide. It concentrates on several hypotheses of how PB might be the cause of GVI and to a lesser extent discusses the effectiveness of PB. Although a number of theories have been identified they have not, in our view, been critically evaluated and there is no differentiation between the credibility and the value of the various pieces of research. The report gives no guidance as to which of the various hypotheses is worthy of further investigation or for the prioritisation of further research. The approach and methodology adopted for this review do not advance the debate on whether PB is possibly linked to illness in Gulf veterans.

Naval Bases and Supply Agency

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what performance targets have been set for the Naval Bases and Supply Agency for 2000–01. [123225]

Mr. Spellar: Key Targets have been set for the Chief Executive of the NBSA for financial year 2000–01. The targets build on the progress already made by the Agency since it formed in December 1996 and are as follows:

Key Target 1—Quantity and Timeliness

To provide up to 40028 Standard Berth Unit Days on demand.

Key Target 2—Timeliness, Quality and Cost

Defence Communications Services Agency

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what performance targets have been set for the Defence Communications Services Agency for 2000–01. [123224]

Mr. Spellar: Key Targets have been set for the Chief Executive of the DCSA for financial year 2000–01. The targets build on the progress made by the Agency since it formed in April 1998 and are as follows:

Key Target 1—Service Assurance (Quantity)

To achieve a mean 96 per cent. of the service performance targets in the Services Baseline Document.

Key Target 2—Service Provisioning (Timeliness)

To commission 90 per cent. of new requests for service on or before the dates agreed with customers.

Key Target 6—Efficiency

To achieve an improvement in efficiency by reducing the average unit cost of output for current DCSA products by 5 per cent. per annum.

Defence Evaluation and Research Agency

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the foreign representations that he received in respect of the DERA part sell-off and privatisation; and if he will make a statement. [122379]

Mr. Hoon: Throughout the DERA PPP process there has been substantial and widespread discussion with officials from each of our international collaborative partners. These have involved a considerable number of British officials, with meetings taking place in the UK and overseas often in the margins of bilateral and multilateral meetings. In addition, we have received written responses as part of last year's consultation process from a number of foreign companies. I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Mr. Taylor) on 10 January 2000, Official Report, column 85W, regarding details of the companies and our international collaborative partners.

Representations have focused on the need to ensure that PPP does not affect our ability to:

(a) maintain and further develop our international research programmes;

(b) ensure that security sensitive information owned by foreign governments and passed to the UK under Government-to-Government arrangements, can continue to be adequately protected; and

(c) ensure that foreign commercially sensitive intellectual property passed to the UK under Goverment-to-Government arrangements can continue to be adequately protected.

Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if it is DERA's policy to support the (a) Business Innovation Centre at Rosyth Europarc and (b) application for European funding. [122399]

Dr. Moonie: The Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) is strongly committed, through the Defence Diversification Agency (DDA), to encouraging the widest possible exploitation of defence technology in the civil sector, in line with Government policy. The DDA is implementing this policy by establishing a national network of technology diversification managers, all rooted in DERA but located in regionally based business communities, one of which is the Rosyth Europarc, to provide a technology brokering service. It is also DERA's policy to support the Europarc Business Innovation Centre's application for European funding.

Penalty Clauses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the contracts entered into with private sector companies for the provision of goods or services since May 1997 where penalty clauses were triggered for non-performance; and if he will make a statement. [122017]

Dr. Moonie: Provision of such a list would require consideration of some 6,000 contracts and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Typhoon Aircraft

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what functional modifications will be made to the Mauser 27mm cannon to be installed in the first 55 Eurofighter Typhoon aircraft to be delivered to the Royal Air Force. [121755]

Dr. Moonie: The 27mm Mauser Cannon fitted to Eurofighter will undergo a number of internal modifications affecting the ammunition feed arrangements and muzzle blast suppressor. No additional modifications are required if the gun is carried but not used.

Defence Diversification Council

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 22 March 2000, Official Report, column 566W, when he expects the Defence Diversification Council to be established; and if he will make a statement on the reasons for the delay. [122233]

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will set up the Defence Diversification Council; and if he will make a statement. [122128]

Dr. Moonie: We are currently examining the implications of the DERA Public/Private Partnership proposals for the work that is now being undertaken by the Defence Diversification Agency. Once that examination has been completed, we shall announce our proposals for the future of the Agency, including the arrangements for the establishment of the Defence Diversification Council.

Hawk Trainer

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the original estimated cost of the Hawk Trainer Replacement Airframe Programme; what is the cost expected to be on completion; what is the end date for this contract; and if he will make a statement. [122374]

Dr. Moonie: Early estimates suggested that the cost of the programme would be of the order of £160 million. A contract for the work was awarded to BAE SYSTEMS in December 1998. Details of the contract are commercially sensitive, but the value was of the order of £120 million (VAT inclusive). The programme commenced in July 1999. The first aircraft was returned to service, ahead of schedule, in April of this year. The programme is due to be completed by January 2004.

Suez Canal

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his estimate of the number of servicemen who served during the Suez Canal Zone occupation from 1951 to 1954 who are still alive. [122333]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 16 May 2000]: This information is not held centrally. The work that would be required to determine whether in fact it would be possible to provide this information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

AWE Llanishen

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what amounts of beryllium and depleted uranium are left on site at the Atomic Weapons Establishment in Llanishen Cardiff; and when he expects the site will be free from contamination. [122391]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 16 May 2000]: Although traces of beryllium and depleted uranium have been found in specific locations they are of a very low level and, being contained on the site, pose no threat to health or the environment. Precise levels of contamination are currently being collated in preparation for a contract to be let for the remediation phase of site decommissioning, and will be made public shortly. The site is expected to be free from contamination by autumn of next year.

Tomahawk Missile

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to equip the Royal Navy with the Tactical Tomahawk missile; if this will be carried by (a) Royal Navy submarines and (b) the future Type 45 destroyer; and if he will make a statement. [122111]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 17 May 2000]: No decision has yet been taken on whether the Royal Navy should procure tactical Tomahawk (TACTOM) missiles. However, a contract has been placed, through the United States Department of Defense, to undertake a joint US/UK feasibility study to evaluate the design options for torpedo tube launch of the TACTOM missile. This enabling work will allow UK options for TACTOM procurement, if required in the future, to remain open. There are currently no plans for the type 45 destroyer to have a land attack capability.

Casualty-receiving Ship

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he plans to place an order for the additional primary casualty receiving ship referred to on page 25 of the Strategic Defence Review. [122112]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 17 May 2000]: A range of procurement options are being considered to meet the requirement. Initial work suggests that we should be in a position to place a contract during 2002, and the programme to achieve this date is being developed.

BVRAAM

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will make an announcement on the preferred supplier for the BVRAAM. [122145]

Mr. Hoon: I announced on 16 May the Government's intention to procure the METEOR missile, offered by a consortium led by Matra BAe Dynamics, as the Beyond Visual Range Air-to-Air Missile for the Eurofighter aircraft. Our decision will give the RAF the most advanced air-to-air missile in the world, and will ensure that Eurofighter can combat all projected air-to-air threats well into its service life.

Conservation Document

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many copies of the document entitled "Respecting the Environment Conservation on the Defence Estate and the Role of the MOD Conservation Office" were printed; how many were distributed; where they were distributed; and what the total cost was. [122708]

Dr. Moonie: 40,000 copies of the MOD booklet, "Respecting the Environment" were printed. The cost of designing and printing the document was £11,548.33 which equates to 29 pence a copy. Over 30,000 copies have been or are being distributed via the Defence Tourer exhibition and the Army Presentation Team and directly to schools, colleges, libraries and interested members of the public. This process continues. Distribution costs are not separately identified.

Civil Servants

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants, excluding members of the senior civil service, in his Department for 1999–2000; and to what extent the pay awards were staged. [121652]

Dr. Moonie: For staff covered by the main departmental pay system, the headline settlement added 2.7 per cent. to the paybill. Together with funds released by staff turnover, staff in post received performance-related increases averaging 4.5 per cent. A further 0.2 per cent. represented restructuring costs associated with the move to a more efficient and flexible structure and was focused on the Department's lowest paid staff. The increase was not staged.

Heavy Lift Aircraft

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will make an announcement on the preferred supplier for the short-term and long-term heavy lift aircraft. [122144]

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will make a decision on his Department's participation in the A400M airbus project; and if he will make a statement. [122396]

Mr. Hoon: I announced on 16 May the Government's intention to procure 25 A400M aircraft, to be developed and produced by Airbus Military, to meet the strategic airlift needs of our Armed Forces in the medium to long term. In the interim we will meet our short term needs through lease of four C-17 aircraft from The Boeing Company. This investment in our strategic airlift capability delivers the major enhancements promised in the Strategic Defence Review and will ensure that our Armed Forces are properly equipped with the best equipment.

Cluster Bombs

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will make a statement on the (a) manufacture in the United Kingdom of, (b) use by United Kingdom armed forces of and (c) export of cluster bombs; [110169]

(2) if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which British armed forces use cluster bombs. [110170]

Mr. Spellar: Cluster bombs held by the Royal Air Force are manufactured in the UK by Hunting Engineering Ltd. Cluster bombs are an effective weapon both against armoured targets and area targets, such as a group of soft-skinned military vehicles. UK armed forces will always use the most appropriate weapons against a given target, acting within their Rules of Engagement, taking into account weapon effectiveness and the need to minimise collateral damage. Applications for the export of cluster bombs are considered on a case-by-case basis against criteria announced by the Foreign Secretary on 28 July 1997 and the EU Code of Conduct on Arms Sales.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Bowman Report

Mr. Fitzpatrick: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is his response to the recommendation in the Bowman report on the Crown Office List that there should be a comprehensive review of the present structure, jurisdiction, procedures, remedies and routes of appeal of tribunals. [123129]

Jane Kennedy: The Lord Chancellor has welcomed Sir Jeffery Bowman's recommendation. It has been 43 years since the last thorough review of tribunals. The number of tribunals has grown greatly since then. There has also been a fundamental change in the nature of, and pressures on, their work. The Lord Chancellor has therefore decided that there should be a wide ranging, independent review of tribunals.

Its terms of reference will be:

To review the delivery of justice through tribunals other than ordinary courts of law, constituted under an Act of Parliament by a Minister of the Crown or for purposes of a Minister's functions; in resolving disputes, whether between citizens and the state, or between other parties, so as to ensure that:

There are fair, timely, proportionate and effective arrangements for handling those disputes, within an effective framework for decision-making which encourages the systematic development of the area of law concerned, and which forms a coherent structure, together with the superior courts, for the delivery of administrative justice;

The administrative and practical arrangements for supporting those decision-making procedures meet the requirements of the European Convention on Human Rights for independence and impartiality;

There are adequate arrangements for improving people's knowledge and understanding of their rights and responsibilities in relation to such disputes, and that tribunals and other bodies function in a way which makes those rights and responsibilities a reality;

The arrangements for the funding and management of tribunals and other bodies by Government Departments are efficient, effective and economical; and pay due regard both to judicial independence, and to ministerial responsibility for the administration of public funds;

Performance standards for tribunals are coherent, consistent, and public; and effective measures for monitoring and enforcing those standards are established; and Tribunals overall constitute a coherent structure for the delivery of administrative justice.

The review may examine, insofar as it considers it necessary, administrative and regulatory bodies which also make judicial decisions as part of their functions.

The review will be led by Sir Andrew Leggatt, supported by Dame Valerie Strachan, and a team of expert advisers. It will operate in an open, consultative way, involving and seeking views from as wide a range of interests as possible. The Lord Chancellor has asked Sir Andrew to report to him by 31 March 2001.

Mr. Moore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the key buildings for which the Lord Chancellor's Department (a) submitted and (b) did not submit green transport plans by March. [122622]

Marriage Support

Ms Kelly: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how much the Lord Chancellor's Department has spent since 1997 on (a) marriage support funding and (b) marriage counselling services; and how many people have been helped in each year. [122600]

Jane Kennedy: Spending by the Lord Chancellor's Department on marriage and relationship support and research for the financial years since 1997 is as follows: 1997–98: £3.4 million; 1998–99: £3.0 million; 1999–2000: £3.2 million. In line with Sir Graham Hart's recommendations in his report to the Lord Chancellor on Marriage Support Funding (published in November 1999), the allocation is being increased as follows: 2000–01: £4 million; 2001–02: £4.5 million; 2002–03: £5 million.

This spending is currently provided to the central bodies of the main marriage and relationship support and research organisations towards expenses incurred in the development of training and support to local services, including the selection, training and supervision of counsellors, administrative costs and research. The Government do not directly fund the provision of counselling services. It is therefore not possible to calculate precisely how many people are helped in each year.

Open Government

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many applications for information he received under the Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information in the last parliamentary session; and how many were granted. [121855]

Jane Kennedy: I refer my right hon. Friend to the written answer given to him today by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on behalf of the Government as a whole, Official Report, columns 216–17W.

Civil Servants

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants, excluding members of the senior Civil Service, in his Department for 1999–2000; and to what extent the pay awards were staged. [121645]

Jane Kennedy: This reply covers non-industrial civil servants working in the Headquarters of the Lord Chancellor's Department and Associated Offices, the Court Service, and the Public Trust Office.

The average increase received by non-industrial civil servants who achieved a satisfactory or better performance was 4 per cent. The main increases were not staged, but they were paid with effect from 1 October 1999 rather than the normal settlement date of 1 August.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Mike Tyson

Ms Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will make a decision on Mr. Mike Tyson's application for entry clearance. [123031]

Mr. Straw: I have today informed Mr. Tyson that he will be granted entry clearance for a single visit of three weeks' duration strictly for the purpose of a boxing match in Scotland on 24 June 2000.

The decision to grant entry clearance has been taken in accordance with Rule 320(18) of the United Kingdom Immigration Rules which requires that admission will not normally be given to those with criminal convictions for relatively serious offences unless it can be justified for strong compassionate reasons, but also bearing in mind the residual discretion which I have under the Rule.

In reaching my decision, I took note of the fact that Mr. Tyson has relevant convictions for the purposes of the application of this Rule. I also noted that there are recent allegations of an assault on an employee of a nightclub in Las Vegas, but we understand this is still under investigation. And I took into account the views expressed by the public about Mr. Tyson visiting the United Kingdom.

I did not consider that there were strong compassionate reasons which would justify admission in Mr. Tyson's case for the purpose of the Rule. However, I concluded that there were other exceptional circumstances which justified his entry to the country for the purpose of participating in the boxing match. My decision took account of the following factors:

that Mr. Tyson's behaviour on his previous visit to the United Kingdom was satisfactory; that any risk to the public to which his criminal convictions and other allegations referred to above might be relevant, would be minimised by the circumstances of his proposed visit—ie his high media profile, the presence of his trainers and other supporting entourage, and the limited duration of his visit; and that a refusal to permit entry would result in a loss of economic benefit to the United Kingdom, and in particular to the areas in which engagements took place, and would not enhance the United Kingdom's standing as a venue for major sporting events.

I also took account of the fact that Rule 320(18) currently operates in an inconsistent manner in that those in the public eye whose convictions are known are more likely to be caught by its provisions.

Immigration Rules

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made on the review of paragraph 320 (18) of the Immigration Rules. [123030]

Mr. Straw: I have today published a consultation document which details the consideration given to this matter and the changes proposed. A copy of the paper has been placed in the Library. Comments on the document are invited by 20 June 2000 and should be addressed to:

Susan Wale,
European Directorate,
Room 1212 Apollo House,
36 Wellesley Road,
Croydon,
CR9 3RR.

Prison Service

Siobhain McDonagh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the results achieved by the Prison Service on each of its Key Performance Indicators in 1999–2000; and if he will make a statement. [123128]

Mr. Boateng: The Prison Service Key Performance Indicators (KPI) results for 1999–2000 are given in the table. Data are provisional and subject to validation by prisons.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department has compiled a list of postcodes to be avoided in the dispersal of asylum seekers' programmes. [120632]

Mrs. Roche: Asylum seekers who are supported by the National Asylum Support Service will be dispersed to cluster areas around the country. Our intention is to ensure that the cluster areas are suitable for asylum seekers taking into account, inter alia, the views of local authorities. In some cases, local authorities may advise that particular areas may not be suitable for asylum seekers and they may identify such areas by post-code. That information would be taken into consideration in determining whether to accept any accommodation for asylum seekers if offered in that area.

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the number of asylum seekers placed to date in bed and breakfast accommodation in Bournemouth; whom local authorities are required to notify before placing asylum seekers in such accommodation in other authority areas; and if he will make a statement. [122477]

Mrs. Roche: The information requested is not held centrally. There is no requirement under the voluntary interim scheme for one local authority to notify another before placing asylum seekers in accommodation in another local authority area. However, we have encouraged local authorities doing this to liaise with those authorities into whose areas asylum seekers are being sent.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to ensure that the Asylum Support Agency maintains the closest possible contact with local authorities in connection with the asylum seekers dispersal policy; and if he will make a statement. [122748]

Mrs. Roche: We remain in consultation with the Local Government Association (LGA) and the Association of London Government (ALG). We consult local authority consortiums about proposed accommodation providers operating in their area, giving as much information as possible about the likely locations of the accommodation that the private sector providers are likely to offer.

We notify the relevant health and education authorities that an asylum seeker (and family if applicable) have been dispersed to their area. On a weekly basis, we notify the relevant local authority consortiums.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each region in England the contracts that have been entered into between the Asylum Support Agency and providers of accommodation. [122751]

Mrs. Roche: As of 15 May, the Home Office had awarded contracts to the following accommodation providers:

Adelphi Hotels Limited, Hove, East Sussex

Angel Group Limit, London E1

Capital Accommodation (London) Limited, London N8

Clearsprings (Management) Limited, Rayleigh, Essex

Glasgow City Council (on behalf of the Scottish Regional Consortium of local authorities)

The Landmark Liverpool Limited, London W3

Roselodge Limited, Wembley, Middlesex

Shallan (UK) Limited, London NW3

South Yorkshire Housing Association Limited and Yorkshire Community Housing Association (a joint venture), Sheffield

YMCA Glasgow.

These providers—although not contractually limited to the areas in which they are operating at present—are currently supplying accommodation in the following cluster areas:

Birmingham (Adelphi)

Bradford (Angel: Clearsprings)

Gateshead (Roselodge)

Glasgow (Glasgow City Council; YMCA Glasgow)

Leeds (Angel: Clearsprings)

Liverpool (Capital: Landmark)

Manchester (Adelphi: Capital: Clearsprings)

Nelson (Adelphi: Clearsprings)

Newcastle (Angel: Roselodge)

Sheffield (Roselodge: South Yorkshire Housing Association)

Sunderland (Roselodge).

Other cluster areas will be brought on stream as the new support arrangements are rolled out.

Negotiations will also be continuing with a view to concluding further contracts with other providers to ensure that sufficient accommodation continues to be available to meet projected needs. We expect to be in a position to award further contracts shortly.

Home Detention Curfew

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners imprisoned for burglary and released on the Home Detention Curfew scheme had been convicted of a prior offence of burglary; and if he will make a statement. [122094]

Mr. Boateng: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost by requesting information from individual establishments.

Probation Service

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the level of recruitment and retention of probation officers. [122309]

Mr. Boateng: During 1999, there have been significant increases of four per cent. in the number of probation officers in post and of seven per cent. in the number of other probation service staff in post (whole-time equivalent in both cases). The increase in probation officers is due largely to more than doubling the number of trainee probation officers in the year.

Criminal Injuries Compensation

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what evidence is used by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority in judging whether a claimant's own conduct caused or contributed to the incident; [122327]

(2) what percentage of claims to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority are rejected on the grounds that the injured person's own conduct caused or contributed to the incident. [122326]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Authority advises that in the three years ending 31 March 2000, the proportion of cases refused under paragraph 13(d) of the compensation scheme, on grounds of conduct, as a percentage of total cases settled was around 5.4 per cent.

The Authority further advises that in most cases, it determines whether an applicant's conduct caused or contributed to the incident in which the applicant was injured by considering the report on the incident provided to the Authority by the police and any other relevant information the applicant may have supplied. The Authority may also consider police witness statements and interview transcripts where available. Where the incident has resulted in court proceedings, the Authority may also obtain and consider information about these proceedings and their outcome.

Sexual Offences

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the review led by his Department into the law on sexual offences will be completed and a report published. [122586]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The sex offences review has completed its work and reported to Ministers. I hope that its proposals will be published for consultation shortly.

National Family and Parenting Institute

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much has been spent on establishing the National Family and Parenting Institute; what is its estimated annual budget; and if he will make a statement on the planned impact of the Institute. [122532]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 17 May 2000]: I understand that the National Family and Parenting Institute, which is an independent charity, launched in November 1999, had the assistance of a grant from the Joseph Rowntree Foundation of £120,000. They have not published their budget for 2000–01, but they are receiving over £2 million over the next three years from central government.

Working in partnership with other professional and voluntary family support organisations, the Institute aims to be a centre of expertise, ensuring readily accessible and reliable support for families and parents.

Kosovan Refugees

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what financial support is being made available to Kosovan refugees returning from the United Kingdom to their home country; and if he will make a statement. [122727]

Mrs. Roche: The current voluntary return programme from the United Kingdom began on 26 July 1999 and will end on 25 June 2000. For humanitarian and economic reasons it was decided to give a relocation grant of 720 Deutschmarks per person (approximately £250), payable on arrival in Kosovo, to all those who chose to go back under the return programme. That grant was increased to 1,300 Deutschmarks per person (approximately £400) with effect from the flight on 5 May. Arrangements have also been made to transport larger possessions overland to Kosovo. This will enable Kosovans to take back, for example, household goods and building materials, which they have bought or been given, and which they cannot take on an aeroplane.

In order to benefit from the grant and the overland transport of goods, Kosovans must register for return by 10 June and leave the United Kingdom on one of the organised voluntary return flights by 25 June.

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what financial support is available to Kosovan refugees who have applied for asylum after the expiry of their 12 months' sanctuary in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [122730]

Mrs. Roche: Under the new support arrangements that we began phasing in on 3 April all new destitute asylum seekers who claim asylum in Scotland or Northern Ireland and additionally, since 17 April, all new asylum applicants in Kent will be supported by the National Asylum Support Service.

In all other cases, support will fall to local authorities who may provide essential living needs under the provisions of the Asylum Support (Interim Provisions) Regulations 1999.

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it is his policy to allow Kosovan refugees receiving medical treatment from the NHS to remain in the United Kingdom pending completion of treatment in cases where treatment is not available in Kosovo. [122728]

Mrs. Roche: Every request by a Kosovan to remain here longer on medical grounds will be considered carefully on its individual merits.

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy on ordering the return home of Kosovan refugees; how many Kosovan refugees have been required to return home against their will in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement. [122731]

Mrs. Roche: Kosovan Albanians who were evacuated to the United Kingdom under the Humanitarian Evacuation Programme (HEP) between 25 April and 25 June 1999 were granted 12 months' leave to enter. As agreed with United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) at the outset of the evacuation process, protection was afforded on a temporary basis only. It was made clear at the time and subsequently that the leave of the evacuated Kosovans would not be extended and that they would be expected to return to Kosovo as soon as it was safe to do so.

The UNHCR judge that it is now safe for the majority of Kosovan Albanians to return to Kosovo and this has been exemplified by the one million Kosovans who have voluntarily chosen to return since July 1999.

The Government have given every assistance to Kosovan Albanians who wish to return to Kosovo permanently by funding two voluntary assisted return programmes and giving each returning person a relocation grant. The current programme and grant will run until 25 June. If, at the end of the 12-month period, people do not choose to return voluntarily and there are no protection or other humanitarian reasons to prevent them from doing so, I regret that consideration will be given to enforcing their return. It is the Government's hope that the generosity of this country in affording protection to the Kosovan Albanians in their hour of need will not be overlooked in this way and that such action does not have to be taken.

There have been no enforced removals to Kosovo in the last 12 months.

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many refugees from Kosovo have returned home from the United Kingdom in each of the last 12 months. [122733]

Mrs. Roche: The current voluntary return programme from the United Kingdom began on 26 July 1999 and will end on 25 June. The programme is open both to those Kosovans who arrived in the United Kingdom under the Humanitarian Evacuation Programme (HEP) and to independent arrivals. As of 10 May, 1,280 Kosovans who arrived in the United Kingdom under the HEP and 370 independent arrivals had returned permanently to Kosovo under the voluntary programme. The table shows the number of Kosovans returning permanently by month since the programme started.

Month	Humanitarian evacuation programme	Independent arrivals
July 1999	148	1
August 1999	460	32
September 1999	303	115
October 1999	79	48
November 1999	60	29
December 1999	28	43
January 2000	16	26
February 2000	4	14
March 2000	35	18
April 2000	57	22
May 2000	90	22
Total	1,280	370

In addition, a further 423 Kosovans benefited from the "explore and prepare" programme which operated between 2 December 1999 and 20 April. This programme enabled heads of Kosovan Albanian households, or community leaders who wished to assess the situation in Kosovo, to visit and make the necessary preparations for the permanent return of their families or communities.

Civil Servants

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants, excluding members of the senior civil service, in his Department for 1999–2000; and to what extent the pay awards were staged. [121648]

Mr. Straw: The headline pay settlement in the core Home Office was 2 per cent. on the pay bill and, together with the additional funds from staff turnover, staff in post received performance related increases averaging 4.0 per cent. The increases were not staged. In our agencies, staff received average performance related increases as follows:

	Percentage
Forensic Science Service	3.67
Prison Service	4
United Kingdom Passport Agency	4.1

None of these awards were staged.

In the Fire Service College, pay negotiations have not been concluded and the information is therefore not yet available.

Open Government

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for information he received under the Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information in the last parliamentary session; and how many were granted. [121854]

Mr. Straw: The annual Monitoring Report on the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information contains information regarding the operation of the Code during the calendar year, including statistics on the number of requests received under the Code. These statistics are broken down by Department. (Government Departments all submit returns for inclusion in the report.) The statistics relate to the calendar year: it is not possible to break these down into parliamentary sessions.

The 1998 Monitoring Report was published in July 1999 and contains statistics for that calendar year. The total number of requests received in 1998 was 23,754, of which a total of 22,009 were granted. The breakdown of these requests into individual departments is contained in Appendix 1. Copies of the 1998 report are in the Library. I hope to be able to publish the 1999 Monitoring Report on the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information shortly.

Demonstrations

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures have been taken to ensure the protection of (a) private and (b) public property during demonstrations involving anarchist groups in (i) London and (ii) elsewhere. [122614]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Protection of property during demonstrations is an operational matter for the police service and for the owners or agencies responsible for the property.

I understand that during the recent demonstrations in London, discussions were held between the Metropolitan Police, the Royal Parks Agency and English Heritage about the best ways to protect property of public importance.

Hunting with Dogs

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from Ministers outside his Department on the issue of hunting with dogs. [122698]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Information relating to internal discussion and consultation is not disclosed under exemption 2 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to bring forward a Bill, one of whose aims would be to ban hunting wild mammals with hounds. [122749]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announced in the reply he gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) on 11 November 1999, Official Report, columns 787–88W, how the Government wished to proceed on the issue of hunting with dogs. The Government will offer reasonable time, if necessary, and drafting assistance for this issue to be considered by the House of Commons through a Private Member's Bill on a free vote.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has set the Burns inquiry a deadline for reporting; and if he will make a statement. [122750]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: In announcing the inquiry into hunting in the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) on 11 November 1999, Official Report, columns 787–88W, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary stated that the inquiry will be asked to report by late spring this year.

Police (Chorley)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the police cells at Chorley will be brought up to Health and Safety Executive approved standard. [122172]

Mr. Charles Clarke: A £300,000 refurbishment of Chorley police station is in progress, and I understand that the police station will meet all applicable health and safety standards when it is complete.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people arrested in Chorley have been detained in police cells in (a) South Ribble and (b) Skelmersdale, in the last year for which figures are available; and of those detained, how many were arrested in Chorley. [122170]

Mr. Charles Clarke: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many times in the last two years Greater Manchester police have assisted in operations in Chorley. [122173]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Officers from Greater Manchester and Lancashire collaborate on routine operations on a day-to-day basis in Chorley and this has proved very successful. There has been only one pre-planned organised collaboration in the area, Operation Coalition, involving both forces.

Back-up Custody Facilities, Leyland

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department at which police station the back-up custody suite to Leyland is located. [122171]

Mr. Charles Clarke: There are two back-up custody facilities for Leyland: Chorley is the first and Bamber Bridge the second.

Family Support

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how much was spent in each year since 1997 on the Family Support Grant; [122597]

(2) how much has been spent in each year on the Fathers Fund. [122598]

Mr. Boateng: The Family Support Grant is a new programme of funding for voluntary organisations which first became available in 1999. There is no separate Fathers Fund, but each year a theme is selected to focus on particular areas of work. In 1999, the theme was work with boys, young men and fathers. Grants first paid out in the year April 1999–2000 are available for up to three years and for 2000–2001, for up to two years. Expenditure has been as follows:

1999–2000

£1 million in total, of which £474,724 was on work with fathers;

2000–01

£3 million in total, including £663,645 on work with fathers.

Police Corruption

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the overall cost of the Lancet inquiry into alleged corruption in the Cleveland police force and breakdown the costs under their main headings; and if he will make a statement. [122701]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The cost of the Lancet inquiry to the end of April this year was £2.622 million. This can be broken down as follows:

	£ million
Cleveland officers (including salaries, overtime and travel/subsistence)	1.271
Officers from Northamptonshire, Warwickshire and West Yorkshire (including salaries, overtime and travel/subsistence)	1.169
Other costs (accommodation and office expenditure)	0.182

Young Offenders Institutions

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many inmates of young offenders institutions (a) committed and (b) attempted suicide in each year since 1977; [122747]

(2) how many cases of self-harm by inmates of young offenders institutions took place in each year since 1977. [122726]

Mr. Boateng: The information requested is given in the tables from the earliest year that records are available. Information about attempted suicides is not recorded separately, but is incorporated into figures on self-harm incidents.

Incidents of self-harm at HMP young offenders institutions 1990–91 to 1999–2000

Notes:

1. Establishments have been categorised according to their primary role. However, it should be noted that there are a number of other prisons that hold young offenders (eg male remand centres) which are not included.
2. Incidents do not equate to numbers of prisoners as an individual prisoner may self harm more than once.
3. Self harm data are derived from information provided by establishments to the Prison Health Policy Unit. These data include information on all attempted suicides.
4. Prior to 1990, data on self-harm have not been held centrally in a format which permits distinction according to type of establishment.
5. Prior to 1988, data on suicides have not been held centrally in a format which permits distinction according to type of establishment.
6. It should be noted that not all self-inflicted deaths conclude with a verdict of suicide.

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases of (a) rape and (b) assault within young offenders institutions were reported to the authorities in each year since 1997. [122725]

Mr. Boateng: The figures for the numbers of assaults of a sexual nature and other assaults in young offender institutions reported to Prison Service headquarters since April 1997 are set out in the table. Separate figures for rape and buggery are not available. Such assaults are included within the figures for assaults of a sexual nature, which also include lesser sexual offences.

Assaults in young offender institutions (YOIs)

Year	Assaults of a sexual nature	Other assaults
1997–98	17	1,016
1998–99	19	1,501
1999–2000	17	2,757

Forensic Science Service

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to reduce delays by the Forensic Processing Department in Chepstow in the processing of forensic information relating to recent burglaries in Devon and Cornwall. [122615]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand that the main involvement of the Forensic Science Service Chepstow Laboratory in these cases has been DNA analysis. The information was provided within 23 days. More generally, the average turn round time for all work in domestic burglary cases over the last six months was 34 days. This year, the Forensic Science Service aims to improve turn round times by the introduction of a classification system whereby cases identified by the customer as urgent or critical are dealt with ahead of standard case types. Further, over the next six months the number of staff is being increased by 15 per cent. to address the balance between demand and capacity in all case types.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

British Council

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the percentage increase in the number of countries in which the British Council is represented since (a) 1979 and (b) 1997, and the percentage change in real terms of the Council's grant-in-aid over the same periods. [121825]

Mr. Hain: The number of countries in which the British Council is represented increased by 38 per cent. between 1979 and 1997. During this period, the Council received a grant-in-aid from both the FCO and the DFID. The grant-in-aid from the FCO increased by 24 per cent. in real terms (from £83.9 million to £104.1 million) over this period; however, the overall increase was much smaller as the grant-in-aid funding from DFID declined by 56 per cent. in real terms over the same period.

Angola

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the Government's policy is on the UN Security Council proposal to establish an International Criminal Tribunal for Angola; and what action he is taking to pursue that policy. [122227]

Mr. Hain: There is no UN Security Council proposal to establish an International Criminal Tribunal for Angola. We do not consider that the necessary conditions exist at present for the creation of such a tribunal.

Iraq

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of the revenue from sales of Iraqi oil was allocated by the UN for humanitarian supplies to Iraq in each of the last two years. [122511]

Mr. Hain: 67 per cent. of Iraq's oil revenue is allocated to the UN "oil for food" humanitarian programme. With Iraq once again among the world's five largest oil producers, and since the passage of resolution 1284, able to export unlimited amounts of oil under this programme, a potential $10 billion will be available this year for the humanitarian programme.

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the capacity of the Iraqi oil industry to pump the quantity of oil permitted by the UN Security Council. [122504]

Mr. Hain: The passage of UN SCR 1284 in December 1999 removed the ceiling on Iraq's exports under the "oil for food" programme. Together with the recent recovery in world oil prices, this has boosted Iraq's oil exports back to—if not above—their peak historical level of around $15 billion per annum, seen only briefly in 1980. Iraq's Oil Minister has also recently announced that Iraq is planning to increase further its oil exports by about 700,000 barrels per day which would put Iraq among the world's top five oil exporters. This means that an estimated $10 billion should be available for the humanitarian programme in Iraq this year.

The Iraqi oil industry needs spare parts in order to be able to sustain this level of production. The Security Council doubled to $600 million the allocation from "oil for food" for the purchase of oil spare parts earlier this year in line with the UN Secretary-General's recommendation.

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what is the Government's policy on delaying shipments of humanitarian supplies to Iraq by the UN Sanctions Committee; [122502]

(2) what steps he is taking to help expedite those shipments of humanitarian supplies for Iraq that are being delayed by the UN Sanctions Committee. [122503]

Mr. Hain: We expedite the supply of humanitarian goods to Iraq. We take very seriously our responsibility as a member of the Sanctions Committee, and scrutinise closely all applications. The Committee plays a vital role in ensuring that Iraq does not acquire prohibited goods (such as arms and weapons of mass destruction) and that Iraq spends "oil for food" money for the benefit of the Iraqi people and not the Iraqi regime. Some contracts cannot be processed because of insufficient information: lack of end-user details, or even no description of the goods to be supplied. Others are put on hold because there are dual-use concerns or because the goods in question are not humanitarian in nature. In total, we put only a tiny percentage of "oil for foods" contracts on hold (about 1 per cent. overall).

Under Security Council resolution 1284, which Britain piloted through the Council last year, Sanctions Committee procedures for approving humanitarian contracts have been streamlined to ensure that contracts are processed even more quickly than before. The Committee now reviews all "oil for food" contracts within two (instead of five) working days, and it has agreed lists of foodstuffs, medical, agricultural and educational goods which no longer need to be referred to the Committee but simply notified to the UN Secretariat. Working procedures for an expert group to approve oil spare parts contracts more speedily have also now been agreed.

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the conclusion of former UNSCOM officials that Iraq has been disarmed of its weapons of mass destruction. [122535]

Mr. Hain: Up until its withdrawal from Iraq in December 1998, UNSCOM consistently reported to the United Nations Security Council that serious gaps remained in Iraq's declarations on chemical and biological weapons and ballistic missiles. In March 1999, the United Nations Disarmament Panel confirmed UNSCOM's analysis. We therefore believe it is essential that Iraq allows United Nations weapons inspectors to resume their work.

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the value of humanitarian supplies for Iraq on hold at the UN Sanctions Committee. [122501]

Mr. Hain: As at 31 March, 12,225 contracts under the 'Oil for Food' programme, with a value of almost $15 billion had been received by the United Nations

Sanctions Committee. Of these, 1,180, with a value of $1.7 billion had been placed on hold. The UK placed holds on only about 1 per cent. of contracts received.

The UK's policy is to expedite the supply of humanitarian goods to Iraq. We scrutinise all contracts to ensure that Iraq does not acquire prohibited goods (such as arms and weapons of mass destruction), and that it spends 'Oil for Food' money for the benefit of the Iraqi people and not the Iraqi regime. Some contracts are put on hold because there are dual-use concerns or because they lack crucial information, such as end-user details or even a description of the goods to be supplied. The vast majority of holds are released once further information or assurances about end-use are provided.

Ethiopia and Eritrea

Mr. Roy: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the present hostilities between Ethiopia and Eritrea. [122922]

Mr. Hain: In its resolution 1298(2000) adopted on 17 May, the United Nations Security Council demanded that Ethiopia and Eritrea cease all military action, withdraw military forces, and reconvene proximity talks under the auspices of the Organisation of African Unity. The Security Council imposed, in relation to those two States, a mandatory arms embargo and a ban on the provision of related technical assistance or training.

The embargo is established for twelve months. At the end of this period the Security Council will decide whether the Governments of Ethiopia and Eritrea have complied with its demands and, accordingly, whether to extend the embargo for a further period. The embargo will be terminated immediately if the Secretary-General reports that a peaceful definitive settlement has been concluded.

The United Kingdom co-sponsored this resolution, which was adopted in response to the further outbreak of hostilities between Eritrea and Ethiopia. The Security Council has noted with concern the serious humanitarian implications of the fighting for the civilian population.

The European Union imposed an arms embargo against Ethiopia and Eritrea on 15 March 1999 in response to a United Kingdom proposal, following the adoption on 10 February 1999 of UN Security Council resolution 1227, which urged all States to end all sales of arms and munitions to both countries.

Kosovo

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the security and safety situation in those areas of Kosovo to which refugees are returning from the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [122729]

Mr. Vaz: Since the withdrawal of FRY forces from Kosovo, the security situation for Kosovo Albanians has dramatically improved. UNHCR have indicated that there are now no protection concerns for the great majority of Kosovo Albanians. Over 930,000 refugees have now returned. Some refugees in the UK have made 'explore and prepare' visits funded by HMG. Their final decision on where to settle is however a matter for them.

Civil Servants

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants, excluding members of the senior civil service, in his Department for 1999–2000; and to what extent the pay awards were staged. [121646]

Mr. Hain: The headline pay settlement for Foreign and Commonwealth Office staff was 2.5 per cent. on the paybill and, together with the additional funds from staff turnover, staff in post received performance-related increases averaging 3.95 per cent. The increases were not staged.

Diamond Trade

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with his EU counterparts concerning the Diamond High Council in Antwerp. [122705]

Mr. Hain: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary discussed the issue of conflict diamonds with his Belgian counterpart in January. Officials are also in contact with the Belgian Government and the Diamond High Council on this issue. We welcome the participation of the Diamond High Council in the recent Kimberley Technical Forum on conflict diamonds which aimed to identify measures to curb the trade in conflict diamonds. The Foreign Secretary will be pressing strongly for support for such action, including the possibility of a global certification scheme for rough diamonds, at a meeting of G8 Foreign Ministers in July.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent UN report on the diamond trade in Sierra Leone. [122704]

Mr. Hain: We are not aware of any recent UN report on the diamond trade in Sierra Leone. We are however deeply concerned about the contribution of the illicit diamond trade to the conflict in Sierra Leone. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will be pressing strongly for G8 support for action on diamonds, including the possibility of a global certification scheme for rough diamonds, at a meeting of G8 Foreign Ministers in July.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with De Beers diamond company; and if De Beers have indicated the changes to their internal structures which they have made to ensure compliance with United Nations Security Council resolution 1173. [122703]

Mr. Hain: I met with De Beers in January this year and emphasised the need for the diamond industry to respond with specific measures to concerns over the trade in illicit diamonds which fuel conflict. We welcome De Beers' commitment to operate in strict compliance with United Nations Security Council resolution 1173 (1998), including through a guarantee that they will not trade in diamonds which come from any area in Africa controlled by forces rebelling against the legitimate and internationally recognised Government of the relevant country.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress he has made in persuading the United Nations Security Council to amend resolution 1173 to require all diamonds to carry a certificate of origin. [122706]

Mr. Hain: United Nations Security Council resolution 1173 (1998) deals specifically with Angola and is therefore not an appropriate means through which to pursue action to control the wider international trade in illicit diamonds. The Foreign Secretary will be pressing strongly for G8 support for action on diamonds, including the possibility of a global certification scheme for rough diamonds, at a meeting of G8 Foreign Ministers in July.

Sudan

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the UN Special Rapporteur's report on Sudan concerning the role of oil in the conflict. [122338]

Mr. Hain: We remain concerned about reports of human rights abuses associated with oil exploration in the Sudan. We regularly raise them and other human rights issues with the Government of Sudan including through the EU/Sudan dialogue. The EU made clear its concerns about human rights in the resolution it sponsored at this year's UN Commission on Human Rights.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received concerning airstrips and roads built by oil companies being used by the Government of Sudan for the purpose of bombing raids. [122341]

Mr. Hain: We are aware of reports suggesting that airstrips in the oil areas of Sudan may also have been used for military purposes.

We have made clear to the Government of Sudan our concern about aerial bombing raids and have called on them to abstain from any attacks on civilian targets.

Human Rights

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will encourage the IMF to develop a detailed audit trail for the sale of oil reserves by countries that abuse human rights; and if he will make a statement. [115721]

Mr. Andrew Smith: I have been asked to reply.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer is the UK's Governor of the IMF and is responsible for the management of UK interests at the Fund. The IMF is an International Financial Institution set up to promote a sound world financial system and broad-based economic growth through assistance to countries experiencing unsustainable external imbalances and related economic difficulties. The IMF's remit, as set out in the Articles of Agreement, emphasises that only economic conditions shall be relevant to its decisions.

The IMF's Executive Board has, in the last month, agreed to the adoption of a strengthened framework of measures to safeguard the use of Fund resources and to deter misreporting and misuse of Fund resources. A key part of this will be a requirement that all countries making use of Fund resources will be required to publish annual central bank financial statements that are independently audited in accordance with internationally accepted standards.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Civil Servants

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what was the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants, excluding members of the senior Civil Service, in his Department for 1999–2000; and to what extent the pay awards were staged. [121654]

Mr. Chris Smith: In my Department the headline pay settlement was 3.7 per cent. of the paybill. The average performance-related increase in salaries for staff below the Senior Civil Service was also 3.7 per cent. because there were no additional funds available from staff turnover. Other benefits increased the value of the settlement to 4 per cent.

In the Royal Parks Agency the headline pay settlement was 3.16 per cent. and, together with the additional funds from staff turnover, the average performance related increase in salary and allowances was 3.74 per cent.

The increases were not staged.

National Lottery

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what data he has collated on National Lottery ticket sales by (a) constituency and (b) social class. [122269]

Kate Hoey: A table showing National Lottery ticket sales by constituency for the first five years of the Lottery's operation has been placed in the Libraries of the House. (This table is reproduced in House of Commons Library Research Paper 00/24.)

The National Lottery Commission supports a social research programme on participation in the National Lottery. Report No. 1 of this programme, published in May 1999, contains data on participation by social class. Copies of this report have also been placed in the Libraries of the House.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Child Benefit

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the (a) forecast cost of introducing the Income Support supplement to Child Benefit and (b) projected number of claimant families on a year by year basis. [122611]

Angela Eagle: There is no Income Support supplement to Child Benefit. However, the above inflation increases to Child Benefit from April 1999 and April 2000 were reflected in Income Support to ensure that the families on the lowest incomes benefit from the increases. The information contained in the table shows the estimated cost and number of claimant families.

	Estimated cost (£ million)	Number of claimant families
1999–2000	80	1,230
2000–01	140	1,215
2001–02	160	1,200

Notes:

1. Figures based on Budget 2000 forecast.
2. Expenditure figures rounded to nearest million.
3. Caseload figures rounded to nearest 5,000.

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the (a) total and (b) forecast level of expenditure since 1997 on increasing Child Benefit; and in respect of how many children payments were made. [122599]

Angela Eagle: The information is in the table.

Child Benefit expenditure 1997–98 to 2001–02

	Total expenditure (£000)	Amount of total expenditure attributable to increase since 1997 (£000)	Total number of children (Thousand)	Total number of children in respect of whom payment made (Thousand)

2001–02	8,804	2,017	12,754	12,754

Notes:

1. Increased expenditure includes both Retail Prices Index and discretionary uprating.
2. Figures based on Budget 2000 forecast.

Civil Servants

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants, excluding members of the senior Civil Service, in his Department for 1999–2000; and to what extent the pay awards were staged. [121658]

Mr. Rooker: The headline pay settlement for the Department, its agencies and its non-departmental public bodies was 2.80 per cent. on the paybill. Together with the additional funds from staff turnover, staff in post received performance related increases averaging 4.46 per cent. The increases were not staged.

Stakeholder Pensions

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the target market is for stakeholder pensions; and what the definition of success in that market will be before the Stage 2 of the State Second Pension is introduced. [122592]

Mr. Rooker: Stakeholder pensions are primarily intended for moderate earners—those earning between about £10,000 and £20,000 a year—but many higher earners will also be able to take advantage of the lower charges, greater flexibility, and simpler tax regime which stakeholder pension schemes will introduce.

The Pensions Green Paper explains that we expect the new State Second Pension to become a flat-rate scheme for those on lower earnings when stakeholder pension schemes have established themselves as low-cost, value-for-money, funded second pensions.

Fraud

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people have been convicted of benefit fraud in the UK during the last 12 months. [122075]

Mr. Rooker: The number of people convicted of benefit fraud in the 12 months from April 1999 to March 2000 was 9,752. In the same period the Benefits Agency issued 5,594 cautions and 4,702 administrative penalties (Total 20,048).

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the scale of benefit fraud attributable to disability benefits and on action being taken to combat it. [121686]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 15 May 2000]: Latest figures show that 6.5 per cent. of claims to Invalid Care Allowance (ICA) and 1.5 per cent. of Disability Living Allowance (DLA) cases showed fraud.

Within the two main disability benefits—Disability Living Allowance and Attendance Allowance—securing the gateway to the benefits and dealing with some claimants' failure to report changed circumstances are crucial to cutting the level of overpayment due to fraud and error. We are seeking better sources of evidence to substantiate claims. We are also ensuring that claimants know more about the purpose of these benefits and understand their responsibilities for reporting change. We shall achieve this by making direct contact with the claimant at the start of the claim and by checking at regular intervals to ensure that entitlement remains correct.

Pensions

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the number of pensioners who will receive basic State Pension increases (a) above and (b) below 70p a week when the next uprating of pensions takes effect. [121504]

Mr. Rooker: For a pensioner to receive an increase of greater than/less than 70p in 2001–02, based on the projected rate of inflation of September 2000, they would have to be receiving a basic State Pension of greater than/less than approximately £21 per week in 2000–01. This is 31 per cent. of the full Category A rate of basic pension.

The information is in the table.

Estimates for 2001–02

Thousand

	Above 70p	Below 70p	Total
Great Britain	10,020	130	10,150
Overseas (non-frozen)	240	140	380
Total	10,250	270	10,520

Notes:

1. Estimates based on an assumed uprating in April 2001 of 3.4 per cent.
2. Figures rounded to the nearest 10,000 and may not sum as a result.
3. Estimates have been provided by the Government Actuary Department.
4. Figures do not include an estimated 480,000 frozen rate overseas cases who will not receive an increase in their basic State Pension.

HEALTH

AIDS-HIV

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health by how much life expectancy is reduced from first diagnosis on average for those suffering from AIDS and HIV. [120673]

Yvette Cooper: The information is not available in the form requested.

For those whose deaths have been reported, the average age at HIV diagnosis and AIDS diagnosis, and the average interval between diagnosis and death (ie survival) are shown in the table.

Years

	Average age at diagnosis	Average interval between diagnosis and death
For men
HIV	35.6	4.1
AIDS	38.3	1.4
For women
HIV	29.9	3.4
AIDS	32.1	1.2

Note:

Any patient whose date of death is not known has been excluded.

Source:

United Kingdom data to the end of March 2000 from the Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre, Public Health Laboratory Service.

The HIV/AIDS figures in the table do not include the contribution to survival by those diagnosed but still living and thus represent the worst-case scenario. Factors affecting survival after an HIV or AIDS diagnosis include: (i) the level of immune depletion at the time of diagnosis; (ii) the age of the patient and (iii) the availability of treatments effective in delaying disease progression.

People living with HIV and AIDS are currently benefiting from combination drug treatments that became available in the mid-1990s. These treatments are now prolonging life and have been associated with a reduction in the number of HIV-related deaths to about one-third of their previous level.

Folic Acid

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which bodies he will consult concerning the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy in relation to folic acid and the prevention of disease; and what issues the consultation will cover. [120986]

Yvette Cooper: This will be a public consultation. The consultation document will be placed in the Library, available on the Department of Health and Food Standards Agency websites (www.doh.gov.uk and www.foodstandards.gov.uk respectively), and circulated to a wide range of public health, consumer and industry interests. The consultation will cover the full range of issues relating to the fortification of flour with folic acid.

Osteoporosis

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision has been made available on the National Health Service for the percutaneous vertebroplasty operation to treat osteoporosis; and if he will make a statement. [121083]

Yvette Cooper: The percutaneous vertebroplasty operation to treat osteoporosis is an expensive and relatively new procedure, the clinical effectiveness of which remains unproven. All new technologies such as this need to be fully evaluated before they can be generally recommended.

In-vitro Fertilisation

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will publish the survey of IVF provision throughout the country undertaken by his Department. [121482]

Yvette Cooper: We hope to publish the results of the survey of in-vitro fertilisation provision shortly.

Skin Cancer

Ms Kingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what actions her Department is taking to educate the public regarding the dangers of skin cancer. [121521]

Yvette Cooper: We are taking a number of measures to educate the public regarding the dangers of skin cancer:

We are producing this summer a range of new posters and a fact sheet on sun protection which is available from Health Promotion England Customer Services, Marston Book Service, P.O. Box 269, Abingdon, Oxford OX14 4YN.

We will continue the Sun Know How website currently at: http://www.hea.org.uk/campaigns/sun-know-how/index.html while sun awareness information for schoolchildren is available on the Wired for Health website: www.wiredforhealth.gov.uk

This summer, we are continuing to fund the Meteorological Office to provide information about the Solar UV Index in forecasts tailored specifically for television and radio weather presenters.

Ultraviolet radiation can damage the skin and lead to skin cancer. Sunlight is the main source of ultraviolet radiation. The Chief Medical Officer's advice is:

Babies of all skin colours should be kept out of direct sunlight.

White skinned people (especially those whose skin burns easily) need to take great care when out in the sun. Sunburn increases the risk of skin cancer—cover up, use a sunscreen of factor 15 or more and avoid the midday sun during the summer months.

Brown skinned people have a much lower risk of sunburn in the UK but still need to take care if the sun is very strong. Cover up, seek shade and use a high factor sunscreen in hot climates.

Black skinned people are unlikely to burn and have a very low risk of skin cancer, but too much sun can cause wrinkles and premature aging for people of all skin colours.

Everybody can suffer from heat exhaustion and dehydration, so if the sun is hot drink plenty of water and moisturise dry skin.

Look out for moles that change shape or colour; become bigger, itchy or inflamed; that weep or bleed. These may be symptoms of skin cancer and should be checked.

Prostate-related Illnesses

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans the Government have to continue and develop further research into prostate-related illnesses. [121471]

Yvette Cooper: Government funding for research is provided through a number of routes. The Medical Research Council (MRC) is the main agency through which we support research on the causes and treatment of disease. The MRC receives most of its income via grant-in-aid from the office of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The Department funds research to support policy development in health and social care, and to support effective practice in the National Health Service. The Department also provides NHS support funding for research commissioned by the MRC and charities that takes place in the NHS.

Since 1997 we have committed over £800,000 to new research projects on prostate cancer, through the Medical Research Council and through the Department of Health. The Department recently announced £1 million additional new funding for urgent research studies into prostate cancer as a mark of its concern over this disease.

Following the seminar last year at No.10 a "Cancer Research Funders' Forum" has been established to help improve the co-ordination of cancer research in the United Kingdom. It is being run by the MRC and includes Departmental representatives and the major cancer research charities. At the Department's request, the Forum considered the issue of prostate cancer at its first meeting on 10 January. It agreed to set up an expert group on prostate cancer, which will identify gaps in current research and suggest ways of filling them. The expert group met for the first time on 25 February, and expects to report within months.

We have recently appointed a National Cancer Director, Professor Mike Richards, who will spearhead our concerted drive on cancer. He will work in partnership with doctors, nurses, general practitioners, other health professionals and the voluntary sector to improve prevention and modernise cancer services to help ensure equitable access to high quality cancer care. This will include a close interest in the development and progression of research.

In addition the Department is spending approximately £550,000 on research into benign prostatic hyperplasia.

Asthma

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the health risks of asthma sufferers drinking soya milk. [121760]

Yvette Cooper: It is recognised that foods such as soya can combine with other factors such as throat and chest infections, allergies to dust mites, pollens, pets, irritants such as cigarette smoke etc. to provoke or exacerbate asthmatic attacks. However, food is seldom the only factor. For those individuals who are not allergic to soya, we are not aware of any particular risks to asthma suffers of drinking soya milk.

GP Item of Service System

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he had made of the benefits of adopting the system of item of service for general practitioners. [122073]

Mr. Denham: Item of service payments to general practitioners are one of the components of the national general medical services contract. The contract is under continual review to ensure it encourages delivery of the best service to patients.

Hospital Admissions

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the average cost of a single hospital admission in (a) Bromley Health Authority and (b) North Cumbria in the last 12 months for which figures are available. [122366]

Mr. Denham: The average cost of a single hospital admission within Bromley Health Authority was £1,154, compared with £1,269 for North Cumbria Health Authority.

NHS Reform

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the budget is for the current public consultation regarding the (a) future and (b) reform of the NHS. [122140]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 15 May 2000]: The overall cost of the public consultation will depend upon the nature of the public response, but we are meeting the costs from existing resources following reprioritisation within the Department.

All staff who are working on the National Plan have either been seconded from the National Health Service or Government. The cost of producing 1,000,000 leaflets for staff is around £55,000 and of producing 12,000,000 leaflets for the public is around £200,000. Other public involvement activity, which includes the public fora and focus groups, will cost around £85,000.

The consultation will help shape the National Plan which will underpin the way in which the additional resources for the NHS over the next four years of £4.2 billion in 2000–01, £3.7 billion in 2001–02, £4.1 billion in 2002–03 and £4.4 billion in 2003–04 will be used for the modernisation of the NHS.

National Alcohol Strategy

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he intends to publish the national alcohol strategy. [122390]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 16 May 2000]: The Department plans to launch a consultation paper about a National Strategy to Tackle Alcohol Misuse in England later this year. After a sufficient period for comment the strategy will be published.

Female Circumcision

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance his Department issues to health authorities concerning the operation of the Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985. [122493]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 17 May 2000]: "Working Together to Safeguard Children" was issued to health authorities jointly by the Department of Health, the Home Office and the Department for Education and Employment in December 1999. It is also addressed to those who work in the education services, the police, social services, the probation service, and others working in contact with children. Reference to female genital mutilation highlights the importance of focusing on preventive strategies where practising populations are known to live.

Websites

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 19 April 2000, Official Report, column 518W, on websites, if he will list the sites under his responsibility, for which a company provides a technical service, free of charge, towards creating the site, and on which the company is mentioned; and if he will (a) list the company and (b) estimate the market value of this publicity for the company in each case. [122746]

Ms Stuart: No company providing a website technical service free of charge is mentioned on the Department's websites.

For National Health Service websites, the NHS 50th site was sponsored by British Telecom, and the NHS Direct Online website currently does not advertise the site development company. Both websites are accessible to all via the internet, including the NHS. The NHS Direct Online was visited by 1.5 million people on its first day of operation. Any market value of publicity for companies mentioned on these, or the numerous other NHS websites, is not held centrally, and could not be collected except at a disproportionate cost.

TB Vaccination

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his policy is on TB vaccination for young people at school. [118774]

Yvette Cooper: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) on 3 May 2000, Official Report, column 166W.

Breast Cancer

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received regarding the availability of qualified and experienced radiographers to undertake breast cancer screening. [120083]

Yvette Cooper: We are currently considering with the professional bodies the capacity and workforce of the breast screening programme, in view of the growing numbers of women eligible for breast screening as those born in the post-war years reach the age of 50.

Civil Servants

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants, excluding members of the senior Civil Service, in his Department for 1999–2000; and to what extent the pay awards were staged. [121653]

Ms Stuart: The headline pay settlement was 2.3 per cent. on the total pay bill and, together with the additional funds from staff turnover, staff in post received performance related pay increases averaging 4 per cent. The increase was not staged.

Chemotherapy

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of cancer patients have received chemotherapy as part of their treatment for each of the last five years. [122695]

Yvette Cooper: The information requested is not currently available. However, Professor Mike Richards, the National Cancer Director, and the Cancer Services Analysis Team are about to undertake a national survey of chemotherapy services. This survey will include data on the number of patients receiving chemotherapy and the volume of drugs used. The survey will be undertaken during the next six months and the results will be available by the end of the year.

Pharmacists

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representation of pharmacists there is on the NHS Modernisation Action Team. [122118]

Ms Stuart: Professor Alison Blenkinsopp of the Department of Medicine Management at Keele University is a member of the Patient Care (Empowerment) Modernisation Action Team.

Pharmacy Strategy

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will publish the Government's pharmacy strategy. [122117]

Ms Stuart: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) on 4 April 2000, Official Report, column 394W.

Health Visitors

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much has been spent on the provision of health visitors in each year since 1997; and if he will estimate how many children were seen in this period. [122558]

Yvette Cooper: The amount of expenditure on the provision of health visitors is not separable from amounts spent in other areas of the community health services. Estimates of the number of children aged under 16 seen by health visitors are contained in the table:

Number of children aged under 16 seen by health visitors

Thousand

Year	Number
1996–97	2,411
1997–98	2,358
1998–99	2,309

Source:
Department of Health return KC55 Statistics Division 2B

Over 90 per cent. of children seen by health visitors are aged 4 years or under.

Technicians

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has (1) to introduce national schemes to promote the training and recruitment of prosthetic and orthotic technicians; [122340]

(2) to restore apprenticeship schemes in the NHS for prosthetic and orthotic technicians. [122342]

Mr. Denham: The training and recruitment of prosthetic and orthotic technicians are the responsibility of local National Health Service employers.

The recently published "Review of Workforce Planning" acknowledges that there are a number of staff groups playing important roles in service delivery who currently sit outside mainstream workforce planning and funding arrangements. The review states that it is important that their training and development needs are properly identified and considered.

A National Advisory Group has begun work to determine the current profile of the orthotist and prosthetist workforce and education arrangements. The analysis will include consideration of the number, training and role of orthotic and prosthetic technicians.

Death Statistics

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many deaths were recorded in the (a) Bromley and (b) North Cumbria Health Authority area in each month for the last five years. [122367]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Pullinger to Mr. Tom Brake, dated 18 May 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent question about the number of recorded deaths in Bromley and North Cumbria Health Authority for the last five years. I have been asked to reply in the Director's absence.

The table below gives the number of deaths that occurred in Bromley and North Cumbria Health Authorities each month, for the last five years. The 1999 Health Authority boundaries have been used to give consistent areas over the last five years.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Civil Servants

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what was the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants, excluding members of the senior Civil Service, in her Department for 1999–2000; and to what extent the pay awards were staged. [121657]

Clare Short: The headline pay settlement was 2.5 per cent. on the paybill and, together with the additional funds from staff turnover, staff in post received performance-related increases averaging 4 per cent. The increases were not staged.

Green Transport

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the key buildings for which her Department (a) submitted and (b) did not submit green transport plans by March. [122618]

Mr. Foulkes: The Department for International Development has UK offices in London and East Kilbride. In line with the target set in the Integrated Transport White Paper the Green Transport Plan for the Department's London offices (94 Victoria Street, plus annexes at 20 Victoria Street and at Glen House) was completed and published before the end of March 2000. The Green Transport Plan for the East Kilbride office was completed before the end of March, but printing problems slightly delayed its publication until April 2000.

Ethiopia

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what is the value of (a) food aid and (b) other aid which her Department has provided to Ethiopia during the last month; how much she expects to provide during each of the next three months; and if she will make a statement. [120214]

Mr. Foulkes: Since January 2000 we have committed over £9.0 million of bilateral food and non-food relief for Ethiopia. Food aid so far promised this year totals over 32,000 metric tonnes (MT), of which over half has been distributed or is in the process of being distributed. In addition, we contribute about 17 per cent. of the cost of EC food aid, estimated to be some 432,000 MT in 2000. 46,665 MT of EU food has already arrived in Djibouti. Non-food inputs often form part of the food aid package and have included the provision of seeds, water tankering and capacity building.

Departmental Contracts

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment her Department makes of the human rights records of companies applying for her Department's contracts. [122146]

Mr. Foulkes: We are currently working with various bodies on ethical aspects of procurement activity. In awarding contracts, we operate within the Government's procurement policy based on value for money.

SCOTLAND

Open Government

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many applications for information he received under the Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information in the last parliamentary session; and how many were granted. [121851]

Dr. Reid: I refer my right hon. Friend to the reply given today by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, Official Report, columns 216–17W.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Index of Local Deprivation

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what weighting the geographical access to services domain has been given in the compilation of the new Index of Local Deprivation. [121576]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The consultation paper on the methodology released in December 1999 proposed that the geographical access to services domain be given a weight of 10 per cent. in the compilation of the overall index. The final weightings of the domains will be announced when the new index is published.

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on what date he plans to publish the new Index of Local Deprivation; and if he will make a statement. [121573]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Index of Local Deprivation review is on-going. The new index will be published within the next few months.

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those local authorities who have risen over 10 places in the latest Index of Local Deprivation and are now in the top 65 places. [121574]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The review of the Index of Local Deprivation is on-going. The new index will be published once it is finalised and agreed. A consultation exercise on the methodology of the new index, which included a draft index, closed in January. This draft index showed illustrative rankings of all local authorities in England if the proposals contained in the methodology document were to be adopted. The rankings in the draft index may change as a result of further data checking, further testing of the index and the outcome of the consultation.

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what percentage of those regeneration funds allocated in England and Wales on the basis of the Index of Local Deprivation were allocated to London Boroughs in 1999–2000; and if he will estimate what percentage would have been allocated to London boroughs if the new Index had been used as the key determinant of the allocation of those resources. [121575]

Ms Beverley Hughes: A number of factors determine the allocation of budgets for regeneration programmes including the total amount of resources available, national priorities and the relative needs of each region. One measure used to determine the needs of each region is the Index of Local Deprivation, which is used to inform the allocation of the Single Regeneration Budget and the New Deal for Communities.

The indicative allocations of resources to regions for all rounds of SRB have been based on the following formula: 50 per cent. according to the regions' share of 1993 population in areas with above average deprivation (based on the 1991 Index of Local Conditions score for each Local Authority district); and 50 per cent. based on the district level deprivation score, for areas with above average deprivation. The SRB is a competitive programme and the final distribution of resources in each year is dependent upon the quality of bids received for new schemes, together with the pattern of commitments from earlier SRB rounds. A national target, introduced under Round 5 of the SRB in 1998, is for 80 per cent. of new money to be allocated in the most deprived areas which, for this purpose, are taken to be the local authority district areas included in the top 50 on one or more of the four measures of deprivation in the 1998 Index of Local Deprivation. The indicative SRB regional allocation for London represented 27 per cent. of total SRB resources for 1999–2000 in England.

Thirty nine areas have been identified in England in two rounds of the New Deal for Communities programme, of which ten are based in London Boroughs. 26 per cent. of NDC funding, under the first round of the programme, was allocated to London Boroughs in 1999–2000.

The Review of the Index of Local Deprivation is still on-going. The new Index will be published once it is finalised and agreed. A consultation exercise on the methodology of the new Index, which included a draft index, closed in January. This draft index showed illustrative rankings of all local authorities in England if the proposals contained in the methodology paper were adopted. The figures contained in the draft index may change as a result of further data checking, further testing of the index and the result of the consultation.

Connexions Service

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the number of partnerships that have come together for the delivery of the Connexions Service. [122455]

Mr. Wicks: I have been asked to reply.

"The Connexions Service: prospectus and specification" which was published on 4 May, invites partners to come together in the 47 Learning and Skills Council areas to develop outline Partnership Proposals which should be submitted by 9 June.

Fibreglass Insulation

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to the answer of 3 May 2000, Official Report, column 168W, concerning the carcinogenicity of fibre glass products, what advice his Department gives to local authorities about the safest materials that should be used for house insulation; and if he will make a statement. [121967]

Mr. Meacher: The Department encourages home insulation but has made no recommendation to local authorities concerning the safest material that should be used for house insulation.

The Department issued advice to local authorities on man made mineral fibres (including fibre glass) used as house insulation last year through the publication "Asbestos and man made mineral fibres in buildings, practical guidance". The publication is also available on the DETR website (www.environment.detr.gov.uk/asbestos/guide//index.htm).

This guidance updates and replaces the advice on man made mineral fibres and loft insulation issued to local authorities in England and Wales in 1987 by the Department of the Environment and the Welsh Office.

Telecommunications Sites and Masts

Mr. Hurst: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many planning applications in England and Wales to install telecommunications masts of more than 15 metres in height were (a) granted and (b) refused in 1999. [122232]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Government do not collect this information.

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to enforce the sharing of mobile phone base station sites; and if he will make a statement. [122461]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Government's policy is firmly to encourage mast and site sharing where that is appropriate. Conditions attached to the use of powers granted to individual mobile operators by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and incorporated in their operating licences, include a requirement to investigate mast sharing before seeking to put up any new mast.

DETR Circular 4/99, "Planning for Telecommunications" makes clear our expectation that developers should provide evidence to local planning authorities that they have carefully considered the use of existing masts, buildings and other structures before seeking to erect any new mast, regardless of size. An authority may be justified in refusing prior approval or planning permission if it considers the evidence regarding the consideration of such alternative sites is not satisfactory.

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to change the planning regulations for mobile phone masts; and if he will make a statement. [122474]

Ms Beverley Hughes: In their response to the report of the Independent Expert Group on Mobile Phones, issued on 11 May 2000, the Government said that they were minded to introduce a requirement for full planning permission for all new telecommunications masts, but would need to consult widely before doing so, including on the purpose and precise scope of any new arrangements. We shall issue a consultation paper on this and related guidance as soon as practicable.

Sustainable Development Commission

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Sustainable Development Commission will hold its first meeting; and if he will make a statement. [122462]

Mr. Meacher: The Sustainable Development Commission, which will replace the UK Round Table and British Government Panel on Sustainable Development, is expected to begin work in the summer. The DETR is currently in the process of completing appointments to the Commission and hopes to make an announcement on the Chairmanship of the Commission in June. The date of the first meeting will need to be agreed with the Chair, possibly in July. It will be for the Commission to decide the frequency and timing of its meetings from that point, along with its other working arrangements.

Leasehold Residential Property

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many leasehold residential properties there are in each electoral ward in Cleethorpes constituency. [122351]

Mr. Mullin: The Survey of English Housing provides estimates of the number of leasehold dwellings in England. The Survey of English Housing cannot produce estimates for parliamentary constituencies.

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what statutory provisions govern the rights of family members to purchase the freehold of a leasehold residential property they have inherited. [122352]

Mr. Mullin: Section 7 of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 allows certain family members who were resident in a leasehold house at the time of the deceased's death to satisfy the residence test even where they would not normally do so. They must still have resided in the premises for at least three years in the last ten and meet the other conditions that normally apply. We are considering whether to extend these provisions as part of our leasehold reform package.

For flats, only half the group buying the freehold (enfranchising) need to satisfy the residence test (we propose to abolish the residence test as it applies to collective enfranchisement). Subsection 6(3)(b) of the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993 allows the residence test to be satisfied even where the tenant's previous occupation of the flat was not by right of the lease. Therefore, an individual who inherits a long lease on a flat should be able to participate in enfranchisement in the usual way. Subsection 14(5) deals with the possibility that a participating tenant might die during the enfranchisement process. Section 16 makes provision in the event of the death of the nominee purchaser.

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what guidelines his Department has issued on setting a price for the purchase of the freehold of leasehold residential properties. [122350]

Mr. Mullin: There is no set formula for deciding on the price of a freehold. The Leasehold Reform Act 1967 (as amended) sets out the basic principles to be used when deciding how much should be paid for the freehold of a house. The Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993 makes similar provision for flats.

Guidance on this point is included in our booklets "Leasehold flats: your right to buy the freehold of your building or renew your lease" and "Leasehold houses: your right to buy the freehold of your house or renew your lease". Both are available free of charge from DETR Free Literature, PO Box 236, Wetherby, LS23 7NB. This guidance is for information only—it has no legal authority.

A14

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list all casualties and accidents on the A14 involving heavy goods vehicles in the last 10 years. [122484]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 16 May 2000]: The data from 1995 to 1998 are given in the tables. The A14 has been in its present form only since 19 July 1994, when the A45 between Felixstowe and the M11 at Cambridge and the A604 between the M11 and the A6 at Kettering became the A14 and a new length of Road between the A6 and the M1 was opened. Previous data for the A14 are not comparable.

Radioactive Waste Disposal

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how he monitors the disposal of radioactive waste; what steps he takes to ensure that such waste is not used in household products; and if he will make a statement. [122335]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 16 May 2000]: The European Directive 96/29/Euratom lays down basic safety standards for the protection of the health of workers and the general public against the dangers arising from ionising radiation. The Directive makes the disposal, recycling or reuse of radioactive substances subject to prior authorisation. It also permits member states to set levels of radioactivity at which materials for disposal, recycling and reuse may be released from this requirement for prior authorisation providing that strict radiological criteria are met. This concept is known as clearance, with clearance levels setting a threshold at or below which the levels of radioactivity are small and pose a negligible radiological risk irrespective of the fate of that material. The Radioactive Substances Act (RSA 93), which implements the relevant provisions of the Directive, is administered in England and Wales by the Environment Agency.

In support of these regulatory functions, the Environment Agency commissions independent monitoring of radioactive waste disposals and their impact on the environment. Details of the monitoring programme are published annually in a report entitled "Radioactivity in the Environment: A summary and radiological assessment of the Environment Agency's monitoring programmes". Copies of the latest report, for 1997, can be found in the Library.

Transatlantic Open Skies

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement concerning the progress of the current negotiations on the Transatlantic Open Skies proposal. [122681]

Mr. Mullin: Following earlier meetings between my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and the US Secretary of Transportation, formal talks between the UK and the US on bilateral aviation issues resume on 13 June. The Government will continue to press for the liberalisation of air services between our two countries, in order to secure additional benefits for consumers, for the UK aviation industry and for the wider UK economy.

Civil Servants

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants, excluding members of the senior civil service, in his Department for 1999–2000; and to what extent the pay awards were staged. [121644]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The headline pay settlement was 2.4 per cent. on the paybill and, together with the additional funds from staff turnover, staff in post received performance-related increases averaging 4.0 per cent. The increases, payable from 1 August 1999, were not staged.

Open Government

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many applications for information he received under the Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information in the last parliamentary session; and how many were granted. [121858]

Ms Beverley Hughes: I refer my right hon. Friend to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, Official Report, columns 216–17W.

Green Transport

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the key buildings for which his Department (a) submitted and (b) did not submit green transport plans by March. [122610]

Mr. Hill: In line with the target set in the Integrated Transport White Paper for the introduction of green transport plans for key Government buildings by March 2000, we completed 50 plans covering all of DETR's key buildings:

Mobile Homes

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he plans to take in respect of the recommendation from the Park Homes Working Party regarding residential mobile home sites; and what is the timetable for such action. [122616]

Mr. Raynsford: My Department aims to publish the recommendations of the Park Homes Working Party by early July this year, with a deadline of 31 October for any comments interested individuals and bodies may wish to make. I will announce our conclusions in due course after that date.

HGVs

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will introduce a night-time ban on the movement of all heavy goods vehicles in residential areas. [122337]

Mr. Hill: Responsibility for traffic management on local roads, including the question of whether or not to introduce a night-time ban on lorries in residential areas, is entirely a matter for the local traffic authority for the area concerned.

Bushmeat (Uganda)

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received concerning the trade in bushmeat in Uganda; and if he will make a statement. [122339]

Mr. Mullin: While the Government have received no specific representations on the situation in Uganda, illegal trade in bushmeat is a growing problem in many African countries, particularly in west and central Africa. I am very pleased that a United Kingdom paper on this issue, tabled by my Department for discussion at last month's Conference of the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species (CITES), was given unanimous support. The result is the formation of a new international working group under the auspices of CITES, involving the key African countries concerned, donors such as the United Kingdom and United States, and relevant non-governmental organisations. As the issue goes beyond the strict international trade remit of CITES, the UK and Convention Secretariat are actively seeking the full participation of other international bodies such as the Convention on Biological Diversity, the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organisation and the International Tropical Timber Organisation. My Department has already made £50,000 available in the current financial year to support this initiative. I hope others will soon follow.

London Underground

Mr. Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what London Transport has spent to date on consultancy costs for the London Underground public-private partnership. [123029]

Mr. Hill: I understand from London Transport that their expenditure on external consultants from 20 March 1998 (the date the Government announced the PPP) to 31 March 2000, for work on the PPP and restructuring London Underground, was £60.3 million.

TREASURY

Research and Development

11. Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the introduction of the new tax credit for companies investing in research and development. [121381]

Mr. Timms: The new R&D tax credit was introduced in April. It will benefit 4,500 companies and support almost £1 billion of R&D per year. The enhanced relief will reduce those companies' costs for carrying out R&D by between 24 and 30 per cent., reflecting the importance the Government attach to helping small businesses succeed by reaping the benefits of our new enterprise economy.

15. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on his measures to help companies with research and development. [121386]

Mr. Timms: Our new research and development tax credit, introduced on 1 April, has been warmly welcomed since its announcement a year ago. We received representations emphasising the importance of incentives for R&D in small and medium firms, and so that is where the credit is being targeted. We have also decided, responding to representations, that the credit should be available as well to companies not yet trading. The changes we have made in response to representations have increased by 1,000 the number of firms expected to benefit from the tax credit.

Charity Taxation

12. Mr. Hope: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his policy on charity taxation. [121382]

24. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the proposals in his Budget to increase giving to charity in Britain. [121395]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Government are keen to encourage more people to give more to charity. A package of new taxation reliefs aimed at encouraging millions more individuals and companies to give every year to charities—"Getting Britain Giving"—is included in the current Finance Bill.

The reliefs go further than the Government's proposals in the review of Charity Taxation consultation document published a year ago and further than those announced by the Chancellor in his pre-Budget report in November. At every stage we have listened to the views of charities, those who represent them and donors. We now have a generous package of measures which we estimate will be worth £400 million a year to charities. It has been warmly received in all quarters.

National Changeover Plan

13. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the cost of the National Changeover Plan. [121384]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The second Outline National Changeover Plan was published in March. It showed that by the end of February 2000, the public sector as a whole had spent around £6.3 million on planning for the possibility of the UK joining the single currency, mainly in the DSS and the revenue Departments.

Without preparation, the UK would not have a practical option to join the single currency. The Government are committed to giving the British people a genuine choice.

25. Mr. Clappison: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on progress with the National Changeover Plan. [121396]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Progress on national changeover planning was reported in the Government's second Outline National Changeover Plan which was published on 9 March. Copies of the Plan are available in the Library. We are now working with our partners in the business, public and voluntary sectors to take forward the next steps set out in the Plan.

38. Miss Kirkbride: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the cost of the National Changeover Plan. [121409]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Government work with a wide range of organisations from the private, public and voluntary sectors on changeover planning. A list of the private and voluntary sector organisations involved in Working Groups is given on page 57 of the second Outline National Changeover Plan, published on 9 March.

National Insurance

14. Mr. Amess: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the effects of raising the national insurance upper earnings limit. [121385]

Dawn Primarolo: Given the substantial increases in the starting point for paying employees' National Insurance contributions this year and next, raising the upper earnings limit helps to maintain a fair base for such contributions.

18. Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many women were paying reduced rate national insurance contributions in (a) 1988 and (b) 1990. [121389]

Dawn Primarolo: Around 1,060,000 and 785,000 women respectively paid National Insurance contributions at the married womens' reduced rate in 1988 and 1990.

Exchange Rate

16. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the impact of the value of sterling against the euro on UK manufacturing. [121387]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Exporters in general are coping surprisingly well with the weakness of the euro. In the three months to February, goods exports volumes to EU countries were up more than 6 per cent on a year earlier.

Somerset House

17. Mr. Tyler: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the future occupancy of Somerset House by the Inland Revenue. [121388]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government will continue to keep the occupancy of Somerset House under review. For the time being, the Inland Revenue's occupancy provides the Somerset House trust with a substantial guaranteed source of income, which is needed for restoring and developing the site.

Competitiveness

19. Mr. Forth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect of the tax changes since May 1997 on the competitiveness of British industry. [121390]

Dawn Primarolo: Details of the Budget measures can be found in the relevant tables of the July 1997, March 1998, 1999 and 2000 Red Book. Our corporation tax rate is the lowest ever and lowest among major industrialised countries. The combination of this rate and other Budget measures have enhanced the UK tax system, providing an improved environment for UK business to compete.

Currency Speculation

20. Mr. Barnes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received recently concerning the taxation of international currency speculation. [121391]

Miss Melanie Johnson: This House had the opportunity to discuss the taxation of international currency transactions on 18 April, in the adjournment debate tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe). My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury set out the Government's view on that occasion.

In addition, the Treasury has received several letters from hon. Members, who raised the issue on behalf of their constituents, and several letters directly from members of the public.

Reserves

21. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next plans to meet the Governor of the Bank of England to discuss the value of the nation's foreign currency and precious metal reserves. [121392]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Chancellor meets the Governor of the Bank of England on a regular basis to discuss a wide range of issues.

34. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the current value of the Bank of England reserves. [121405]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Part 1 of the Treasury Press Notice, issued on the third working day of each month, provides details of UK foreign currency assets and liabilities. The latest figures were published on 4 May showing net reserves of $13,643 million (£8,764 million) at the end of April 2000. A more detailed breakdown is provided in the template published monthly on the Bank of England's website.

Expenditure Plans

22. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how he intends to use the (a) Budget surplus of 2000–01, (b) income from mobile phone licence sales and (c) Exchequer reserves. [121393]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Budget plans were set out in Budget 2000 (HC 346). Proceeds from mobile phone licence sales will be used to reduce public sector net debt. Reserves are used in line with the provisions of the Exchequer Equalisation Account Act 1979.

Mobile Phone Licences

23. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received proposing the division of moneys raised from the sale of the third generation mobile phone licences between the devolved administrations and central Government; and if he will make a statement. [121394]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Chancellor has received two representations.

Small Businesses

26. Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his plans for a tax reduction for small businesses investing in computers or e-commerce developments. [121397]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government are introducing in the Finance Bill 100 per cent. first year capital allowances for investment by small businesses in information and communications technology between 1 April 2000 and 31 March 2003. These businesses will be able to write off immediately against their taxable profits the full cost of computers, software including websites, and next generation internet-enabled mobile phones. This measure will encourage small businesses to get on line and will help make the UK the best environment in the world for e-commerce by 2002.

Advertising

27. Mr. St. Aubyn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the cost of expenditure on advertising on behalf of his Department since 1997. [121398]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The total cost of advertising by HM Treasury from April 1997 to March 2000 has been approximately £6.5 million.

Unemployment

28. Mr. Khabra: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the impact of his Department's policies on the levels of employment and unemployment in London. [121399]

Miss Melanie Johnson: In London, as in the rest of the UK, we have created a sound and credible platform of economic stability that will help us attain our objective of high and stable levels of growth and employment. Since the election, employment in London has risen by 150,000 and unemployment has fallen by 73,000.

Steel Industry

29. Mr. MacShane: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the steel industry about the value of sterling. [121400]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Government regularly meet with representatives from the steel industry. The Government understand the concerns of the manufacturing industry more generally about the value of the pound.

New Deal

30. Mr. Page: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the level of funding for the New Deal. [R] [121401]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The New Deal is being funded, for this Parliament, by the revenue received from the Windfall Tax on the excess profits of the privatised utilities. Information on the estimated allocation of the Windfall Tax receipts between different programmes is set out in Table 4.1 of the Economic and Fiscal Strategy Report of Budget 2000. Plans for future funding are being discussed in the current Spending Review.

Business Tax Reliefs

31. Dr. Palmer: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what responses he has received from business to his plans to introduce tax reliefs for large companies that invest in growing firms to generate new jobs. [121402]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government's proposals for a Corporate Venturing Scheme which provides tax incentives for corporate investment in small higher risk trading companies were subject to two rounds of consultation. Feedback from individual businesses and representative bodies endorsed our view that corporate venturing can offer real benefits to the companies concerned and the UK economy as a whole, commented on the form and detail of the scheme, and welcomed the changes made both in the pre-Budget Report and the Budget, which reflect comments made during consultation.

Disabled People

32. Mr. Miller: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to increase the financial benefits of work for disabled people and their families. [121403]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government have set aside £195 million from the receipts of the Windfall Tax specifically to assist people with disabilities. The New Deal for disabled people has been testing a range of approaches—personal advisers, innovative schemes and benefit changes—to find out what helps people return to work. To date, over 2,500 people have been helped into work by the New Deal pilots. The Government are currently developing plans for extending the New Deal for disabled people nationwide and introducing rehabilitation and retention pilots to test different ways to help disabled people move into, and remain in, work.

In October last year, the Government introduced the Disabled Person's Tax Credit (DPTC) to replace Disability Working Allowance (DWA). The new tax credit, which is intended to help people with an illness or disability to return to, or take up, work by topping up income, was more generous than DWA and changes since October have improved it further. This April, the under-11 child tax credit in the Disabled Person's Tax Credit (DPTC) was increased by £1.10 a week over and above indexation, and from June this year, the under-16 child tax credit in DPTC will be further increased by £4.35 a week. And from October 2000, a new Fast Track gateway to the Disabled Person's Tax Credit will be introduced to help people who become sick and disabled while working, remain in work.

The numbers on DPTC have increased when compared with the Disability Working Allowance (DWA). At the end of March 2000, there were 21,800 awards of DPTC, compared with 18,500 awards of DWA at the end of July 1999. The average award of DPTC at the end of March 2000 was £70 a week compared to an average £60.50 a week under DWA.

Employment (Eastern Region)

33. Dr. George Turner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the impact of his Department's policies on the levels of employment in the Eastern region since May 1997. [121404]

Miss Melanie Johnson: In the Eastern Region, as in the rest of the UK, we have created a sound and credible platform of economic stability that will help us attain our objective of high and stable levels of growth and employment. Since the election, employment in the East has risen by 126,000 and unemployment has fallen by 53,000.

Capital Gains Tax

35. Mr. Colman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from business on his decision to cut capital gains tax for long-term investments. [121406]

Dawn Primarolo: Following the 1999 pre-Budget Report, we consulted widely on our proposals to improve Capital Gains Tax business assets taper relief. The respondents to the consultation supported the direction in which we were leading. The views of business on this year's Budget proposals to use taper reform to boost productivity and increase the provision of risk capital have been overwhelmingly positive.

Save-as-you-earn Scheme

36. Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the future of the save as you earn scheme following the start of the new all-employee shareholding scheme on 6 April. [121407]

Mr. Timms: The Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in his Budget Statement that 1.7 million people now in the 'Save As You Earn' scheme will continue to enjoy its benefits.

Give-as-you-earn Scheme

37. Dr. Godman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the cost of the give-as-you-earn scheme in each year since its implementation. [121408]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 11 November 1999, Official Report, columns 779–80W. The cost of the Payroll Giving scheme since it was introduced in 1986 has been published annually in Inland Revenue Statistics. The total cost of the scheme up to April 1999 was £44 million.

Commemorative Coins

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to issue new commemorative coins in 2001. [123247]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Her Majesty the Queen has been graciously pleased to approve the Chancellor of the Exchequer's recommendation that in 2001:

a crown piece should be issued to mark the centenary of the death of Her Majesty Queen Victoria and the end of the Victorian era; and a special design should be adopted for the reverse of the two-pound coin to commemorate the centenary of Marconi's first long distance wireless transmission from Cornwall to Newfoundland.

Collector versions of the two coins will be available from the beginning of the year and the coins will also be available, later in the year, at face value from most banks and post offices.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the average net income (a) before Working Families Tax Credit but with receipt of other benefits, (b) with the addition of Working Families Tax Credit before tapering of other benefits and (c) with the addition of Working Families Tax Credit following the tapering of Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit for (i) all recipients of the Working Families Tax Credit and (ii) families earning between (1) £4,000 and £6,000 per year, (2) £6,000 and £8,000 per year, (3) £8,000 and £10,000 per year and (4) £10,000 and £12,000 per year. [122393]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 16 May 2000]: Insufficient data on income are provided by applicants for the Working Families Tax Credit to determine their net incomes including the various benefits mentioned. Also, household survey data available for analysis do not yet cover families receiving the tax credits, and sample numbers may in any case be too small for reliable estimates to be made in the detail requested.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the (a) number and (b) percentage of claimants of Working Families Tax Credit who also claim (i) Housing Benefit, (ii) Council Tax Benefit and (iii) both Housing and Council Tax Benefit. [122518]

Dawn Primarolo: The receipt of Housing Benefit (HB) and Council Tax Benefit (CTB) cannot be determined from the information processed for applications for the Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC). The receipt of WFTC can however be determined from the information processed for claims for HB and CTB, and I understand from the Department of Social Security that estimates of the numbers requested will be available towards the end of the year. Household survey data available for analysis do not yet cover families receiving WFTC.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what statistics he collates on the operation of the Working Families Tax Credit; [122516]

(2) when figures on the first six months of operation of the Working Families Tax Credit will be published. [122515]

Dawn Primarolo: Statistics on Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC) awards are published each quarter. The first tables were published on 11 April, in respect of awards current at the end of November 1999.

Up to the end of March 2000 there had been 1,030,200 awards made of the WFTC. The number of telephone calls handled by the WFTC helpline and the response line in each month to April 2000 was given in a reply to the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) on 10 May 2000, Official Report, columns 423–24W. WFTC will be covered in the operational statistics shown in the Inland Revenue Annual Report for the year ended 31 March 2000, which is due to be published in the autumn.

Capital Modernisation Fund

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the total financial value of (a) applications and (b) successful applications made by each Government Department to the Capital Modernisation Fund in each year of its operation. [121422]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 9 May 2000]: Allocations from the Capital Modernisation Fund by Department and year are listed in table 1.9 of Public Expenditure Statistical Analyses 2000–01 (Cm 4601). In line with the practice of successive Governments, applications for funding within Government are not published.

Civil Servants

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants, excluding members of the senior Civil Service, in his Department for 1999–2000; and to what extent the pay awards were staged. [121647]

Mr. Timms: The headline pay settlement for HM Treasury was 2.5 per cent. on the paybill and, together with the additional funds from staff turnover, staff in post received performance related increases averaging 4.7 per cent. The increases were not staged.

Contributions Agency

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many civil servants over the age of 60 years employed by the Contributions Agency have been required to retire following its transfer from the Benefits Agency to the Inland Revenue; and at which centres they were based. [121322]

Dawn Primarolo: Prior to the transfer of the staff and functions of the former Contributions Agency (CA) to the Inland Revenue on 1 April 1999, the CA operated a normal retirement age of 60 for all staff. As part of the transitional arrangements on moving over to this policy, extensions of service had been agreed for some staff, up to a maximum retention date of 31 July 1999.

As part of the terms and conditions package negotiated with the relevant trade unions and accepted by CA staff by way of ballot, the Revenue undertook to honour any extensions of service agreed by 31 March 1999. Thus, post transfer, any individual who had been granted an extension by that date was retained by the Revenue until the expiry of that period.

As was the case for CA, the Revenue also operated a normal retirement age of 60. The agreed terms of the negotiated package provided that, after transfer, former CA staff would be retired in line with the Revenue retirement age policy, subject to the commitment on extensions of service granted prior to 31 March 1999.

Since the transfer on 1 April 1999, the following numbers of former CA staff have been required to retire.

Tax Rates

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 5 April 2000, Official Report, column 500W, on tax rates, if he will provide illustrative examples of cases where taxes and benefits can interact to produce a marginal deduction rate of (a) 40 per cent. and above, (b) 50 per cent. and above, (c) 60 per cent. and above, (d) 70 per cent. and above, (e) 80 per cent. and above and (f) 90 per cent. and above. [120381]

Dawn Primarolo: A marginal deduction rate (MDR) measures how much of an additional pound of earnings is paid in taxes or in reduced benefit or tax credit entitlement. The table gives some examples of the combinations of income tax and National Insurance for those on income-related benefits or WFTC that give rise to marginal deduction rates of 40 per cent. or more. All the examples assume that National Insurance is payable, at the contracted-in rate.

Marginal deduction rate (per cent.)	Illustrative examples
40 to less than 50	Basic rate taxpayer on Council Tax Benefit taper
50 to less than 60	Non-taxpayer on WFTC taper
60 to less than 70	Basic rate taxpayer on WFTC taper
70 to less than 80	Basic rate taxpayer on Council Tax Benefit and WFTC tapers
80 to less than 90	Basic rate taxpayer on Housing Benefit and WFTC tapers
90 to less than 100	Basic rate taxpayer on Housing Benefit, Council Tax Benefit and WFTC tapers

Government Payment Targets

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what Government policy is on the timing of payments of their contractors and suppliers; what length of time between delivery or invoice and payment is proposed in Government guidelines; and what action is taken to monitor whether targets are met. [122522]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The timing of payments is set out in guidance to Departments and requires payment to be made promptly to contractors and suppliers in accordance with agreed terms of contract. Where no contract exists, payments should be made within 30 days of receipt of a valid invoice.

The payment performance of Government Departments is monitored annually and reported to Parliament by the Department of Trade and Industry before the summer recess.

Open Government

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many applications for information he received under the Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information in the last parliamentary session; and how many were granted. [121857]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I refer my right hon. Friend to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, Official Report, columns 216–17W.

Manufacturing

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his policies for promoting manufacturing business. [121375]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Manufacturing industry makes a vital contribution to the economy. We are helping its competitiveness by creating the right economic climate of stability, low inflation, and sound public finances and through policies which help firms to innovate, develop the skills of their workforce and grow.

Taxation

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the amounts (i) in current prices, (ii) in constant 1999–2000 prices and (iii) as percentages of personal income, taken by (a) income taxes, (b) national insurance contributions, (c) value-added tax, (d) other central Government indirect taxes, (e) the aggregate of (a) to (d), (f) average council tax payments and (g) the aggregate of (a) to (d) and (f) for (1) a single person, (2) a married couple without children, both working and (3) a married couple with two children, husband in work, wife not working, in each case at 50, 75, 100, 150 and 200 per cent. of average earnings for the financial year 1999–2000, taking account of changes announced in his Budget Statement and previously announced changes and for each of the years (w) 1996–97, (x) 1997–98, (y) 1998–99 and (z) 1999–2000. [116508]

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what average level of income he estimates a single-earner couple will receive (a) gross and (b) net in

(i) 2000–01 and (ii) 2001–02; if he will set out the method used in making this calculation; and if he will make a statement. [118850]

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what taxes he includes in his calculation of the tax burden on the average family. [121009]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 14 April and 5 May 2000]: The available information, which shows income tax (including child benefit and working families tax credit from its first full year of implementation) and national insurance contributions, at multiples of median full-time earnings of all employees is given in the table. The figures are shown in (a) current prices and (b) as percentages of income, for (i) the years 1996–97 to 2001–02 where the figures take account of all changes announced in Budgets to date. Estimating the impact of indirect taxes is imprecise as spending patterns vary widely between households with the same composition and income. The level of council tax payments will also vary depending on where families live.

The figures use median all-employee earnings. However, the data are available only since 1983. Looking over a longer time period, using male mean earnings, the series shows that as a result of personal tax and benefit measures in the last three Budgets the tax burden on a family with two children on 100 per cent. of average earnings will fall by 2001 to the lowest level since 1972.

Notes:

1. Income tax payments are calculated on the basis that the households receive no tax reliefs other than the standard allowances and only have income from employment. All earners, including wives, are assumed to pay Class 1 national insurance contributions at the contracted-in rate.
2. Earnings are taken to be the median gross weekly earnings of all full-time employees on adult rates with pay unaffected by absence. (Median earnings are more representative of the population as a whole than mean male full-time earnings.)
3. A family with two children is assumed to have both children aged under 11.
4. In line with the convention in the Tax Benefit Reference Manual, Child Benefit is treated as negative income tax.
5. Working Families Tax Credit is included from its first full year of implementation in 2000–01.
6. For the two earner family it is assumed earnings are split 60 per cent.:40 per cent.

Employment Statistics

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people in work are (a) women aged between 50 and 60 years, (b) men aged between 50 and 60 years, (c) women aged between 60 and 65 years, (d) men aged between 60 and 65 years, (e) women aged over 65 years and (f) men aged over 65 years; and what percentage are in full-time employment in each category. [122370]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Pullinger to Mr. Douglas Alexander, dated 18 May 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent question on people in employment aged over 50. I am replying in the Director's absence.

The table attached shows non-seasonally adjusted estimates from the Labour Force Survey (LFS) which is the main source of labour market data on individuals. It gives the number of men and women in work by age group and the percentage that are in full-time employment in each category in the winter (December to February) quarter of 1999/2000.

People aged 16 or over are classed in employment by the LFS if they have done at least one hour of paid work (as an employee or self-employed) in the week prior to their LFS interview or if they have a job that they are temporarily away from. People who do unpaid work in a family business and people on Government-supported training and employment programmes are also included according to the International Labour Organisation convention.

Subcontractors

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what reports have been made on subcontractors registering C154 certificates; and if he will make a statement. [122707]

Dawn Primarolo: None. In terms of checks on eligibility, I refer the hon. Member to the answers I gave to the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) on 17 April 2000, Official Report, columns 370–71W.

Compliance Costs

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how far the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise have progressed with their research on compliance costs to business of major taxes and duties; for which taxes and duties the review has been completed; if he will place the completed research in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [122517]

Dawn Primarolo: The Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise have embarked on a four year programme of research on business compliance costs. The joint programme starts in 2000–01 with separate research projects on the costs to business of dealing with VAT and Corporation Tax of non-financial companies.

The results of this research will enable the Revenue Departments to look for ways of making improvements in those areas. They will shortly be inviting expressions of interest in tendering for projects within the programme.

As the joint programme has just begun, no research has yet been completed.

VAT

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate the Treasury has made of the VAT revenue per annum from 2001 on (a) tampons, (b) menstrual towels, (c) panty liners, (d) light use continence pads and (e) heavy use continence pads. [122102]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 15 May 2000]: As a result of the 2000 Budget, from January 2001 the Government are cutting VAT on all women's sanitary protection products from 17.5 per cent. to 5 per cent.—the lowest level allowed. The VAT revenue per annum from 2001 on (a) tampons, (b) menstrual towels and (c) panty liners is estimated to be £5 million, £5 million, and negligible, respectively. Light use continence pads and heavy use continence pads are already zero-rated when supplied to incontinent people. Data on standard-rated sales of continence products are not directly available.

WALES

Green Transport

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the key buildings for which his Department (a) submitted and (b) did not submit green transport plans by March. [122560]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Wales Office is fully committed to measures such as the "greening" of official ministerial cars. Because the Department is principally located in central London, no members of staff routinely drive to work, instead relying on public transport. However, my Department is extremely small and controls only a single building which houses fewer than 50 staff. We have not therefore submitted a green transport plan.

Civil Servants

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants, excluding members of the senior civil service, in his Department for 1999–2000; and to what extent the pay awards were staged. [121656]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Wales Office staff are seconded from the National Assembly for Wales and their last pay settlement was the same as that received by Assembly staff. The headline pay settlement applicable from August 1999 was 2.5 per cent. on the pay bill and, together with the additional funds from staff turnover, staff in post received performance related increases averaging 4.2 per cent. The increases were not staged.

Open Government

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many applications for information he received under the Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information in the last parliamentary session; and how many were granted. [121860]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I refer my right hon. Friend to the answer given to him today by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, Official Report, columns 216–17W.

My Department has received no such applications during this session.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Veterinary Medicines

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the application of EU Directive 81/851/EEC to the traceability of veterinary medicines in the United Kingdom. [105197]

Ms Quin [holding answer 17 January 2000]: I apologise for the long delay in responding, the result of an administrative error.

Council Directive 81/851/EEC as amended contains provisions to assist traceability of veterinary medicinal products by way of requirements on marketing authorisation holders, wholesalers and retailers to keep detailed records of purchases and sales. Regulations to implement the requirements of the Directive in relation to retail sales by pharmacies and veterinary practices were laid before Parliament on 10 January and entered into force on 1 February.

Greyhounds

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the countries (a) from which greyhounds were imported to and (b) to which greyhounds were exported from the United Kingdom in each of the last five years and the number of greyhounds imported and exported in each case from each of those countries in each of those years. [120584]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 3 May 2000]: Figures on the import of dogs into Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland are not held by my Department.

Imports

Details of the breed of commercially traded dogs imported into the UK from other member states in accordance with Article 4A of the Rabies (Importation of Dogs, Cats and Other Mammals) Order 1974 (as amended) are not held centrally.

However, the number of greyhounds imported into England and entering quarantine from outside the British Isles during 1997, 1998 and 1999 and details of the countries they were imported from are as follows:

Country	1997	1998	1999
Australia	2	2	1
Germany	1	0	0
Israel	0	1	0
Italy	0	0	1
USA	6	3	1

Information on the number of greyhounds imported into England during the preceding two years could be provided only at disproportionate cost, as it is not computerised.

Exports

Annual figures for dog exports prior to 1997 are not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost, as they are not computerised.

Figures held on the export of dogs from the United Kingdom since 1997 are not sub-categorised by breed and it is therefore not possible to state how many were greyhounds.

Capital Modernisation Fund

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the applications made to date by his Department to the Capital Modernisation Fund giving the (a) purpose of the application, (b) intended recipients, (c) financial value and (d) outcome of each application. [120636]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 3 May 2000]: The information requested by the hon. Member is as set out:

Capital modernisation fund

Application	(a) Purpose	(b) Intended recipients	(c) Financial value (£000)	(d) Outcome

Cattle Imports

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the countries from which live cattle were imported to the United Kingdom in each of the last five years and the number of live cattle imported from each of those countries in each of those years. [120567]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 3 May 2000]: The number of live cattle imported into the United Kingdom for the period 1995–99 is shown in the following table.

Abattoirs

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the costs incurred by farmers as a result of the recent changes in the regional distribution of over-thirty-months scheme abattoir contracts. [120559]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 3 May 2000]: The award of 20 contracts for over-thirty-months scheme (OTMS) abattoir services in the UK followed a competitive tender and looked to ensure that sufficient slaughtering capacity was available having regard to the main production areas. Where abattoirs have changed, some individual farmer's costs have increased a little because their abattoir is now further away; but others have decreased.

Electronic Communications

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the savings to be gained as a result of the electronic provision of his Ministry's forms. [120566]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 3 May 2000]: Savings resulting from the electronic provision of forms will arise both in relation to the time of those farmers who choose to use electronic interactive forms and in administrative time in the Department. Projects are under way to assess the technology. The pilot for electronic submission of IACS forms in Anglia Region has already had a successful start.

Consultation Exercises

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for each formal consultation exercise solely or jointly undertaken by his Department since May 1997, what was the period allowed for submissions by the parties consulted. [121432]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 9 May 2000]: Information on the response periods for individual consultation exercises is not collected centrally and could be made available only at disproportionate cost.

BSE

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the Government's official scientific advisers are satisfied that the procedures routinely used in the production of gelatine in France are sufficient to destroy any trace of BSE infectivity in this product. [121416]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 9 May 2000]: The Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee, the Government's independent scientific advisory body on BSE, has concluded that gelatine is safe for use in food given the large reduction in theoretical infectivity in the production of gelatine from raw material from which Specified Risk Materials (SRM) are excluded. In the case of France, there are controls on SRM removal both in relation to home production and to imports of raw materials for gelatine production.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has (a) consulted and (b) been consulted by the French Minister of Agriculture over the possibility of other ways of BSE transmission. [121414]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 9 May 2000]: Extensive discussions took place between myself, the French Minister of Agriculture and the Commission at official and ministerial level about BSE-related issues. There has been a very full exchange of scientific opinion underpinning public decision making on this issue.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food from which budget the unbudgeted expenditure on the BSE inquiry has been funded. [121424]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 18 April 2000]: All costs of the BSE inquiry are met from within the existing budget of my Department and the budgets of the Department of Health, the Scottish Executive Rural and Agriculture Department, the National Assembly for Wales Agriculture Department and the Northern Ireland Department of Agriculture and Rural Development.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in what instances he would seek a review of the BSE risk status of an EU member state. [121415]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 9 May 2000]: The EU Scientific Steering Committee is nearing completion of its assessment of geographic BSE and risk in the EU and some third countries.

Regional Service Centres

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish estimates of the value of his Department's Regional Service Centres if they were sold for development. [121436]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 9 May 2000]: Were any of the Regional Service Centres to be sold, this information would be commercially sensitive. Not all of the Regional Service Centres could be sold for redevelopment because some are leasehold, some are used by other Government Departments as well as ourselves, and in some cases the local planning authority might not agree to redevelopment of sites.

Organic Food Production

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has collected about the national standards that apply in each EU member state regarding the duration of the conversion period required for land used to grow organic crops. [121430]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 9 May 2000]: Council Regulation (EEC) 2092/91 requires land used to grow organic crops to be subject to a conversion period not less than two years, or three years in the case of land used to grow perennial crops other than grass. However, the regulation permits these conversion periods to be reduced in the light of previous use of the land immediately prior to conversion. It does not specify a minimum conversion period.

As we understand the current position, six member states, including the UK, require a minimum conversion period of 12 months. The other member states permit conversion periods shorter than 12 months in exceptional cases. However, the Commission is reviewing the position with the aim of achieving a greater degree of consistency of practice between the member states.

Aid Package

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which of the components of the aid package announced on 30 March are intended to replace services discontinued as a result of the restructuring of his Department. [121428]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 9 May 2000]: None.

Armed Services (Purchase of Supplies)

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what meetings he and his Ministers or officials have had with the Ministry of Defence to discuss the purchasing of supplies for the armed services; and if those meetings were used to encourage the purchase of British agricultural produce by the Ministry of Defence. [121431]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 9 May 2000]: Ministers and officials regularly have meetings with the MOD to discuss how the proportion of UK sourced food for the armed forces can be increased.

Sheep Passports

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the introduction of sheep passports. [121417]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 9 May 2000]: There are currently no plans to introduce sheep passports.

Regional Office Closures

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the net effect on his Department's budget of the planned closure of his Department's regional offices. [121427]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 9 May 2000]: No decisions have been taken on the future of the Ministry's Regional Service Centres (RSCs) following the recent review of CAP scheme administration.

Departmental Budget

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the items in his Department's budget on which planned expenditure was reduced by over £250,000 in financial year 1999–2000 and in each of the previous three financial years. [121426]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 9 May 2000]: The information requested by the hon. Member can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Pig Farmer Demonstration

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received about the presence of the demonstration by pig farmers in Parliament Square. [121438]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 9 May 2000]: I have received a number of representations about the current state of the pig industry, some of which made reference to the demonstrations by pig farmers in Parliament Square.

Agri-environment Schemes

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what estimates he has made of the effect on Government expenditure of changes in the level of payments under each of the agri-environment schemes to fall this year and the next as a result of his Department's reassessments of income forgone by participating farmers; and what the figures are; [121419]

(2) what estimates he has made of the effect on the grants received by farmers under each of the agri-environment schemes of his Department's re-assessments of income forgone by participating farmers; [121418]

(3) what research his Department has undertaken into the effect of reductions of payments made under agri-environment schemes, with particular reference to the South Downs Environmentally Sensitive Area scheme; and what study he has made of the impact of these reductions on the take-up of such schemes; [121437]

(4) if reductions in specific payments under the South Downs environmentally sensitive area scheme are made at the discretion of his Department. [121420]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 9 May 2000]: Rates of payment to farmers participating in the Environmentally Sensitive Areas and Countryside Stewardship Schemes are governed by EU Council Regulation 1257/1999 and Commission Regulation 1750/1999. These provisions require payment rates to be calculated on the basis of income forgone, additional costs incurred, and an incentive not exceeding 20 per cent. of the income forgone. Following the review of payment rates in 11 ESAs in 1999, it is estimated the overall effect on grants to participating farmers in those ESAs would be a reduction of 1 to 2 per cent. Of the eight rates available in the South Downs ESA two were increased, two were reduced and the remainder were unchanged. It is estimated the overall effect will be a reduction of 5 per cent. compared with payments to farmers in that ESA in 1999.

I announced to the House on 7 December 1999 that Government expenditure on agri-environment schemes would increase to more than double the current level during the seven years of the England Rural Development Plan.

Salvage Meat

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the decision not to give the Food Standards Agency responsibility for the investigation into TB and salvage meat sold by his Department into the human food chain. [121440]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 9 May 2000]: No such decision has been made. It would be for the Food Standards Agency to decide whether any assessment of risks to food safety should be carried out.

European Fisheries Regulations

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consultation the European Commission have had with Her Majesty's Government on consolidation of the European regulations relating to fisheries; what steps the Government have taken to consult user and operator interests in respect of the Commission's intentions; what steps he will be taking to ensure that in such consolidation no disadvantage will accrue to United Kingdom fishing interests; and what timetable is envisaged for publication of a draft revised regulation. [121632]

Mr. Morley: There are no current proposals before the Council of Ministers to consolidate European Fisheries legislation.

In 1999 all provisions relating to Total Allowable Catches and Quotas in 2000 were, for the first time, brought together in a single regulation (Council Regulation (EC) No. 2742/1999). The industry was fully consulted on those proposals.

Currency Fluctuation (Compensation)

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received requesting monetary compensation to farmers as a result of the change in values of the pound and euro. [121765]

Ms Quin: We have received a number of representations requesting agrimonetary compensation to farmers.

CABINET OFFICE

Penalty Clauses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will list the contracts entered into with private sector companies for the provision of goods or services since May 1997 where penalty clauses were triggered for non-performance; and if she will make a statement. [122010]

Mr. Stringer: Since May 1997 a penalty clause has been triggered on one Cabinet Office contract, as follows:

Supplier: The Stationery Office Ltd.

Description: Provision of Printing Services

Reason for penalty: Late Delivery.

The Central Office of Information has had a number of instances where service credits were obtained from suppliers in respect of unsatisfactory performance or for breach of their contractual obligations. These instances are not recorded separately and the cost of extracting the information would involve incurring disproportionate costs.

Computer Viruses

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office at what precise time her Department became aware of the computer virus known as the Love Bug. [122590]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Cabinet Office became aware of this computer virus at 10:19am on Thursday 4 May 2000.

Open Government

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many applications for information she received under the Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information in the last parliamentary session; and how many were granted. [121852]

Mr. Stringer: I refer my right hon. Friend to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Official Report, columns 216–17W.

Deregulation Unit

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what system is used by the Deregulation Unit for monitoring the regulatory burden on the voluntary and charitable sectors. [122818]

Mr. Stringer: Since August 1998 this Government have insisted that Regulatory Impact Assessments are carried out whenever regulations are likely to have an impact on business, charities or the voluntary sector. Lists of Regulatory Impact Assessments that affect businesses, charities or the voluntary sector are recorded in twice yearly Command Papers which are placed in the Libraries of the House. There is no distinction made between Regulatory Impact Assessments for business and those that are purely concerned with charities and the voluntary sector.

Green Transport

Mr. Moore: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will list the key buildings for which her Department (a) submitted and (b) did not submit green transport plans by March. [122619]

Mr. Stringer: In line with the target set in the Integrated Transport White Paper for the introduction of green transport plans for Government buildings, by 31 March 2000 we had completed a plan which covered all of the buildings occupied or owned by the Cabinet Office and its agencies, as follows:

Cabinet Office

Downing street, 70 Whitehall, Great Smith street, Admiralty House, 36 Whitehall, Government Offices Great George street, 53 Parliament street, 10 Great George street, 4 Matthew Parker street, Hepburn House, Queen Anne's Chambers, Ashley House (all central London), Grosvenor House (Basingstoke), Sovereign House (Norwich), St. Clement's House (Norwich).

Agencies

Civil Service College (Sunningdale and 11 Belgrave road, London), GCDA (Ponton road, London), CCTA (Rosebery Court, Norwich), TBA (Royal Liver Building, Liverpool), PACE (Trevelyan House, London; 28 Thistle street, Edinburgh; Lawnswood Park, Leeds; West Point, Manchester; 38 George road, Birmingham; Beaufort Court, Bristol; Steel House, London), plus the CoI (Hercules House, London).

On 1 April 2000, CCTA, TBA and PACE transferred to the Office of Government Commerce, and the Civil Service College was fully integrated into the Centre for Management and Policy Studies within the Cabinet Office.

Task Forces

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what has been the total cost to the Exchequer of Government task forces since May 1997. [121383]

Mr. Stringer: I refer the hon. Member to my answer to the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) on 9 December 1999, Official Report, column 634W.

Civil Servants

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what was the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants, excluding members of the senior civil service, in her Department for 1999–2000; and to what extent the pay awards were staged. [121650]

Mr. Stringer: The headline pay settlement (excluding Agencies) was 2.5 per cent. on the paybill, together with the additional funds from staff turnover and staff in post received performance-related increases averaging 3.6 per cent. The increases were not staged.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Ministerial Statements

Mr. Burns: To ask the President of the Council what the Government's policy is on the release of the text of ministerial statements to Government backbenchers before the statement has been made, with particular reference to the oral statement on Defence procurement on 16 May 2000, Official Report, columns 149–51. [122932]

Mrs. Beckett: Ministerial statements are embargoed until the Minister has completed the statement. I have been advised that the Ministry of Defence did not release copies of the statement to Government backbenchers until my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State concluded his statement.

CABINET OFFICE

Call Centre Guidelines

Ms Coffey: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement on progress towards publishing the revised guidelines for Government call centres. [123273]

Mr. Stringer: I am publishing the revised guidance to take into account significant new sections on Staffing Issues and Procurement. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of the House and on the Information Age Government website at www.iagchampions.gov.uk.

Civil Service Guidance

Ms Coffey: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what plans the Government have to update the index to Civil Service guidance, Guidance on Guidance. [123275]

Mr. Stringer: The Government has published today the directory of Civil Service Guidance. Copies are being distributed to Departments, and have been placed in the Libraries of the House. The Directory is also available on the internet at www.cabinet-office.gov.uk/guidance.

GM Food and Crops

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office which (a) individuals and (b) organisations she met during her recent US discussions concerning GM food and crops; what was discussed; and what action she plans to take following those meetings. [122512]

Marjorie Mowlam: The Chief Scientific Adviser, Sir Robert May, and I held a series of meetings on biotechnology in Washington on 1 and 2 May. We met US Government representatives, including Dan Glickman, US Secretary of State of Agriculture; Mike McCabe, Deputy Administrator, Environmental Protection Agency; and Sharon Smith Holston, Deputy Commissioner, Food and Drug Administration. We also met congressmen Dennis Kucinich and Calvin Dooley, representatives of interested non-governmental organisations and representatives from the Biotechnology Industry Organisation, in order to hear views from across the debate. In all these meetings I made clear the UK's commitment to a science-based approach to biotechnology which protects public health and the environment, explained developments in the biotechnology debate in the UK (including reform of our regulatory system and improved food labelling), and discussed American concerns in order to build a common understanding of the ways forward. As a result, in advance of the next G8 summit, we are taking forward discussions with G8 partners and developing countries on the recommendation of the OECD conference on GM food safety in Edinburgh for an international scientific advisory panel on GM food and environmental safety.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles operated by his Department were manufactured (i) in the UK, (ii) in the EU and (iii) elsewhere. [122263]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 17 May 2000]: The Department for Culture, Media and Sport does not operate any vehicles directly but relies on the Government Car and Despatch Agency to supply official cars and drivers. The Royal Parks Agency operates 33 cars manufactured as shown in the table.

Manufactured	Cars	Commercial vehicle
In the UK	29	0
In the EU	1	0
Elsewhere	3	0

Open Government

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many applications for information he received under the Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information in the last parliamentary session; and how many were granted. [121848]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 18 May 2000]: I refer my right hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on 18 May 2000, Official Report, columns 216–17W.

English Heritage

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he expects to receive English Heritage's report on heritage policies; and what issues he expects to see covered. [123373]

Mr. Alan Howarth: I wrote to the Chairman of English Heritage on 17 May on behalf of myself and my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning, agreeing that the submission to Government of English Heritage's report on the review that it is leading of policies on the historic environment can be put back by two months to 30 November 2000. This extension acknowledges the view which has been expressed in some quarters that English Heritage requires more time to prepare public discussion papers, analyse the responses to those papers and work up its final report. The Government now intends to issue its own statement on the historic environment by mid March 2001. In addition to setting out a strategy and action programme for the immediate future, I have agreed that this first part of the review being conducted by English Heritage should extend to considering how relevant policies might be developed over the longer term. I am laying copies of my letter in the Libraries of the House.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police

Mr. Hope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to review the Police Negotiating Board and Police Advisory Board. [123375]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I have today written to the bodies represented on the Police Negotiating Board, and the Police Advisory Board for England and Wales, for comments on how we can improve the effectiveness with which these bodies carry out their functions. This is in accordance with sections 61 and 63 of the Police Act 1996, which provide that these bodies will be constituted in accordance with such arrangements, made after consultation with the relevant bodies, as appear to the Secretary of State to be satisfactory.

Hunting With Hounds

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated cost to date of the Burns Inquiry. [122830]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The approximate cost to date of the Burns Inquiry is £530,000.

HEALTH

Deafblind People

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if deafblind users of domiciliary care services were involved in the (a) steering group, (b) reference group and (c) user forum developing the draft national minimum standards for domiciliary services. [122791]

Mr. Hutton: Deafblind organisations were not represented on the two groups developing standards but an organisation representing deaf people attended the user forum held in January this year. A draft version of the standards should be available for consultation later this year. The aim of the proposed regulatory framework for home care is that standards reflect the needs of all users of personal home care services.

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the consultation document on draft national minimum standards for domiciliary services will include standards relevant specifically to deafblind people, with particular reference to essential communicator-guide and intervenor services. [122790]

Mr. Hutton: We are currently developing standards around the provision of home care, to be given force through the Care Standards Bill. We want these to reflect the needs of all users of personal home care services. Proper training and supervision for staff providing personal care will lie at the heart of the new regulatory arrangements.

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to his letter of 30 March regarding a constituent. [122935]

Mr. Denham: I replied to my hon. Friend on 18 May.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 2 May 2000, Official Report, column 44W, on hospital beds, if he will list the acute and community based beds available across Worcestershire broken down by the categories in paragraph 3.8.8 of annexe C of Sources, Notes and Definitions, Department of Health Statistical Bulletin NHS Hospital Activity Statistics. [121293]

Yvette Cooper: Bed data are not available in the format requested. Bed availability is grouped by sector rather than by individual speciality.

The request concerning acute and community beds requires classification of the trusts within Worcester health authority. Kidderminster Healthcare National Health Service Trust is not classified as acute or community but is included to complete data for Worcester health authority.

Bed availability data for Worcester HA 1998–99

Trust type	Acute	Geriatric	Mental Illness	Learning Disabilities	Maternity	Total
Acute	543	127	0	0	78	748

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Bilateral Debt

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the steps she is taking to (a) reduce and (b) cancel the bilateral debt of poor countries. [122587]

Mr. Foulkes: We have already cancelled our aid debts for all of the poorest countries, not just for countries who qualify for relief under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) Initiative. Their remaining bilateral debts to the UK are owed to the Export Credits Guarantee Department. These are being reduced under the enhanced HIPC Initiative. However, last December, it was announced that the UK will go further and provide 100 per cent. debt relief on all bilateral export credits for qualifying HIPC countries. This action will free up more resources in HIPC countries for investment in poverty reduction programmes.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Vaccine Damage Compensation

Mr. Baker: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if the Government will review the recommendation of the 1978 Royal Commission on Civil Liability and Compensation for Personal Injury on making a change in the law of tort so that parents of children who suffer brain damage following vaccination can take action for compensation on a balance of probabilities. [122912]

Mr. Lock: The Royal Commission recommended that the Government, or the local authority concerned, should be strictly liable in tort for severe damages suffered by anyone (adult or child) as a result of vaccination which has been recommended in the interests of the community. Following the work of the Commission, the Vaccine Damage Payments Scheme, which is administered by the Department of Social Security, was established in 1978. Under the scheme, one-off payments of £40,000 are made to people severely disabled by vaccination against certain diseases. The Government have no plans to make changes to the liability rules that apply to compensation claims through the courts for these cases.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Parental Leave

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the estimate of the gross cost to the Exchequer on an annual steady rate basis of paying parental leave at (a) full earnings, (b) 90 per cent., (c) 50 per cent. and (d) 30 per cent. of earnings replacement value assuming that the take up of (i) fathers is 100 per cent., and mothers is 100 per cent. and (ii) fathers is 50 per cent., and mothers is 90 per cent. [120393]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Estimates of the annual costs to the Exchequer of paid parental leave for each of these options are set out in the table.

£ million

Assume rate of payment	Case (i) Mothers 100% Fathers 100%	Case (ii) Mothers 90% Fathers 50%
Full earnings replacement	3,440	2,050
90 per cent.	3,095	1,845
50 per cent.	1,720	1,025
30 per cent.	1,035	615

Earnings replacement

The assumptions on which these calculations have been made are:

1. That the Exchequer meets the full costs of the paid parental leave.
2. That the 13 weeks of parental leave are spread evenly over the first five years of the child's life.
3. That every parent has only one child in the age group.
4. That no qualifying periods by length of service are taken into account.

Part-time Employees Regulations

Mr. Derek Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he intends to reply to the Third report from the Education and Employment Committee, Session 1999–2000, HC297, the Draft Part-time Employees (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) Regulations 2000. [122478]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 16 May 2000]: The Government's response was sent to the Clerk of the Committee on 18 May 2000.

Statutory Paid Holiday

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the cost of increasing the statutory paid holiday from three weeks to four weeks; and how many workers have benefited. [122604]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 18 May 2000]: The estimated cost of the increase in the paid annual leave entitlement to four weeks, on 23 November 1999 as required by the Working Time Directive, was £0.4 billion per annum. It is further estimated that the rise benefited 3.1 million employees. A full Regulatory Impact Assessment is held in the Library of the House.

Open Government

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many applications for information he received under the Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information in the last parliamentary session; and how many were granted. [121847]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 18 May 2000]: I refer to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department on 18 May 2000, Official Report, columns 216–17W.

Environmental Technology

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the POST report number 136, published in April, entitled "Cleaning Up? Stimulating Innovation in Environmental Technology", and what use his Department's Joint Environmental Market Unit plans to make of the report. [122815]

Ms Hewitt: I believe that the report provides a good and balanced review of the issues surrounding the importance of stimulating innovation in the field of environmental technologies. As it has only just been published, my Department, including the Joint Environmental Markets Unit, has not yet been able to discuss with others how best to take forward the recommendations in the report, but it will do so.

Wilton Research and Technical Centre

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans his Department has to provide help and support to Wilton Research and Technical Centre on Teesside. [122985]

Ms Hewitt: The Department of Trade and Industry is aware of the importance of the Wilton Centre as an integral part of the chemical cluster in the North-East. We look forward to seeing the outcome of the current consideration by the Regional Development Agency and others of its future development. My hon. Friend the Minister for Competitiveness plans to visit the Wilton Centre during a tour of Teesside on 15 June to hear more about these plans and the scope for DTI involvement.

Technology Clusters

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress made by his Ministerial Group to promote technology clusters. [122986]

Ms Hewitt: Since the Government announced its intention to review clusters policy in November 1999, it has commissioned a mapping study, to be completed by June, of existing cluster activity to inform the work of a new Clusters Policy Steering Group (CPSG) chaired by my noble Friend the Minister for Science. Membership of this group includes other Ministers, RDAs, the private sector, the CBI, TUC, academia, local government and cluster experts. The Group has an open remit to look at all aspects of cluster-related activity and recommended to Cabinet new policy initiatives intended to remove any barriers to the growth and the development of clusters. The Group will look at all cluster activity and will not concern itself exclusively with technology clusters. It will nevertheless take due account of the recommendations made by my noble Friend the Minister for Science's separate group which looked at bio-technology clusters and reported in August 1999.

PRIME MINISTER

Ministerial Code

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Prime Minister what mechanism exists for Parliament to hold to account Ministers who have breached the Ministerial Code. [120641]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 4 May 2000]: As the Ministerial Code makes clear, Ministers are accountable to Parliament for their decisions and actions. It is for Parliament to determine how it holds Ministers to account.

Mr. Norman: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on his responsibilities for ensuring the compliance of Ministers with the Ministerial Code of Conduct. [121273]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 8 May 2000]: The Ministerial Code itself sets out the responsibilities of individual Ministers and of the Prime Minister.

Ministers (Trade Union Financial Support)

Mr. Norman: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the Ministers who are in receipt of financial support from a trade union, indicating the nature of that support. [121209]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 8 May 2000]: The information requested is not held centrally. There is no requirement for Ministers to inform me of the handling of their private interests.

Mr. Norman: To ask the Prime Minister (1) which Minister in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions has been invited to reply to the letter sent to him on 5 April by the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells concerning the Ministerial Code; and when a reply will be sent; [121201]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 4 April 2000, Official Report, column 390W, on correspondence, (a) whether the advice from the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards has been received and (b) when the letter to him of 13 March from the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells will receive a reply. [121212]

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister what representations he has received from the European Federation of Retired and Elderly Persons on (a) the forthcoming Intergovernmental Conference and (b) developments in European Union policy since 1997. [121502]

The Prime Minister: The Government are in regular contact with a wide range of non-governmental organisations on European issues. I last received representations from the European Federation of Retired and Elderly Persons in a letter of 28 February on the IGC.

DEFENCE

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the annual running costs of HMS Fearless and HMS Intrepid. [121702]

Mr. Spellar: The average annual running costs for HMS Fearless and HMS Intrepid (in her present standby role) are approximately £24.66 million and £2.61 million respectively. This includes repairs and maintenance, manpower, fuel and other costs (such as port and harbour dues) where applicable.

Type 45 Destroyers

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when and where the first two Type 45 destroyers will commence construction; and what will be their in-service dates. [122465]

Dr. Moonie: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Robert Walmsley to Mr. Robert Key, dated 19 May 2000:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence about the first two Type 45 destroyers. This matter falls to me to answer within my area of responsibility as Chief of Defence Procurement and Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency.

As you are aware, the contract to complete Preparation for Demonstration (PFD) for the Type 45 was placed with Marconi Electronic System (MES, now BAE SYSTEMS) on 23 November 1999. BAE SYSTEMS was also appointed as the Prime Contractor for the Type 45 Programme. We are keen to ensure that we retain our ability to conduct effective competition for follow-on Type 45 destroyers. To this end, both BAE SYSTEMS Marine (YSL) Ltd and Vosper Thornycroft are involved in the PFD contract so that, from the outset, we have a design that has evolved with the active participation of both yards, enabling the efficient construction of Type 45s at either yard.

It is currently planned to place the Demonstration and First-of-Class Manufacture (DFM) contract with the Prime Contractor later this year, to meet an in-service date for the first-of-class ship of 2007. The detailed contractual arrangements for the DFM contract remain under consideration with the Prime Contractor but out plans are that the first of class is assembled and launched at the BAE SYSTEMS Marine (YSL) yard on the Clyde. The timing of the contract for the second ship of the class and where it will be built are still under consideration but value for money will be the key factor.

Advanced Amphibious Assault Vehicle

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for the development of an advanced amphibious assault vehicle; and if he will make a statement. [122377]

Dr. Moonie: While we continue to keep our amphibious requirements under review, we have no plans at present to develop an advanced amphibious assault vehicle capability.

Rapier Contract

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the (a) timescale for the delivery and (b) total cost of the contract for the support system for the Rapier FS132 surface-to-air missile system; if the contract was for a fixed price; and if he will make a statement. [122376]

Dr. Moonie: The Rapier FSB2 surface-to-air missile system came into service in 1988. A contract for the support of the Rapier FSB2 system was signed with Matra British Aerospace (MBD) on 1 April 2000. Under the contract MBD will assume responsibility from MOD for the management, storage, repair and distribution of Rapier FSB2 spares until 2006–07 when the FSB2 goes out of service. The transfer of responsibility will take 12 months as the new arrangements are put in place. The contract was let for a maximum price of approximately £24 million (including VAT) and includes an incentive arrangement whereby any savings made by MBD are shared with MOD.

Armed Services (Egg Suppliers)

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 10 May 2000, Official Report, column 390W, if the eggs referred to as being of British origin were laid in the United Kingdom. [122741]

Dr. Moonie: Yes.

Asbestos (Millbay Dock)

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what compensation has been given to civilian dockyard workers for work-related asbestosis at Millbay Dock, Plymouth, in the last 10 years. [122693]

Dr. Moonie: No work-related compensation has been paid by the Ministry of Defence in respect of workers at Millbay Docks, Plymouth, as these Docks are not, and never have been, the responsibility of the Ministry of Defence or the Royal Navy.

Operation Danish Bacon

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the Government's policy on Operation Danish Bacon; and if he will make a statement. [122700]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 18 May 2000]: UK participation in Surgical Training Exercises in Denmark was suspended in 1998 and an internal review of MOD surgical training methods was set in hand. As a result of that review, an independent study by eminent representatives from appropriate fields was commissioned. They investigated the suitability and effectiveness of other training methods and witnessed a complete Surgical Training Exercise. The study team were satisfied that the treatment of the animals was entirely humane and appropriate steps were taken to avoid suffering during all phases of the exercises. They could identify no equally effective alternative to the use of live animal models in order to prepare our surgical teams for the treatment of trauma under battlefield conditions. They concluded that to ensure the best possible treatment for injured Service personnel and civilians during conflict, it is entirely appropriate and necessary for our military surgical teams to resume participation in the Surgical Training Exercises. On the basis of this advice, we have decided that UK participation in the Danish Surgical Training Exercises should resume when we are invited.

Open Government

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many applications for information he received under the Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information in the last parliamentary session; and how many were granted. [121850]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 18 May 2000]: I refer my right hon. Friend to the answer given to him on 18 May 2000, Official Report, columns 216–17W by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Pay and Personnel Agency

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what performance targets have been set for the Pay and Personnel Agency for 2000–01. [123431]

Dr. Moonie: The Chief Executive of the Pay and Personnel Agency (PPA) is responsible for providing pay and personnel information services for the Ministry of Defence as defined in the agency framework document. During 2000–01 the PPA will be set the following challenging key performance targets:

1. To make 100 per cent. of all payments to staff by the due date (excluding late payments caused by invalid claims or late notification outside the control of the Agency).
2. To keep error rates within the following limits:

   6 per 1,000 payments of weekly industrial pay

   6 per 1,000 payments of monthly non-industrial pay

   20 per 1,000 awards of pension

   15 per 1,000 payments of expenses
3. By 31 March 2001 to demonstrate a 3 per cent. increase in customer satisfaction.
4. To meet the Department's requirement for implementing agreed pay and grading changes.
5. By 31 March 2001 to complete training of 100 per cent. of all staff in leadership or change management or customer service as appropriate.
6. To establish "centre of excellence" operations for pensions administration by 31 March 2001.
7. To deliver the financial objectives resulting from the PPA Efficiency Review and included in the Agency's service level agreement with the owner.

Procurement (Fraud)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the Government's policy is on identifying fraud in procurement contracts; what safeguards exist to protect against fraud; and what steps have been taken as part of the Smart Procurement initiative to combat fraud. [122754]

Dr. Moonie: The MOD adopts a 'zero tolerance' policy on all types of fraud and following Treasury guidance seeks to reduce risk, including that applying to procurement contracts, through effective controls and prompt investigation. Safeguards created to deter procurement fraud, including collusion and corruption, cover separation of duties, rotation of staff, hospitality books and quality checks. Good procurement practices are employed, such as effective competition, avoidance where possible of single source 'cost plus' arrangements, providing clear specifications, avoiding changes to requirement after contract award and authorising payment only when requirements have been met. These safeguards also naturally apply to the Smart Procurement process during the introduction of which the amount of fraud awareness training to procurement staff increased. Moreover, full guidance on fraud deterrence and detection is now available to all procurement staff on internal electronic mail systems as part of a Project Manager's toolkit. These specialist aspects of the procurement process are part of a wider range of fraud deterrence initiatives already in place or about to be introduced, including the creation in February 1999 of a Defence Fraud Analysis Unit. This unit now acts as the focus for MOD fraud matters including the promotion of risk awareness and uses the latest data mining and fraud detection techniques in a proactive response to fraud risk.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions in the past five years his Department has investigated allegations of fraud in procurement contracts; on how many occasions allegations were upheld; and on how many occasions prosecution followed, indicating in each case the contract and project concerned. [122755]

Dr. Moonie: I will write to the right hon. and learned Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Heavy Airlift Capability

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the (a) armoured vehicles and (b) helicopters (i) in service and (ii) shortly to enter service in the armed forces which (A) the C17 can carry, (B) the A400M can carry, (C) the C130J can carry and (D) none of the above can carry; and in the case of helicopters if he will specify in each case whether carriage requires partial dismantling. [122914]

Dr. Moonie: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the Airbus A400M is the preferred supplier for the long-term strategic heavy lift aircraft. [122933]

Mr. Hoon: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement I made to the House on Tuesday 16 May in which I announced the Government's intention to procure 25 A400M aircraft, to be developed and produced by Airbus Military Company, to meet the strategic airlift needs of our armed forces in the medium to long-term.

Strategic Export Controls

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will ensure that, for future years, the Annual Report on Strategic Export Controls includes full information on the number and type of weapons exported. [121925]

Mr. Hain: I have been asked to reply.

We are considering the content and format of future Annual Reports in the light of comments on the first two Reports, in particular the joint Report by the Defence, Foreign Affairs, International Development and Trade and Industry Committees, to which the Government will respond as soon as possible.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Departmental Initiatives

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list for each (a) area-based and (b) other regeneration-related initiative for which his Department is responsible (i) the amount budgeted and (ii) the total expended in each financial year for the planned lifetime of each initiative. [119792]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 20 April 2000]: The Department's aim is > to give everyone the chance, through education, training and work to realise their full potential and thus build an inclusive and fair society and a competitive economy.

To achieve that, programmes must reach and impact effectively on people who are suffering from disadvantage. While not directly focused on regenerating deprived areas, DfEE initiatives offer crucial support for those individuals most affected by deprivation. The steps which the Department is taking to widen participation in learning, particularly targeting those who traditionally drop out or have low levels of achievement, will also contribute to the regeneration of local areas. These include Excellence in Cities, piloting Education Maintenance Allowances and introducing the Connexions Service. In addition a substantial proportion of New Deal For Schools funding benefits schools in disadvantaged areas. We have also made available £16 million for improving the quality and developing the range of adult basic skills provision in 1999–2000 and 2000–01.

The table includes sums already expended and planned budgets for the current and next financial years for those initiatives which could most easily be described as (a) area-based, and (b) regeneration-related. Planned budgets may change and expenditure plans beyond March 2002 will be determined by the current spending review.

[1] Sure Start is a cross-departmental programme, which is overseen by a steering group involving Ministers from the Departments of Education and Employment, Health, Social Security, Environment, Transport and the Regions, Culture, Media and Sport and the Home Office, the Lord Chancellor's Department and the Treasury.
[2] Spending in the first year was lower than originally planned; the underspend will be carried forward and used to meet the costs of programme activity in future years.
[3] The final figure for the third year of this initiative is dependent on the Year 2000 Review.
[4] To be decided in the light of the phased introduction of the Connexions Service which will build on the New Start partnership working from April 2001.
[5] These figures do not include a total of £12.75 million from the Windfall Tax which has been made available as start-up funding for the programme in England over the lifetime of this Parliament.
[6] This figure includes £3.27 million on Laptop Programme for Adult and Community Learning Tutors.
[7] These are total funding figures. A substantial proportion is spent in schools serving disadvantaged areas.

School Budget Deficits

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what estimate he has made of the number of schools that are operating with a budget deficit; [122719]

(2) what assessment he has made of the main causes of budget deficit within schools; [122720]

Ms Estelle Morris: Returns received from 145 of the 150 Local Education Authorities in England show that of 21,542 schools in those Authorities, 2,470 schools reported a budget deficit at 31 March 1999, leaving 19,072 without deficit. At 31 March 1998, schools in deficit numbered 2,753.

While it is not possible to give a definitive answer on the cause of deficits, it is clear that historic underfunding has led schools to attempt to protect services in the anticipation of the kind of improved funding which is in evidence in the current financial year.

Green Transport

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the key buildings for which his Department (a) submitted and (b) did not submit green transport plans by March. [122620]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 18 May 2000]: By the end of March 2000, Effective Travel Plans had been submitted for all the Department's main buildings.

Learning and Skills Council

Mr. Pound: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on his plans for the location of the local arm of the Learning and Skills Council in West London. [123402]

Mr. Wicks: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has decided that the local arm of the West London Learning and Skills Council (LSC) should initially be located in Hounslow. In taking this decision he has taken into account the suitability and availability of premises in other West London locations as well as the need to get best value for money. My noble Friend the Minister of State has written to the hon. Members whose constituencies are in West London, and copies of the letter have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Middlefield Primary School

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what weaknesses were found by the Ofsted inspection agency in the Ofsted inspection carried out at Middlefield primary school; and if a teacher was criticised during the inspection in front of pupils. [122936]

Ms Estelle Morris: These are matters for Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools, Chris Woodhead, and I am satisfied that they have been fully investigated by Ofsted. I have asked the Chief Inspector to write to my hon. Friend and to place a copy of his letter in the Library.

Holocaust Education Day

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what action he is taking to encourage schools and local education authorities to participate in the Holocaust Education Day in January 2001. [122835]

Jacqui Smith: We are contributing fully to the Government's general programme of support for Holocaust Memorial Day, on 27 January. We are working with a range of organisations involved in holocaust education to develop educational materials for schools, youth and community groups and local education authorities. In June this year we will issue a resource pack for schools which will show how holocaust education can be built into the programmes of study for History at Key Stage 3 and identify connections with other areas of the curriculum, including Citizenship. We will also encourage schools to hold special events, for example, special school assemblies, poetry readings, workshops and seminars.

TREASURY

Poverty (Children)

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his speech to the Child Poverty Action Group on 15 May, if he will disaggregate the £7 billion additional spending in 2001 relative to 1997 on children's financial support. [122983]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer my right hon. Friend to Chart 5.2 in the March 2000 Economic and Fiscal Strategy Report, HC 346.

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what basis he made the statement that many poorer families are now £50 per week better off in his recent speech to the Child Poverty Action Group. [122836]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer my right hon. Friend to paragraph 1.31 of the EFSR which stated that "By 2001, when personal tax and benefit changes measures from this and previous Budgets have come into effect—a single-earner family with two children earning £12,500 a year will be £2,600 a year or £50 a week better off".

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out the measurement he used to determine which children live in poverty when he described Government policies as having taken more than one million children out of poverty in his speech to the Child Poverty Action Group on 15 May. [122981]

Dawn Primarolo: The estimate that 1.2 million children will be lifted out of poverty is based upon the number of children in low-income families who will no longer be living in households below 60 per cent. of median income after the combined effect of the personal tax and benefit changes announced in the four Budgets since May 1997. The calculation includes those households classified as self-employed and measures income after allowing for housing costs, as explained in Box 5.1 of the March 2000 Economic and Fiscal Strategy Report, HC 346. Consistent with the indicators chosen in "Opportunity for all", Box 5.1 also presents estimates of the number of children lifted above a number of low-income thresholds.

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out the basis of the calculation made in his speech to the Child Poverty Action Group on 15 May that the poorest 20 per cent. of families receive 50 per cent. of the additional £7 billion per year spent on children's financial support. [122982]

Dawn Primarolo: This calculation is based on analysis of the distributional impact of the main children's measures announced by the Government. The analysis is consistent with the chart in Box 5.1 of the EFSR. The measures included are the introduction of and increases in the Working Families Tax Credit, increases in Child Benefit and the child premia in income-related benefits, and the new Children's Tax Credit. The estimates are based on data from the Family Expenditure Surveys from 1996–98 uprated to estimated 2000–01 levels of prices and earnings.

VAT (Disability)

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what plans he has to review the composite rate of VAT on equipment supplied to the visually impaired; [122937]

(2) when he expects to report on the review of VAT in relation to disability equipment; [R] [122931]

(3) what regional variations exist in the application of VAT to disability equipment. [122938]

Dawn Primarolo: Customs and Excise have looked at the application of the composite rate of VAT on equipment supplied to the visually impaired, but there are no plans to change this concession. There has been no broader review of VAT relief on disability equipment.

Customs are unaware of regional variations in the application of VAT to disability equipment, but would be glad to look into this if cases are drawn to their attention.

Working Families Tax Credit

Ms Kelly: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what was the (a) total and (b) forecast level of expenditure on the Working Families Tax Credit; how many families have claimed the Working Families Tax Credit; and what estimate he has made of the projected number of claimants on a year by year basis; [122601]

(2) what is the (a) forecast cost of introducing the childcare tax credit and (b) number of projected claimants of the credit; [122613]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answers 18 May 2000]: The total expenditure on Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC) and the Disabled Persons Tax Credit (DPTC) in 1999–2000, and the Budget projections of expenditure on these credits for 2000–01 and 2001–02, are shown at Table C12 of the March 2000 Financial Statement and Budget Report. Most of this relates to WFTC. Up to the end of March 2000 there had been 1,030,200 awards made of the WFTC.

It is estimated that the extra expenditure in 2000–01 due to the childcare tax credit element of WFTC will be about £200 million, and that about 125,000 families will benefit. Projected figures for other years are not available.

Alcohol and Tobacco Duties

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate (a) the retail value of goods purchased and (b) the tax, broken down between excise duty and VAT, lost through (i) cross-border shipping and (ii) cross-border smuggling of (1) alcohol products and (2) tobacco products for each year since 1996. [119217]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 14 April 2000]: The tables show the revenue lost through cross-border shopping and cross-Channel smuggling, and the estimated retail value of equivalent goods bought through legitimate UK retail outlets. Cross-border shopping estimates for 1999 are not yet available.

Table 1: Cross-border shopping

[1] Components are rounded to the nearest £5 million and therefore may not sum to the totals shown.

[2] The figures exclude any amounts for alcoholic drink and tobacco products smuggled in freight consignments. Customs' assessment of the overall revenue lost from all forms of tobacco smuggling, including that in freight, is £2.5 billion in 1999. No comparable assessment of the overall revenue lost from all forms of alcohol smuggling is available.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

RMT Union Flat Tenancy

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he consulted the Permanent Secretary at his Department about his controlled rent tenancy of a flat owned by the RMT, in accordance with paragraph 123 of the Ministerial Code. [120586]

Mr. Prescott [holding answer 4 May 2000]: It has been the practice of successive Administrations not to disclose information relating to internal opinion, advice, recommendation, consultation and deliberation, consistent with Section 2 of Part II of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Public Bodies

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list (a) the (i) executive agencies, (ii) non-departmental public bodies and (iii) local public spending bodies within his Department's remit and (b) the contractors employed by his Department whose work (1) has been transferred since 1992 and (2) is planned to be transferred in the next 12 months (y) to and (z) from the Northern Region. [121052]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The executive agencies and non-departmental public bodies which fall within the Department's remit are listed. The only local public spending bodies which fall within the Department's remit are registered social landlords (RSLs). There are approximately 2,100 RSLs, which are registered with the Housing Corporation. These are listed in the Housing Corporation's "Directory of Registered Social Landlords 2000", a copy of which is in the House Library. No executive agencies or non-departmental public bodies have been transferred from the Northern Region since 1992 or are planned to be transferred in the next 12 months. Information on local public spending bodies could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The information requested on contractors is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Correspondence

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells to the Prime Minister of 13 March regarding enforcement of the Ministerial Code, which has been passed to him for reply. [121210]

Mr. Prescott [holding answer 8 May 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister today (PQ121212), Official Report, column 286W.

VAT (Building Renovations and Conversions)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has made in the past six months to the Chancellor of the Exchequer about reducing the level of value added tax levied on building renovations and conversions; what plans he has to make such representations in the next six months; and if he will make a statement. [122100]

Mr. Raynsford: The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions has discussions with the Chancellor of the Exchequer on many issues throughout the year. These discussions are confidential. Final decisions on taxation are a matter for the Chancellor. The Secretary of State has no plans to make a statement.

Skipton to Leeds Line

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects new rolling stock to be introduced by Northern Spirit on the Skipton to Leeds line; and if he will make a statement. [122740]

Mr. Hill: It is anticipated that new rolling stock will be operating on the Skipton to Leeds line by the end of this year.

Motor Insurers Bureau

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the progress of his review of the Motor Insurers Bureau agreements. [122810]

Mr. Hill: The Uninsured Drivers Agreement is subject to a Judicial Review as a result of an application by the Motor Accident Solicitors Society. When the result of that is known we will be considering whether any changes are necessary. A consultation exercise on proposals to amend the separate Untraced Drivers Agreement will start in the next few days. We shall be consulting widely among representatives of the legal profession, consumer groups and the motor insurance industry.

Housing Debt (Local Authorities)

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will estimate the total of housing debt owed by local authorities; [123015]

(2) if he will estimate the total of housing debt owed by local authorities in Great Britain. [123014]

Mr. Mullin: Local authorities manage their debt corporately so there are no separate figures for debt in respect of housing. We do, however, make estimates of notional housing debt for the purposes of revenue subsidy calculations. The England total estimated housing debt for subsidy purposes for 2000–01 is £19.3 billion. With regard to these matters in Scotland and Wales, the responsibility has been passed to the Scottish Parliament and the Welsh Assembly.

Firework Storage

Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to review the limits on the weight of fireworks which may be stored at private premises and the length of time they may be so stored. [R] [122631]

Mr. Meacher: The Health and Safety Executive is in the advanced stages of a review of the legal controls on the manufacture and storage of fireworks and other explosives. This includes a review of limits on the storage of fireworks in private premises. The Health and Safety Commission plans to consult publicly on its proposals towards the end of the year.

Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent assessment has been carried out by his Department of the proximity of the locations of storage and manufacture of fireworks and explosives to private dwellings. [R] [122624]

Mr. Meacher: The Health and Safety Executive is in the advanced stages of a review of the legal controls on the manufacture and storage of explosives, including fireworks. This includes a thorough and expert re-examination of the distances currently specified for separation from inhabited buildings, and related work on the location of existing sites. The Health and Safety Commission plans to consult publicly on its proposals towards the end of the year.

Chiltern Railways

Mr. White: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if there is an exemption order for the fleet of new Class 168/1 trains to be introduced into service by Chiltern Railways Ltd. in respect of any of the provisions of the Rail Vehicle Accessibility Regulations 1998; and if he will make a statement. [123276]

Mr. Hill: As my predecessor explained in her answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty) on 9 March 1999, Official Report, column 167W, we are expecting to receive a number of exemption applications from train operating companies whose designs for new rail vehicles were well advanced prior to the 1998 Regulations coming into force.

We have received an application from Chiltern Railways Ltd. relating to the new Class 168/1 trains they wish to introduce into service. The exemptions have been discussed with our statutory advisers the Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee. An exemption order relating to the exemption of these trains has been laid in Parliament today.

The exemptions will not prevent disabled people from using the new trains. Indeed, we believe that their introduction will make a significant contribution to improving mobility opportunities for disabled people.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Joint Environmental Markets Unit

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will second staff to work for the Government Joint Environmental Markets Unit. [121490]

Mr. Hain: We have agreed FCO funding for an initial six month secondment to DTI/DETR's Joint Environmental Markets Unit (JEMU). We are currently discussing with JEMU specific opportunities for later this year and are in the process of identifying suitable officers for secondment.

Treaty of Montreux

Mr. Gummer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will assess the benefits of reconvening the conference which led to the Treaty of Montreux to reconsider the provisions of that Treaty. [121473]

Mr. Hain: The UK keeps all Treaties to which it is a signatory under review. We do not believe there is a need for changes to the Montreux Convention at present. No other party to the Convention has asked for the conference to be reconvened.

Diplomatic Relations

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the grounds on which the United Kingdom breaks off diplomatic relations with other countries. [122476]

Mr. Hain: The establishment of diplomatic relations between States takes place by mutual consent, and if either State withdraws that consent diplomatic relations are broken. There are no legal limitations on the right of a State to break diplomatic relations with another, but the action is now almost invariably taken for political reasons. A break in diplomatic relations often follows a sequence of reciprocal or retaliatory moves between two States to downgrade their relations or a collective political decision by a number of States directed against another State whose conduct is regarded as unacceptable. The reasons for the United Kingdom deciding to break off diplomatic relations in any particular instance depend very much on the circumstances of each case.

Abdullah Ocalan

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Turkish Government regarding the case of Abdullah Ocalan; and if he will make a statement. [122382]

Mr. Vaz: I refer to my reply to my hon. Friend on 17 April 2000, Official Report, column 395W.

The conviction and sentencing of Mr. Ocalan are principally a matter for the Turkish courts. When the opportunity arises, we continue to make clear to the Turkish authorities our opposition to the death penalty as a matter of principle.

Cyprus

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the (a) meetings attended and (b) people met by Sir David Hannay since 1 January in relation to Cyprus. [122383]

Mr. Vaz: Sir David Hannay is in regular contact with all those interested in a settlement of the Cyprus problem.

During the period in question, Sir David attended the second round of UN proximity talks in Geneva from 31 January to 8 February, in the course of which he had numerous contacts with all those present (including the Greek and Turkish Cypriot leaders, the UN Secretary-General and his Special Adviser on Cyprus, Alvaro de Soto, representatives of the Greek and Turkish Governments and representatives of other Permanent Members of the Security Council, of other EU member states and of the European Commission).

Sir David visited Cyprus on 13–15 March, when he held discussions with the Greek and Turkish Cypriot leaders. He is planning to re-visit Cyprus in early June.

Sir David has also visited New York twice for discussions with the UN Secretary-General and his Special Adviser on Cyprus: Brussels for discussion with the High Representative for Common Foreign and Security Policy, Javier Solana, and the Commissioner for Enlargement, Gunter Verheugen, and Commission officials; Strasbourg for discussions with Jacques Poos, European Parliament Rapporteur on Cyprus, and other members of the European Parliament; Lisbon for discussion with the Portuguese EU Presidency; Paris for discussion with the incoming French EU Presidency; Athens (twice) for discussion with representatives of the Greek Government; and Ankara for discussion with representatives of the Turkish Government.

Sir David also attended the call by President Clerides on the Prime Minister on 10 April and the call by Cyprus Foreign Minister Cassoulides on the Foreign Secretary on 16 May.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he proposes to have with the Government of Turkey prior to the next round of talks on Cyprus; and if he will make a statement. [122372]

Mr. Vaz: We are in regular contact with the Government of Turkey on the UN Cyprus process and will remain so. We continue to urge Turkey, and all those with an interest in the Cyprus settlement process, to continue to cooperate with the UN Secretary General in a constructive and flexible manner.

Balkans

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Bosniac refugees have returned to Zepa and Srebrenica since the signing of the Dayton Peace Agreement. [122316]

Mr. Vaz: Since the signing of the Dayton Peace Agreement in November 1995, there have been 15 Bosniac returns to the town of Zepa, and 123 Bosniac returns to the Zepa municipality. There has been one Bosniac return to Srebrenica.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what final date has been set for the Kosovo municipal elections. [122315]

Mr. Vaz: No final date has been set for Kosovo's municipal elections. However, they are expected to take place in the autumn of this year.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what percentage of pre-war Bosniac inhabitants have returned to Eastern Bosnia since the signing of the Dayton Peace Agreement. [122313]

Mr. Vaz: The UNHCR (United Nations High Commission for Refugees) do not have on record any figures for the percentage of Bosniac returns to Eastern Bosnia. However since the signing of the Dayton agreement in November 1995, 247,228 Bosniacs have returned to the Federation.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Serb refugees have returned to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia since the signing of the Dayton Peace Agreement. [122317]

Mr. Vaz: There have been no significant outflows of ethnic Serb refugees from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) during the last decade.

UNHCR figures put the number of Serb refugee returns to Bosnia and Herzegovina since 1 January 1996 (shortly after the Dayton agreement) at 33,470.

According to UNHCR statistics, there were 200,900 refugees from Bosnia and Herzegovina and 296,600 refugees from Croatia present in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) at the end of 1998 (the latest figures available). In addition the number of internally displaced persons from Kosovo present in other parts of the FRY has been estimated provisionally at 180,000.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Bosniac and Croat refugees have returned to the territory described as Republika Sprska since the signing of the Dayton Peace Agreement. [122319]

Mr. Vaz: UNHCR figures state that between 1 January 1996 and 31 March 2000, there were 2,729 Bosniac returns and 1,021 Croat returns to Republika Sprska. (The General Framework Agreement for Peace was signed at Dayton in November 1995).

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of progress in establishing an effective judiciary in Kosovo. [122314]

Mr. Vaz: The development of an effective judiciary remains a matter of priority for the UN Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK). In addition to the recruitment of local judges and prosecutors, the UN has asked the international community to consider seconding legal professionals of their own. We have received a number of registrations of interest from prosecutors and are seeking to identify judges for short-term detachments to Kosovo to work with UNMIK.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of progress in preparations in advance of municipal elections in Kosovo, of regulations to define the function, powers and terms of, and limitations on, the municipal offices there; and what stage has been reached in the approval of these regulations by the UN. [122318]

Mr. Vaz: The Secretary General's Special Representative in Kosovo, Bernard Kouchner, is, with the co-operation of the Council of Europe, in the process of preparing a draft regulation entitled "Self-Government of Municipalities in Kosovo" which will set out the status, responsibilities and powers of Kosovo's municipalities. The document is in its second draft and is subject to continuing discussion.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of progress in the electoral registration of Kosovar Serbs resident in Serbia. [122312]

Mr. Vaz: Registration for the forthcoming municipal elections in Kosovo is the responsibility of the Joint Registration Task Force (JRTF) of the UN Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK). The International Organisation for Migration (IOM) is handling out-of-area registration on behalf of the JRTF.

The JRTF is making strenuous efforts to ensure that displaced Kosovo Serbs are able to register. Three registration centres have been set up inside Kosovo, close to the internal boundary with Serbia for those Serbs wishing to register.

The task will be all the easier if Belgrade agrees to the registration process, which so far it has not. UNMIK are hoping however that Belgrade can be persuaded to give its agreement.

European Security

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how associate members and associate partners of the WEU will participate in European Union decisions and actions in the framework of the European Security and Defence Policy. [122321]

Mr. Vaz: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer he received on 16 May 2000, Official Report, columns 112–13W.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the future of the WEU Assembly. [122322]

Mr. Vaz: The question of parliamentary oversight of European defence is one we must get right in putting into practice the new defence arrangements within the EU. We are still considering the options.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the WEU Assembly proposal to transform the Assembly into a European Security and Defence Assembly. [122320]

Mr. Vaz: The WEU Assembly's Lisbon Initiative has made an important contribution to the discussion of the appropriate parliamentary framework to support the new defence structures.

Angola

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the Government's policy is on encouraging another country to offer Jonas Savimbi political asylum and immunity from arrest. [122443]

Mr. Hain: We have not at this stage encouraged any country to offer Savimbi political asylum or immunity from arrest. We do, however, regard Savimbi as the major obstacle to a resolution to the conflict in Angola.

EU Expansion

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the EU's policy on the eligibility of Tunisia, Morocco and Libya for membership of the European Union. [122446]

Mr. Vaz: Article 49 of the Treaty on European Union sets out the eligibility criteria for membership of the EU.

Entry Waiting Times (Sub-continent)

Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 18 April 2000, Official Report, column 414W, on entry waiting times, what plans he has to reduce the waiting times in each queue for entry to the United Kingdom in Islamabad and Dhaka. [122576]

Mr. Vaz: The High Commission in Islamabad has made good progress this year in reducing waiting times. The Post now has a full complement of entry clearance staff, which will be supplemented by additional temporary staff during the busy summer season. New reception arrangements, about to be introduced, should speed the processing of applicants. A high level review team will visit the Post in June to consider working practices.

In Dhaka, one entry clearance officer vacancy is being filled, and two additional entry clearance officer slots have been created. Dhaka will also receive temporary seasonal relief staff.

Ireland

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what price was realised by the sale of the Ambassador's Residence in Dublin; and what proportion of this sum has so far been paid. [122954]

Mr. Battle: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) on 5 May 2000, Official Report, column 239W, in respect of the Diplomatic estate in Dublin. Because they are sensitive, it is not our policy to reveal details of price and other terms agreed in such transactions.

I will write to the hon. Member shortly about this matter.

Macedonia (Mr. Richard Hudson)

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, further to the answer of 11 April 2000, Official Report, column 112W, on Mr. Richard Hudson, whether drivers working on behalf of KFOR other than Mr. Hudson have been prosecuted for (a) road traffic offences and (b) other offences in Macedonia; and if NATO has offered assistance in their cases. [121577]

Mr. Spellar: I have been asked to reply.

Aside from Mr. Richard Hudson, we are not aware of any cases of civilian contractors (British or otherwise) working for KFOR being charged with any criminal offences by the authorities of the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

Mr. Hudson was working for a company contracted by the British armed forces in the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. He was not directly employed by NATO or by KFOR.

Full details are set out in the Agency's Corporate and Business Plan, copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House.

Ms Osborne: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to publish details of the targets for the Northern Ireland Child Support Agency; and if he will make a statement. [123404]

Mr. George Howarth: The Northern Ireland Child Support Agency will publish its 2000–01 Strategic and Business Plan today. Copies will be placed in the Library.

The targets that I have set for the Child Support Agency for 2000–01 are set out:

Case Compliance

That in at least 74 per cent. of cases, non-resident parents are paying child maintenance;

Cash Compliance

That at least 72 per cent. of the total amount of child maintenance which is due for payment is actually being paid;

Accuracy

That the level of maintenance assessed is correct in at least 80 per cent. of all cases checked;

Customer Complaints

That the number of complaints received are reduced to less than 0.1 per cent. of the current caseload;

Customer Service Standards

Payments—that 98 per cent. of payments to the parent with care (or their bank or building society) are made within 10 working days of receipt from the non-resident parent;

Accounts—when requested, the majority of account breakdowns are issued within 40 working days;

Office Interviews—that 98 per cent. of clients are seen within 10 minutes of the time of a pre-booked appointment;

Customer Helpline—that 80 per cent. of telephone calls to the Customer Helpline are answered first time;

Correspondence—that 90 per cent. of letters received are answered within 10 working days of receipt;

Customer Satisfaction—that 95 per cent. of customers surveyed on quality call backs (following contact with Customer Helplines and face to face interviews) are at least satisfied with the service received;

Complaints—that the majority of customer complaints are resolved within 20 working days of receipt; and

Outstanding Work

To be reduced to a prescribed level in all key business areas by 31 March 2001. This target will focus attention on the need to address or eliminate backlogs, which is the key to the delivery of other improvements in performance and to the successful implementation of Child Support Reform.

The targets in the Business Plan present the Agency with a challenging but attainable objective which should lead to improvements both in customer service and performance in the lead-up to Child Support Reform.

Ms Osborne: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what performance targets have been set for Construction Service in 2000–01. [123405]

Ms Osborne: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what performance targets have been set for 2000–01 for the Northern Ireland Health and Social Services Estates Agency. [123406]

Mr. George Howarth: The targets which have been set for 2000–01 are based on the corporate aims and objectives of the Agency as set out in Section 5 of its Corporate and Business Plan. The targets are in line with the Government's policy of seeking to improve the service provided to clients in terms of both quality and value for money, and I am satisfied that they present a demanding challenge for the Agency. A copy of the Corporate and Business Plan will be placed in the Library.

The targets are as follows:

1. Progress the percentage of completed Firecode Audits from 52 per cent. to 73 per cent. of all HSS Trusts, Boards and Agencies by 31 March 2001.

4. To process regular Registry of Deeds dealings in an average of 10 days.

5. To process regular Statutory Charges Registry dealings in an average of 15 days.

6. To process pre-completion land information applications in an average of five days.

7. To achieve a weighted unit cost target of £22.3 (net of PFI costs) and £31.5 (inclusive of PFI costs).

8. To process 130 application units per member of staff per month.

Guillain-Barré Syndrome

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to ensure that examining medical practitioners and adjudicating officers of the Disability Benefits Unit of the Benefits Agency consult the records of the family doctor and relevant consultant when assessing the claim of an applicant suffering from Guillain-Barré syndrome. [122628]

Mr. Bayley: The decision makers from the Disability Benefits Unit of the Benefits Agency have access to guidance in the Disability Handbook. This is written by the Department's Medical Policy Group and contains guidance on the care and mobility needs likely to arise from a range of medical conditions. It contains a specific section on Guillain-Barré syndrome which indicates that a factual report from the relevant hospital is likely to be important in establishing the severity of the condition. For this particular disease, the hospital is likely to be able to provide more relevant information than that normally contained in family doctor records. The examining medical practitioners also have access to this guidance. However, their role is usually to provide an independent professional assessment of the care and mobility needs and they are unlikely to need to have access to information from the claimant's medical records for this particular purpose in this particular type of case.

CABINET OFFICE

Information Technology

Ms Coffey: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when the report on the handling of major Government IT projects will be published. [123285]

Mr. Ian McCartney: We are publishing the report "Successful IT: Modernising Government In Action" today, and have placed copies in the Libraries of the House.

This Government are committed to delivering improvements and avoiding the mistakes of the past. The report makes a series of recommendations to put in place the pillars that support successful IT projects. They include measures to:

Make sure all projects have a single person who is responsible for delivery and for making sure new IT is seen as part of a wider process of business change.

Improve skills particularly in project management.

Reduce risks by using modular and incremental approaches to projects.

Put in place systems for monitoring the progress of projects and learning lessons from experience.

Establish peer reviews of high risk projects.

The Government will implement all the recommendations and the report sets out a plan for achieving this. The E-Envoy will own the report and inform me of progress towards putting the recommendations into practice.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Zambia

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of progress in the establishment of community schools in Zambia. [121778]

Clare Short: Community schools in Zambia provide an important service for disadvantaged children. They have grown rapidly, from 53 in 1996 to 373 last year. My officials are working with the Ministry of Education and other donor partners to ensure that their needs are reflected in a joint education sector support programme.

EC Programmes

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development, pursuant to the Annual report of the Department for International Development, Cm 4610, para 4.22, relating to the part of DFID's budget spent through EC programmes, what procedures were used in accounting for this money by her Department. [121837]

Clare Short: The UK contribution to the European Union Budget, including development spending, is paid from the Consolidated Fund to an EC account held in the UK. These payments are administered by the Treasury.

For our European Development Fund (EDF) payments, which are made quarterly, my Department is notified by the EDF of the required amount shortly before payment is required. It is made to DFID's euro account at the Bank of England. When the EDF need to call down these funds, they notify my Department, which writes to the Bank of England authorising transfer to the EDF account.

Audit of all EC expenditure, including development programmes, is carried out by the Court of Auditors. I have access to their report, which is also scrutinised by the National Audit Office.

Rwanda

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what her Department's priorities are in Rwanda for the financial year 2000–01. [122691]

Clare Short: Last week I made my third visit to Rwanda and saw for myself the progress being made by the Government and the people to overcome the legacy of genocide. I also saw evidence of the severe challenges which Rwanda must overcome if the Government's objectives for poverty elimination, peace and reconciliation are to be achieved. My Department's main priority in Rwanda for 2000–01 is to work with Government in a collaborative effort to meet these challenges.

We will support Government's own efforts to develop the poverty reduction strategies needed to secure HIPC debt relief. We will provide flexible recurrent budget support to facilitate increased social sector spending, particularly on education and will expand our capacity building support to help Government strengthen its social sector planning and delivery mechanisms. We will be supporting Government's efforts to improve skills at all levels and will be helping Government take full advantage of new opportunities in the field of information and communications technology.

We plan to hold development talks with Government later this year to discuss the detail of future UK support and to develop further the positive dialogue already established on a range of economic, social and political challenges facing Government.

India (Dalit Community)

Mr. McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance is provided by her Department for the Dalit community in India. [120299]

Clare Short: The Indian constitution provides dalits (scheduled castes) with a range of guarantees of equality and affirmative action. Yet, while policies and a wide range of government schemes exist to provide them with services, patchy implementation and discriminatory social attitudes continue to retard progress. DFID is working with government to improve services and to demonstrate and replicate systems to promote access for scheduled castes and other marginalised groups.

For example, DFID supports the District Primary Education Programme (DPEP), which is designed to increase access to quality primary education for all, with special measures to reach scheduled castes and other marginalised groups such as scheduled tribes.

We also support efforts to empower individuals and groups from scheduled castes and other marginalised communities. DFID's Poorest Areas Civil Society Programme aims to support civil society initiatives which empower poor people in the poorest districts to realise their rights. Scheduled castes will be a major target group for this programme which will support initiatives in five areas: self-governance; women's empowerment; policy advocacy; social cohesion; and self help to meet basic needs.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Opinion Research

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Solicitor-General how much his Department spent on opinion research in the financial year 1999–2000. [123251]

The Solicitor-General: Nothing was spent on opinion research, by which is understood opinion research for marketing purposes, in the financial year 1999–2000.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Solicitor-General if he will list opinion research projects undertaken on behalf of his Department in the financial year 1999–2000 itemising (a) focus group research, (b) quantitative surveys and (c) other market research surveys and in each case stating when and where the results were published. [123252]

The Solicitor-General: No opinion research projects were undertaken by my Department during the financial year 1999–2000.

DEFENCE

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the planned service life of (a) HMS London, (b) HMS Beaver, (c) HMS Boxer and (d) HMS Brave; and what was the forecast date for withdrawal from Royal Navy service, prior to the decision in the Strategic Defence Review to dispose of them. [121704]

Mr. Spellar: The planned service for each ship was 18 years. The additional information is given in the table.

Ship	Pre-SDR date for withdrawal
HMS London	28 February 2005
HMS Beaver	31 December 2002

HMS Brave	29 February 2004

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what have been the running costs of each of the Royal Navy's Type 42 destroyers for each of the past five years. [121706]

Mr. Spellar: The running costs of each of the Royal Naval's Type 42 destroyers for each of the past five years are contained in the following table. This includes repair and maintenance, manpower, fuel and other costs such as port and harbour dues. Year-on-year variations are largely attributable to refit periods.

DERA

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence under what terms and conditions staff from the DERA workforce will be transferred to a new organisation after the split of DERA; if the conditions of service for those who remain will stay the same; and if he will make a statement. [122380]

Mr. Hoon: Staff transferring to the NewDERA organisation would have their terms and conditions protected under the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) (TUPE) regulations. This means that staff transferring to the private NewDERA organisation would transfer with their existing terms and conditions. The Cabinet Office "Statement of Practice on Staff Transfers in the Public Sector" covers the conditions of service for staff remaining in the Ministry of Defence. The principle is that these staff should be treated no less favourably than if TUPE regulations had been applied to them. These matters are part of the consultation process on DERA PPP which is currently underway and which is scheduled to be completed on 9 June 2000.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list the name, size and location of DERA-owned sites within the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement; [122378]

(2) what plans there are to sell part of the land held by the DERA estate before the part sell-off of DERA; and if he will make a statement. [122386]

Mr. Hoon: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Mike Hancock, dated 22 May 2000:

I am replying to your parliamentary questions about the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) estate as responsibility for operational matters such as these fall to me as the Chief Executive of the agency.

I attach at annex a list showing the name, size and location of DERA owned sites within the United Kingdom. These sites where the freehold of either all or part of the land has been vested to DERA. You ask what plans there are to sell part of this land before the privatisation of the agency. As you know, the future of DERA is currently the subject of a consultation document. MOD's proposals envisage that around three quarters of DERA would be turned into a company (for planning purposes this is referred to as NewDERA) which would be floated on the stockmarket as soon as its potential is judged to be suitably developed. This could be during 2001, though the precise timing has yet to be determined and will be influenced by the results of the consultation process.

In parallel to this process, as part of our normal strategic planning, the estate, as you would expect, is kept under continuous review. This process is expected to continue regardless of any privatisation considerations. As the precise transaction point for NewDERA has yet to be decided, I cannot say whether any currently planned land sales would take place before or after any flotation. We have, however, been planning to sell off the Chertsey and Bromley (Aquila) sites since 1997; these announcements were first made public in the 1998 Strategic Defence Review. The timing of these disposals will depend on progress with respect to the relocation of our staff and our negotiations with the local authorities. In addition, two smaller sites (West Drayton and Farnborough Queen's site) are to be closed in May and September, respectively, of this year. Whilst they are likely to be sold, no firm dates have been fixed for this disposal. Thus, the total number of sites that potentially could be sold prior to any proposed flotation of DERA is four.

I hope the above explains the situation.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what assessment he has made of the extent to which the part-privatisation of DERA will lead to (a) compulsory and (b) voluntary redundancies; and if he will make a statement; [122978]

(2) what arrangements have been put in place to meet the costs of possible redundancies at DERA following the part-privatisation. [122979]

Mr. Hoon: It has never been an objective of the Public Private Partnership for DERA to reduce staff numbers and indeed the opportunities provided by this process to develop new markets for DERA's products should have a positive effect on job prospects.

Staff numbers within DERA have varied in response to customer requirements and changes in the funding available for defence research. There has been such rebalancing in DERA over the last seven to eight years. This process is independent of PPP and would be expected to continue. As a general rule we would seek to avoid compulsory redundancies wherever possible. However, this would be subject to the need to ensure that the organisation can continue to meet the requirements placed by the Ministry of Defence and other customers.

Aircraft Carriers

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest position in respect of the two new aircraft carriers planned for the Royal Navy; what is his assessment of the costs of the programme; if the programme is up to date; and if he will make a statement. [122975]

Mr. Hoon: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friends the Members for Ilford, North (Ms Perham) and for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs. Gilroy) on 17 April 2000, Official Report, columns 678–80.

Gulf Veterans

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made on the Gulf Veterans Medical Assessment Programme; and if he will make a statement. [122928]

Mr. Spellar: The Gulf Veterans Medical Assessment Programme (GVMAP) was established in 1993 to provide as full a diagnosis as possible to UK veterans of the 1990–91 Gulf conflict who are concerned about their health. The GVMAP continues to see new patients and to date 2,991 veterans have been seen. GVMAP offer patients an appointment within four to six weeks of referral.

A management audit of the GVMAP was undertaken by King's Fund Health Quality Service in late 1998. This was concerned with all aspects of patient care and the service provided. The auditors were impressed with the organisation of the GVMAP and the enthusiasm and commitment of the staff to the provision of a high quality service. However, the auditors made a number of specific recommendations for improving the service. In January the Gulf Veterans Illnesses Unit published a report detailing the progress made by GVMAP in implementing the auditors' recommendations. The Royal College of Pathologists are in the process of reporting on the clinical procedures used at the GVMAP.

A paper describing the clinical findings from the first 1,000 patients examined at the GVMAP was published in the British Medical Journal in January 1999. A follow-up paper on the next 1,000 patients will be submitted for publication shortly.

In its continuing support of research into Gulf veterans illnesses, the GVMAP is providing anonymised medical data relating to UK Gulf veterans, for a study by King's College, London on war syndromes in British and American veterans of wars from 1900.

Joint NBC Regiment

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is (a) the cost of and (b) the handover date for the new buildings at HQ Joint NBC Regiment at Winterbourne Gunner. [123117]

Mr. Spellar: The new buildings at Winterbourne Gunner are to house the Defence NBC Centre. The approximate cost of these is £7 million and the handover date will be 12 June.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consultations he held with (a) the county councils and (b) the district councils concerned before deciding to locate the Joint NBC Regiment at RAF Honington. [123115]

Mr. Spellar: The appropriate local authorities for the areas concerned were informed at the end of March 1999 that a study was under way to determine the best long term location for the Joint NBC Regiment. We did not receive any representations from the local authorities following these letters. Had we done so, we would of course have given them due consideration. The appropriate local authorities are also being informed following my recent announcement.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what new buildings will be constructed at RAF Honington, at what cost and over what time scale, to accommodate the Joint NBC Regiment; and if will make a statement. [123118]

Mr. Spellar: It is likely that a new office block, training complex and hangar works will be required. Additional single living accommodation will also need to be built. The estimated maximum cost of these works is £9 million.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the Joint NBC Regiment based at RAF Honington train at (a) DERA-CBD Porton Down, (b) Salisbury Plain Training Area and (c) elsewhere; and if he will make a statement. [123121]

Mr. Spellar: The Joint NBC Regiment trains at Porton Down, Salisbury Plain and elsewhere, for example, on Stanford Training Area, close to RAF Honington.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if (a) secure voice communications and (b) secure information technology networks are in place between RAF Honington and Defence NBC Centre at Winterbourne Gunner. [123120]

Mr. Spellar: Yes.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to release the Farringdon House Territorial Army Centre in North Cheam for use as accommodation for asylum seekers. [122840]

Mr. Spellar: There are no plans for Farringdon Territorial Army Centre (TAC) in North Cheam to be used as accommodation for asylum seekers.

Electricity Industry

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many job losses have been announced in the past 12 months in the electricity generating and distributing industry; and what is his estimate of the impact on jobs in (a) the industry and (b) the Electricity Association that will arise as adjustments are made following changes brought about by the Utilities Bill and the new electricity trading arrangements. [122488]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 16 May 2000]: No central figures are available on the number of job losses announced in the electricity industry over the past 12 months, nor is it possible to attribute any changes in the levels of employment which may occur in the future to either the Utilities Bill or the new electricity trading arrangements.

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the oil fabrication yards in the UK which have access to (a) Objective 1 European funding, (b) Objective 2 European funding, (c) Objective 3 European Funding, (d) special programme funding and (e) assisted area status. [122834]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 19 May 2000]: All of the main UK oil fabrication yards are in areas where European Structural Funds are available in the programming period beginning this year. The Objectives these areas qualify under are listed:

Entrepreneurs

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what research his Department has undertaken into discrepancies between the numbers of (a) white entrepreneurs and (b) ethnic minority entrepreneurs obtaining business loans and other forms of financial assistance. [123085]

Ms Hewitt: The experiences of ethnic minority businesses in the UK in raising finance are extremely varied and the nature of the problems they face are very complex. This is why the DTI, together with the Bank of England and the British Bankers Association is supporting an extensive new study into the finance needs of ethnic minority businesses.

The study, which began in January, will survey 1,000 business owners from five ethnic groups in London, Birmingham, Leicester and Strathclyde over a two year period. It will address issues of perceived and actual discrimination.

This high quality research over an extended time scale will provide the banks and the DTI with a solid foundation upon which to help all ethnic minority business to succeed.

Sellafield

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received in the past year from (a) citizens and (b) representatives of other EU member states concerning operations of the Sellafield nuclear plant. [121819]

Mrs. Liddell: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has received representations from (a) three citizens and (b) four representatives, ie those holding an elected or Ministerial post, of other EU member states concerning operations at Sellafield in the past year.

Employment Tribunals

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answers of 13 April 2000, Official Report, columns 273–76W and 8 May 2000, Official Report, column 282W, concerning employment tribunal claims, if he will provide the requested data (a) for Scotland and (b) separately for each employment tribunal region in England and Wales. [123124]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Some of the information is not available in the format requested. As the available information is contained in a number of detailed tables, I have asked the Chief Executive of the Employment Tribunals Service to write to my hon. Friend and place a copy in the Library of the House.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Road Accidents (A40)

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many accidents there have been on the A40 over the last three years (a) in total and (b) between Witney and Oxford. [121817]

Mr. Hill: The following numbers of inquiry road accidents occurred on the total length of the A40 in the last three years for which national records are available: 1,303 in 1996, 1,374 in 1997 and 1,290 in 1998. On the single carriageway section of the A40, between the Wolvercote roundabout in Oxford and the eastern end of the Witney bypass at Hill Farm, there were 27 in 1996, 45 in 1997 and 27 in 1998.

Wolverhampton/Shrewsbury/Chester Railway

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make it his policy to support a bid to give the Wolverhampton/Shrewsbury/Chester railway line a priority Trans-European Network status. [122739]

Mr. Hill: The Commission, in discussion with member states, is currently reviewing the need for revisions to the TEN guidelines which were adopted in 1996. We agree with the emerging conclusions that no major alterations should be made to the guideline maps at this stage other than those necessary to ensure consistency with the transport network maps that have been developed for the countries seeking accession to the EU. There is also a consensus that no changes to the list of 14 Priority TEN projects adopted by the European Council at Essen in December 1994 should be made at this time. There will be another review of the guidelines in 2005 and that might be the appropriate moment to look afresh at the guideline maps and the list of priority projects.

Subject to parliamentary approval of the Transport Bill, future proposals for TEN status of railway lines in Great Britain will become the responsibility of the Strategic Rail Authority.

Euro

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which (a) local authorities and (b) other organisations for which his Department has budgetary responsibility (i) have set up and (ii) are setting up projects to prepare for the UK adopting the euro; what these projects are costing each organisation; what the total cost to the Department is; and from which budget sums already spent have come. [122811]

Ms Beverley Hughes: An update on changeover planning in the public sector was given in the second Outline National Changeover Plan published on 9 March.

Airports Policy

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he plans to publish the Government's policy on airports; and if he will make a statement. [123156]

Mr. Mullin: We intend to produce an Air Transport White Paper which will provide a framework for the future of aviation and airports in the UK.

The White Paper will not be produced until after we have taken a decision on the planning application for Terminal 5 at Heathrow. The planning inquiry concluded in March 1999 and the Inspector indicated that he expects to submit his report to the Secretary of State within two years. The Secretary of State will then need to consider the report and the Inspector's recommendations carefully before making decisions.

The White Paper will also be preceded by a wide-ranging consultation document on aviation and airports; and by public consultations on the findings of the studies the Department is undertaking on air services and airports in all parts of the UK.

London Transport Policy

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with the Mayor of London about Government transport policy in London. [123155]

Mr. Hill: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Transport and I met the Mayor on 16 May. We had a wide-ranging discussion of issues of mutual interest including transport. I look forward to following this up with a further meeting with the Mayor later this week.

Local Authorities (Executive Structure)

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the local authorities in England and Wales which have instituted changes to their executive structure since May 1997; and what new arrangements they have put in place. [123146]

Ms Beverley Hughes: We do not hold centrally any comprehensive listing of those councils which are changing their constitutions within the restrictions of current legislative framework. Until the Local Government Bill [Lords], currently before the House, is enacted, councils cannot adopt executive arrangements within the terms of the Bill.

Ministerial Visit (Washington D.C.)

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the (a) itinerary for, (b) purpose of and (c) cost of his recent visit to Washington D.C. [123135]

Mr. Prescott: I visited Washington on 25–27 April in order to give a speech on climate change at the Pew Centre. I also met vice-president Al Gore, Environment Secretary Frank Loy, Transport Secretary Rodney Slater, several Senators, Dutch Environment Minister Jan Pronk and Australian Environment Minister Robert Hill. On 27 April I travelled from Washington to New York for a meeting of the United Nations Commission on Sustainable Development where I also met Jan Szysko the Polish Chair of the Climate Change Convention and Dr. Hassan Adamu the Nigerian Environment Minister and current chair of the G77 group of developing countries. I returned to the UK overnight on 27–28 April. All travel was in accordance with the Ministerial Code and my costs for the trip were approximately £6,000.

Groundwater Regulations

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the disparity between groundwater regulation charges in England and Scotland. [123018]

Mr. Mullin: In England and Wales, where the Environment Agency is responsible for authorisations under the Groundwater Regulation 1998 a single charge, equivalent to the initial £85 application charge payable at the inception of the scheme, will cover the first four-year period of groundwater authorisation. In Scotland, where the Scottish Environmental Protection Agency is the competent authority, charges under the Groundwater Regulations are a matter for the devolved Administration.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Millennium Dome

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many discounted tickets have been issued to visitors to the Millennium dome each week since 1 January. [121949]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 12 May 2000]: Of the total number of tickets issued to date (10 May 2000), Group discount tickets account for 36 per cent. of the total. Further discounted tickets, relating to children, senior citizens and students account for 9.3 per cent. of the total tickets sold to date. The Millennium dome, like any other major visitor attraction, has an extensive ticket pricing structure incorporating a variety of attractive discounts for groups and individuals.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what estimate he has made of the number of overseas visitors to the dome during the year from (a) EU countries, (b) the USA and (c) the rest of the world. [121951]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 12 May 2000]: On the basis of a recent exit poll conducted at the dome, approximately 10 per cent. of visitors were from overseas. On the basis of information collected from call centres and web sales, these visitors have come from the following countries: European Union—73 per cent., Europe (non EU)—3 per cent., North America—19 per cent. and rest of the world—5 per cent. Of the EU countries, NMEC estimates that the top sellers are Benelux, France, Scandinavia, Germany and Ireland. There are certain to be additional overseas visitors who buy tickets direct from the dome upon arrival. NMEC does not at present ask these visitors their country of origin.

Green Transport

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the key buildings for which his Department (a) submitted and (b) did not submit green transport plans by March. [122606]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 18 May 2000]: The Department for Culture, Media and Sport submitted a green transport plan (or more properly transport plan) for all its key buildings in June 1999. The buildings, all in London, are: 2–4 Cockspur Street; Grove House; 7 St. James' Square; Oceanic House; 179a Tottenham Court Road: Also included were Haymarket House and Novello House, but these have since been vacated by DCMS. The Royal Parks Agency did not submit a formal transport plan, but have published measures for promoting green transport initiatives in their Green Housekeeping Policy.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Schuman Declaration

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the (a) publications and (b) events funded by the European Union to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the Schuman declaration. [121512]

Mr. Vaz: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the office of the European Commission in London.

"Your Britain, Your Europe"

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what reason the "Your Britain, Your Europe" campaign includes visits to schools; and what legal advice he took prior to such visits taking place. [121500]

Mr. Vaz: I have visited several schools during the cross-party "Your Britain, Your Europe" campaign to exchange views with students about Europe and to meet staff and pupils involved in European projects. We saw no need to take legal advice prior to such visits.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the parliamentary constituencies to be visited in the future by the "Your Britain, Your Europe" roadshow. [123092]

Mr. Vaz: We have not yet finalised the itinerary for all my various forthcoming city visits. But I will invite MPs and MEPs of all parties to participate in events which take place within their constituencies.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what definition of the term eurosceptic was used by the Minister for Europe in speeches made during the "Your Britain, Your Europe" roadshow. [123094]

Mr. Vaz: In various speeches, I have employed the term "eurosceptic" as the widely used description for certain sections of the media, NGOs and political parties which are opposed to the UK engaging constructively with EU partners or making a positive contribution to EU discussions.

Overseas Defence Sales

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many people his Department employs (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) abroad to facilitate overseas defence sales. [122247]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 16 May 2000]: Government support for defence equipment exports is co-ordinated by the Defence Export Services Organisation of the Ministry of Defence. Overseas, this work is normally carried out by Defence Attaches and Defence Sales Sections. Although FCO staff contribute towards this work in a number of ways there are no staff directly employed to facilitate overseas Defence Sales.

The role of FCO departments in London is to provide advice to the Department of Trade and Industry on applications for export licences for defence equipment sales overseas.

Open Government

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications for information he received under the Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information in the last parliamentary Session; and how many were granted. [121856]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 18 May 2000]: I refer my right hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on 18 May 2000, Official Report, columns 216–17W.

Green Transport

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the key buildings for which his Department (a) submitted and (b) did not submit green transport plans by March. [122563]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 18 May 2000]: The FCO submitted green transport plans for all key buildings in the UK including Old Admiralty Building, Old Public Offices and Hanslope Park.

Europe Day

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the cost of hosting the Europe Day Open Day at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on 9 May. [123088]

Mr. Vaz: The Foreign and Commonwealth Open Day on 9 May, "Europe Day", was the first of a series of 12 open days the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is holding between May and July this year as part of the London String of Pearls Millennium Festival. The costs of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's participation in the Festival will be spread over the 12 open days and it is therefore not possible to calculate the cost of individual open days.

The Diplomatic Missions in London of almost all the EU member states and all the applicants participated in the event and met their own costs.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the non-parliamentarians invited to participate in Europe Day events; for what reason they were invited; and if he will make a statement. [123089]

Mr. Vaz: We invited several celebrities to join Europe Day events, including Tony Robinson and Frank Bruno. We also invited several MEPs drawn from each of the main parties to join our celebration of Europe's cultural diversity.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the (a) nature and (b) substance of the European Debate which took place during the Europe Day Open Day at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on 9 May. [123091]

Mr. Vaz: The schools debate held at the FCO's "Europe Day" was a parliamentary-style debate. Six students, each from a different school, spoke for or against the motion: "This House believes there will never be a United States of Europe".

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what criteria were used in the selection of schools invited to participate in the Europe Day Open Day at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on 9 May. [123090]

Mr. Vaz: In deciding which schools to invite to our Open Europe Day at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office we took a number of practical considerations into account, such as ease of travel and distance from the FCO. On that basis we contacted all secondary schools in Greater London and the Home Counties.

Serbia and Iraq

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy on holding seminars for hon. Members; and if he will hold policy seminars on (a) Serbia and (b) Iraq. [123066]

Mr. Vaz: We are happy to hold policy seminars for hon. Members where there is clearly a strong wish on the part of sufficient Members that we should do so. If my right hon. Friend would care to write to me with details of what he proposes we will give it due consideration.

I and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and my hon. Friend the Minister of State frequently debate Iraq and Serbia in this House. My hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) also has regular contacts with bodies with an interest in Iraq, including the UN, NGOs, members of the Iraqi opposition and religious bodies. As Minister for Europe, I am in regular contact with similar organisations with an interest in Serbia.

Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty Review Conference held at the United Nations in New York. [122839]

Mr. Hain: We are delighted with the very positive outcome. It reaffirms the importance of the NPT as the cornerstone of global non-proliferation and disarmament efforts.

The key elements from the final document are:

(a) The nuclear-weapon States have given "an unequivocal undertaking . . . to accomplish the total elimination of their nuclear arsenals leading to nuclear disarmament to which all States parties are committed under Article VI."

(b) The nuclear-weapon States will take the following steps "leading to nuclear disarmament in a way that promotes international stability, and based on the principle of undiminished security for all:

Further efforts by the nuclear-weapon States to reduce their nuclear arsenals unilaterally.

Increased transparency by the nuclear-weapon States with regard to their nuclear weapons capabilities and the implementation of agreements pursuant to Article VI and as a voluntary confidence-building measure to support further progress on nuclear disarmament.

The further reduction of non-strategic nuclear weapons, based on unilateral initiatives and as an integral part of the nuclear arms reduction and disarmament process.

Concrete agreed measures to further reduce the operational status of nuclear weapon systems.

A diminishing role for nuclear weapons in security policies to minimize the risk that these weapons ever be used and to facilitate the process of their total elimination.

The engagement as soon as appropriate of all the nuclear-weapon States in the process leading to the total elimination of their nuclear weapons."

The UK delegation played an active and pivotal role throughout the Conference. We worked hard to bridge the gaps between the Nuclear Weapon States and influential Non-Nuclear Weapon States, in particular those belonging to the New Agenda Coalition. Our constructive role has been widely recognised and welcomed. We have clearly demonstrated our commitment to further international progress on non-proliferation and disarmament.

Many people feared that this Conference would not be able to reach agreement, but the constructive attitude all sides have shown has demonstrated the continuing importance the international community attaches to non-proliferation and disarmament.

We now look forward to translating this agreement into concrete international progress.

I will arrange for the final documents from the Review Conference to be put in the Library of the House when they are available.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Listening Device (Police Investigation)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the result of the police investigation of a listening device found in the vicinity of St. Jarlath's Church, near Blackwater, County Armagh. [118979]

Mr. Ingram: It is not Government policy to comment on claims of this nature.

RUC Crest

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the Guidelines on Health and Safety regarding the dimensions of the Royal Ulster Constabulary crest displayed on police vehicles came into force; when they were to be implemented; and by which Government Department these guidelines were prepared. [121256]

Mr. Ingram: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given on 23 March 2000, Official Report, column 628W.

There are no specific Health and Safety guidelines on the dimensions of the Royal Ulster Constabulary crest on police vehicles.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many powdered milk tokens were provided by the Western Health and Social Services Board in the last 12 months for which figures are available and (a) what was their face value in (i) Limavady Council District, (ii) Londonderry Council District and (iii) Strabane Council District and (b) how many (i) chemists and (ii) other outlets provided this service in each of the council districts; and what checks he has carried out to determine whether only those chemists authorised to do so have returned such tokens for payment by the Board. [121254]

Mr. George Howarth: The Foyle HSS Trust and Sperrin Lakeland HSS Trust within the Western Health and Social Services Board area accepted 109,821 powdered milk tokens in the 12 month period 1 January 1999 to 31 December 1999, which are the latest figures available.

(a) Powdered milk tokens are reimbursed at the same face value in the Limavady Council District, Londonderry Council District and Strabane Council Districts by Foyle HSS Trust and Sperrin Lakeland Trust. The face values reimbursed at December 1999 were as follows:

SMA White & Gold	5.99
Cow and Gate Plus and Premium	5.69
Farleys 1 & 2	5.61
Milupa Milumil	5.87

Limavady Council District	4
Londonderry Council District	26
Strabane Council District	14

(ii) No other outlets within these Council Districts are authorised to accept powdered milk tokens.

Foyle HSS Trust and Sperrin Lakeland HSS Trust accept powdered milk tokens only from those chemists authorised to participate in the NI Welfare Foods Scheme.

Criminal Justice Review

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he will implement the conclusions of the Criminal Justice Review; and if he will make a statement. [120701]

Mr. Ingram: On 30 March the Secretary of State announced that there would be a six-month consultation on the recommendations contained in the report of the Review of the Criminal Justice system in Northern Ireland. An announcement of the Government's decisions on implementation, and a detailed timetable, will be made as soon as possible after the consultation period has ended.

Punishment Beatings

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many punishment beatings have been reported to the RUC in each month since April 1997. [121838]

Mr. Ingram: The following tables show the recorded number of paramilitary style assaults and shootings by calendar year from January 1997.

Biodiversity

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what estimate he has made of the cost of implementing the Draft Northern Ireland Biodiversity Strategy; how the Government intend to fund the delivery of the strategy; and if he will make a statement. [122098]

Mr. George Howarth: The Draft Northern Ireland Biodiversity Strategy was published for consultation in June 1999 by the Government's advisory body, the Northern Ireland Biodiversity Group.

No final conclusions on the Strategy, including costs, can be reached until the Group has presented its recommendations to Government.

I understand that the Group expects to be able to do so within the next few months.

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of the 1994–1999 round of Structural Funds for Northern Ireland was spent on nature conservation projects; what type of projects were funded; and if he will make a statement. [122096]

Mr. George Howarth: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Environment & Heritage Service under its acting chief executive, Mr. J. R. Lamont. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from J. R. Lamont to Mr. Lembit Öpik, dated 17 May 2000:

As Acting Chief Executive of the Environment & Heritage Service, I am responsible for operational aspects of protection of the natural heritage on behalf of the Department of Environment for Northern Ireland. I am responding to the Parliamentary Question you put down on 11 May 2000 about what percentage of the 1994–1999 round of Structural Funds for Northern Ireland was spent on nature conservation projects and what type of projects were funded.

The amount spent on nature conservation projects from the Structural Funds for Northern Ireland for the 1994–1999 round was £171,000. This represented 0.018% of the total Funds. The schemes involved were environmental enhancement works at Whitespots, Newtownards, Tyrella Beach near Newcastle, the ECOS Centre, Ballymena and Waterfoot Beach on the east Antrim Coast.

I trust you will find this helpful.

RUC Barracks (West Belfast)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what use is being made of the RUC barracks building in West Belfast; what options are being considered as future uses for the building; and what plans he has to consult local residents about its use. [121869]

Mr. Ingram: At present all police buildings in West Belfast are being used operationally and will continue to be used in this capacity for the foreseeable future. There are no plans at the moment to consult with local residents regarding the future use of these buildings.

Public Representatives will be consulted over any future plans for policing in West Belfast.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles operated by his Department were manufactured (i) in the UK, (ii) in the EU and (iii) elsewhere. [122261]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 17 May 2000]: The DfEE, including the Employment Service, operates 543 cars and 22 commercial vehicles. All vehicles are manufactured in the EU. No record is kept of which EU country the vehicle is manufactured in. The Department occasionally uses cars provided by the Government Car and Despatch Agency (GCDA). These are not included in the above figures. For information on cars provided by the GCDA, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given on 17 May 2000, Official Report, column 141W, by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Cabinet Office.

Higher Education (Ethnic Minorities)

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to ensure members of ethnic minority groups are not discriminated against in entry to universities. [122787]

Mr. Wicks: We are taking a range of measures to widen participation in Higher Education. The Higher Education Funding Council for England provides £18 million to Higher Education institutions through a 5 per cent. premium for students from disadvantaged areas. In his speech of 10 May 2000 to the AUT Conference, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced a further £4 million for this fund and set out a series of steps which we will be taking to put in place a coherent package of support in order to widen participation. We hope to make further announcements in the autumn. Many of the ethnic communities who need help most will benefit from these measures.

We are also tackling the under-representation of ethnic minorities among teaching staff in Higher Education. In his letter of 23 November 1999 to the Funding Council, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State expressed his deep concern about the present position on equal opportunities for HE staff. He also stated that all institutions are expected to have acted upon the National Committee of Inquiry into Higher Education recommendations to have equal opportunities policies in place, that barriers to recruitment and progression should be removed and that institutions should be fully accountable for the implementation of these changes.

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the study by the Higher Education Funding Council on the likelihood of graduates from ethnic minority groups finding employment. [122788]

Mr. Wicks: I am aware that the Higher Education Funding Council for England's preliminary work for the development of performance indicators confirms our own understanding that graduates from ethnic minorities are less likely to be in employment than white graduates with similar qualifications. This is not acceptable. The Government are actively committed to equal opportunity in employment and to tackling racial discrimination in the workplace.

Graduates (Employment)

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what performance indicators he will use to measure the employment of graduates. [122789]

Mr. Wicks: I will consider a range of measures of employment outcomes for graduates. I will pay particular attention to the institutional-level performance measure being developed, on the advice of a working group chaired by the Higher Education Funding Council for England, which relates to full-time home students with a first degree who have newly entered the job market. The measure will be based on the percentage of these students who are unemployed at 3 January of the academic year following their graduation.

Ms Pamela Relf

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the contribution which Ms Pamela Relf made to teaching in state schools. [122939]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 19 May 2000]: We learned with great regret of the death of Pamela Relf, who had been teaching for 36 years, and we extend our condolences to her family and colleagues.

Foundation Stage (Curriculum Guidance)

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment for what reason the Curriculum Guidance for the Foundation Stage launched by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State the hon. Member for Barking (Ms Hodge), on Thursday 11 May, accompanied by a Departmental Press Notice, was not available in the Library on Tuesday 15 May; when he expects a copy to be deposited; and to whom the guidance has so far been made available. [R] [122953]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 19 May 2000]: I announced on 11 May the publication of the "Curriculum Guidance for the Foundation Stage". This product, which addresses the early education of children, was produced jointly by my Department and the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority. It is intended primarily for early years practitioners and has been distributed widely to around 35,000 early years settings in the private, voluntary and maintained sectors. It has also been distributed to all other key stakeholders, including: Early Years Development and Childcare Partnerships (EYDCPs) and local education authorities; teacher training and NVQ training organisations; other Government Departments including the Scottish, Welsh and Northern Ireland Offices; and a range of early years and teacher associations and early years professionals. The delay in making the guidance available to hon. Members in the House of Commons was a result of an administrative oversight, which was remedied as soon as it was brought to my attention. Copies of the guidance were placed in the Library two days later on 17 May.

Sure Start

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if, for the second wave of the Sure Start programme, he will list (a) the areas selected, (b) the basis upon which each of the areas was selected and (c) when each of the new schemes is due to commence. [123063]

Yvette Cooper: A list of the local authority districts selected for the second wave of Sure Start is given. These were selected using DETR's Index of Local Deprivation augmented with two further measures: low birth weight babies and births to teenage mothers. The catchment area for the local Sure Start programme is chosen by partnerships formed by all those working with young children within the district. The criteria for selection are set out in the guidance for second wave programmes, a copy of which was placed in the Library, and include high levels of need for support services among local families. Second wave Sure Start partnerships have been asked to submit their final plans by 23 May. Most of these are expected to receive approval during the summer and be running in the early autumn.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if, for the third wave of the Sure Start programme, he will list the areas which have so far been selected; when he expects the remainder of these areas to be selected; and when each of these new schemes is due to commence. [123064]

Yvette Cooper: The districts for the third phase of Sure Start local programmes will be announced later this year. In the first and second waves it has taken local programmes about six to eight months to develop their plans.

Ofsted

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what complaints were made against an Ofsted inspector following the Ofsted inspection of Middlefield Primary School; [123109]

(2) if Mr. Piers Bilston is to be allowed to work as an Ofsted inspector. [123110]

Ms Estelle Morris: These are matters for Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools, Chris Woodhead. I have asked him to write to my hon. Friend and to place a copy of his letter in the Library.

Teachers (Early Retirement)

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list for each local education authority (a) if it has an early retirement scheme for teachers and (b) if such a scheme has been terminated, the last year of its operation. [123111]

Mr. Wicks: The framework within which local education authorities can offer early retirement to teachers is contained in the Teachers (Compensation for Redundancy and Premature Retirement) Regulations 1997 (as amended). It is a matter for each local education authority to determine how best to make use of these arrangements in the light of local circumstances. No information is held centrally on the early retirement policies of individual local education authorities, but our records show that in 1998–99 all local education authorities, with the exception of the City of London and the Isles of Scilly, granted some early retirements.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list for each local education authority the (a) minimum age at which a teacher can be offered an early retirement package and (b) maximum enhancement that can be offered to individual teachers. [123112]

Mr. Wicks: The provisions governing the early retirement arrangements for teachers are contained in the Teachers (Compensation for Redundancy and Premature Retirement) Regulations 1997 (as amended). The earliest age at which a teacher can be offered early retirement is 50; and the maximum enhancement payable is 10 years. These provisions apply to all local education authorities.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many male teachers are still working at age 65 and female teachers at age 60 years in each local education authority as a percentage of the teachers employed by the local education authority.

Ms Estelle Morris: The number and percentage of teachers in the maintained nursery, primary, secondary and special sector in England at March 1998 (provisional) are contained in the following table:

Further Education Funding Council

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the staffing complement of the Further Education Funding Council, broken down into (a) those operating at or from headquarters, (b) regional staff and (c) overall full-time equivalents. [122736]

Mr. Wicks: The staffing complement of the Further Education Funding Council is:

(a) Coventry Head Office: 294.03 FTE;

(b) Regions: 252.06 FTE (including 54 home based inspectors);

(c) Overall full-time equivalents: 546.63 FTE.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the (a) total staff and (b) full-time equivalent staff of the Training and Enterprise councils. [122737]

Mr. Wicks: We do not collect information on TEC staff numbers centrally. However, their statutory accounts as of March 1999 showed that they employed 10,249 staff in total. Where TECs have subsidiaries, the figure is extracted from consolidated accounts and therefore will include staff engaged in Business Link and other activities.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will publish (a) guidance to local education authorities on the education of the children of asylum seekers and (b) details of the distribution of moneys to local education authorities earmarked by his Department for this purpose. [122738]

Jacqui Smith: Local education authorities have a legal duty to ensure that education is available for all children of compulsory school age in their area appropriate to age, abilities and aptitudes and any special education needs they may have. This duty applies irrespective of a child's immigration status or rights of residence in a particular area, and so it includes children of asylum seekers. This Department has provided funding to the Refugee Council to support a range of publications on the education of asylum seeker children. We are also in discussion with the Refugee Council and the Local Government Association about whether or not further guidance on the education of asylum seeker children would be helpful to local education authorities.

Local education authorities receive funding for the children of asylum seekers in the same way as for other children on their school roll through the Standard Spending Assessment. The Ethnic Minority and Traveller Achievement Grant, which is worth £162.5 million in 2000–01, provides resources to help with the acquisition of language skills among asylum seeker children. In addition, we recently provided a grant of £175,000 to the Local Government Association which was used to provide additional help to some local education authorities towards the increased education costs of asylum seeker children.

On 7 April, the Secretary of State announced that additional funding of £1.5 million will be available in this financial year to support the educational costs of asylum seekers dispersed to cluster areas under the Immigration and Asylum Act. We are currently considering how best to use this additional resource and plan to make an announcement shortly.

The overall amount spent specifically on the education of asylum seeker children is not held centrally, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Connexions Service

Ms Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the locations of the pilot projects for the Connexions Service; and if he will make a statement. [120848]

Mr. Wicks [pursuant to his reply, 16 May 2000, c. 101W]: One of the pilot areas was inadvertently omitted. The correct response is as follows.

I am pleased to announce the extension of the Connexions Service pilots. New pilots are to be established in Lincolnshire, Durham, Hertfordshire, Central London, Oldham, Merseyside, South Yorkshire, and at the Huntercombe Youth Offenders Institution in Oxfordshire. These are additional to the pilots announced by the Secretary of State on 3 February.

Vaccine Use

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the current review into vaccine usage, including wastage, which his Department has commissioned will be completed; if he will publish its findings; what the precise terms of reference of the review are; and if the review will receive representations from manufacturers of equipment for storing vaccines. [117635]

Yvette Cooper: We are currently conducting a review into vaccine usage, including wastage.

The terms of reference of the review are:

to examine and report on the distribution, storage and handling of vaccines in samples of mixed rural/urban areas; to determine as far as possible the extent of vaccine wastage; to consider what changes in procedures might be desirable and recommend accordingly.

We will then publish a code of good practice and guidance on the handling of vaccines at local level.

We have a list of suppliers of equipment suitable for storage and transport of vaccines and if the review group is agreeable this list will be updated and added as an appendix to the code of good practice.

Mr. Denham [holding answer 10 May 2000]: The number of patients waiting over 26 weeks for a first outpatient appointment at Essex Rivers Healthcare National Health Service Trust on 31 March 1997 was 404 and for 31 December 1999 (the latest date for which figures are available) it was 1,336.

Man-made Insulin

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the risks from man-made insulin; and if he will make a statement. [R] [121777]

Ms Stuart: Human (genetically engineered) insulin underwent a rigorous assessment of clinical efficacy and safety at the time of its first licensing in the United Kingdom in 1982.

Following its introduction, there was much debate about a possible loss of the warning signs of a low blood glucose with human insulin. As a result, a considerable number of scientific studies have been performed comparing animal and human insulin.

The Committee on Safety of Medicine, has reviewed the safety of human insulin on several occasions since its introduction. During the review process there has been consultation with experts in the field of diabetes as well as with the British Diabetic Association. The Committee has concluded that although some patients have experienced problems on transferring to human insulins and are better suited to animal insulins, there is no evidence of a safety problem specific to human insulin.

The Medicines Control Agency is responsible for the continuous monitoring of the safety of all licensed medicines and the safety of human insulin is therefore kept under continuous review.

Infliximab

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the current prescribing status is of Infliximab as a treatment for rheumatoid arthritis and Crohn's Disease. [122081]

Ms Stuart: A European licence was granted on 13 August 1999 for Remicade, whose active constituent is infliximab. It is licensed for the treatment of severe, active Crohn's disease in patients who have not responded despite a full and adequate course of therapy with a corticosteroid and/or an immunosuppressant; and for the treatment of fistulising Crohn's disease, in patients who have not responded despite a full and adequate course of therapy with conventional treatment.

Infliximab is not yet licensed in the United Kingdom for the treatment of rheumatoid arthritis.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated relating to the prescribing of Infliximab. [122083]

Ms Stuart: Neither the Department nor the Medical Research Council has directly commissioned any research into Infliximab.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice he (a) has received and (b) intends to seek from the National Institute for Clinical Excellence regarding the prescribing of Infliximab for rheumatoid arthritis and Crohn's Disease. [122085]

Ms Stuart: We are considering a number of possible additional topics for appraisal by the National Institute for Clinical Excellence during the year 2000–01. An announcement will be made shortly.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what medical trials his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated relating to the efficacy of Infliximab. [122084]

Ms Stuart: The Department has not commissioned or evaluated medical trials relating to the efficacy of infliximab. Infliximab was authorised for use through the European Medicines Evaluation Agency who reviewed the available data.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance his Department has issued to health authorities and prescribers relating to the prescribing of Infliximab. [122082]

Ms Stuart: The Department does not normally issue guidance relating to the prescribing of individual drugs. Clinicians learn about new drugs and therapies through publications such as those from the "National Prescribing Centre", the "British National Formulary" and other professional journals.

Suicide (Asian Women)

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has undertaken into the reasons for the rate of suicide among Asian women aged 15 to 24 years; and what action has been taken as a result. [122445]

Mr. Hutton: The Department has not directly commissioned any research into the reasons for the rate of suicide among Asian women aged 15 to 24. However, we have supported studies undertaken by the Institute of Psychiatry in 1996 into rates of attempted suicide in Asian women in West London and 1998 about the Asian Communities knowledge of depression, suicidal ideation and attempted suicide. Following these studies educational material has been prepared for the Asian Community in four languages. The Department also supported the publication "Ethnicity: An Agenda for Mental Health" by the Royal College of Psychiatrists which included details of research into suicide and attempted suicides across cultures.

The Department has also provided the Asian Family Counselling Service with funding through the Section 64 scheme for their Nai Umeed (New Hope) project to reduce mental ill health and suicide among Asian women.

The development of strategies to reduce suicide is a major part of our programme outlined in the White Paper "Saving Lives: Our Healthier Nation". The National Service framework for Mental Health sets a specific evidence-based standard for mental health and social services to prevent suicide. In addition we are bringing together the necessary expertise to work across Government to drive forward a whole range of initiatives to make progress towards achieving the targets to reduce suicides including focusing on high-risk groups, such as Asian women.

Hospital Admissions

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospital admissions there were in the (a) Bromley and (b) North Cumbria Health Authority area in each month for the last five years that figures are available. [122365]

Mr. Denham: The figures shown in the table are a count of admissions per month to National Health Service Hospitals in England for the years 1994–95 to 1998–99 where the patient's health authority of residence was Bromley Health Authority or North Cumbria Health Authority.

Graduates

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the role of the Royal Colleges in determining the number of students graduating as doctors. [122806]

Mr. Denham: The Royal Colleges do not have any formal role in determining the number of students entering undergraduates medical education, or graduating as doctors.

Lymington Community Hospital

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will make an announcement on the New Lymington Community Hospital private finance initiative. [122831]

Mr. Denham: [holding answer 19 May 2000]: Negotiations between Southampton Community Health Services National Health Service Trust and its private sector partner on the proposed private finance initiative scheme for a new community hospital for Lymington are continuing. We expect these to be completed as soon as possible, allowing an announcement to be made soon after.

Euro

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which (a) health trusts, (b) health authorities and (c) other bodies within the NHS (i) have set up and (ii) are setting up projects to prepare for the UK adopting the euro; what these projects are costing each organisation; what the total cost to the Department is; and from which budget sums already spent have come. [122813]

Ms Stuart: An update on changeover planning in the public sector was given in the second Outline National Changeover Plan published on 9 March.

Cold-related Illnesses

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the percentage increase in hospital admissions for cold-related illnesses from December to March above the average for the rest of the year in (a) Bromley and (b) North Cumbria health authority area in each of the last five years for which figures are available. [122368]

Mr. Denham: The figures in the table show a count of admissions to National Health Service hospitals in England by selected diagnoses, where the patient's health authority of residence was Bromley or North Cumbria, for the years 1994–95 to 1998–99.

Physicians

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will discuss with the General Medical Council their plans for making it a requirement for any physician applying for a new appointment to divulge legal action which he or she may be facing in relation to their medical work. [122753]

Ms Stuart: It is not the responsibility of the General Medical Council to require physicians applying for new appointments to divulge legal action which they may be facing in relation to their medical work. The GMC is an independent statutory body, which licenses doctors to practise medicine in the United Kingdom, following an examination of their qualifications. It is their job to ensure that the doctors registered are capable of good medical practice within the scope of their registration, which includes being honest and trustworthy.

It is the responsibility of all employers to take all possible action to ensure that doctors they appoint are fit to practise. The Department has issued guidance reinforcing the need for pre employment checks for doctors in the "Good Practice Guidance" issued with the "Appointment of Consultants Regulations 1996". Additionally the Department has also issued HSG(98)64, "The Management of Health, Safety and Welfare Issues of NHS Staff", and HSC 1998/212 "Children's Safeguard Review: Choosing with Care", which cover all NHS staff, and advises NHS employers to ensure proper pre-employment checks are made so that employees do not represent a risk to patients.

The Department also plans to issue a Direction shortly which will require NHS employers to include a declaration in their application forms for hospital and community medical and dental posts, stating whether or not the applicant has been or is the subject of disciplinary action by the police, or a regulatory body in this country or overseas.

Home Carers

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to (a) investigate the quality of care being provided to people in their homes, (b) introduce a regulatory system to supervise the provision of care by home carers and (c) apply such a system throughout the UK. [122692]

Mr. Hutton: In England we are committed to introducing a regulatory framework for home care services. Proposals for this are included in the Care Standards Bill, which was recently introduced in the House.

All domiciliary care agencies will be required to register, if they provide personal care services. They will be inspected annually by a national care standards commission, established in this Bill.

The responsibility for information relating to Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland is a matter for the devolved administrations.

Child Prostitution

Mrs. Heal: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps the Government are taking to ensure that children are protected from abuse through prostitution and that those who coerce children into prostitution are (a) investigated and (b) prosecuted. [123051]

Mr. Hutton: The Government have today published new Guidance, "Safeguarding Children Involved In Prostitution—Supplementary Guidance to Working Together to Safeguard Children". It establishes that the primary law enforcement effort must be against those who coerce children into and abuse them through prostitution. Children involved in prostitution should be treated primarily as victims of abuse.

The Guidance sets out an inter-agency approach, based on local protocols, to address this type of abuse. The identification of a child involved in prostitution, or at risk of being drawn into prostitution, should always trigger the agreed local Area Child Protection Committee procedures to ensure the child's safety and welfare, and to enable the police to gather evidence about abusers and coercers. The Guidance forms an important part of the Government's strategy to combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children. Copies of the Guidance will be placed in the Library.

Cancelled Operations

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many operations were cancelled, and in respect of such operations how many patients involved were not re-admitted within one month, in each quarter since 1995 in (a) England and (b) each health authority in London; and if he will list the percentage change for each year. [122712]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 19 May 2000]: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

The table shows the information for England. Information for the fourth quarter of 1999–2000 is not yet available.

Information for London is not available in the format requested as the definition of 'London' health authorities before the London region was established in January 1999 is subject to interpretation. The information in the Library can be used to generate comparisons but these will vary according to the definition of 'London' health authorities used.

Accident and Emergency Departments

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many accident and emergency departments there were in each year since 1979 for which the figures are available (a) for England, (b) for each health authority in London and (c) for each NHS trust in London; and if he will list the percentage change for each year. [122713]

Ms Stuart: Department of Health statistics provide a count of the number of National Health Service trusts with accident and emergency services. They do not count how many individual Departments there are.

Information on the type of accident and emergency service provided is published in "Bed availability and occupancy, England 1998–99" and information on numbers of accident and emergency attendances is published in "Outpatients and ward attenders, England 1998–99". Copies of both are available in the Library.

Social Services

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 15 May 2000, Official Report, column 18W, on the Audit Commission report, Charging with Care, if the options he is considering include taking additional legislative powers. [122843]

Mr. Hutton: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced during debate on the Second Reading of the Care Standards Bill on 18 May 2000 that we will propose an amendment to that Bill that will allow guidance to be issued to councils about charging for non-residential services under section 7 of the Local Authority Social Services Act 1970.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 15 May 2000, Official Report, column 18W, on standard spending assessments, if he will list the ways in which the formula has materially changed in each year since 1997. [122842]

Mr. Hutton: The major changes to the standard spending assessment formula for residential care services for older people and the SSA formula for non-residential services for older people since 1997 are as follows.

For 1998–99 SSAs, the residential care services SSA was revised on the basis of research commissioned from the University of Kent. Previously, four factors influenced the allocation: the number of older people in the authority (including those in institutional settings), the proportion of older people who have a long-term illness, the proportion of older people living in rented accommodation, and the proportion of older people with preserved rights to higher rates of Income Support. In the new formula, the last factor was dropped as the number of preserved rights clients is far less of an influence several years into the community care reforms. The first three factors were retained but four further factors were added:

the proportion of pensioners living alone;

the proportion of older people receiving Income Support;

the proportion of pensioners who are living with someone, but not as a couple;

the proportion of older people in receipt of Attendance Allowance.

For 1999–2000 SSAs, the residential services SSA was changed to take account additionally of the numbers of older people claiming Disability Living Allowance and to cease to take account of the number of older people living in institutions.

Also for 1999–2000 the non-residential services SSA was changed to include an allowance for population sparsity and to reflect each authority's potential to raise income from charges.

There were no changes to the SSA formulae in 2000–01.

Construction Contracts

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what construction contracts his Department has awarded to the Joannou and Paraskevaides Group in the last three years. [123142]

Ms Stuart: The Department has no record of any construction contract awarded to any firm of this name in the last three years.

So far as the wider National Health Service is concerned, there are no centrally held records of construction contracts entered into by NHS trusts or health authorities and to survey all of them to answer this question would be at disproportionate cost.

NHS Waiting Lists

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients have left NHS waiting lists in each month of the last year to be treated in the private healthcare sector. [123125]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not available centrally.

Meat Hygiene

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the closure of the Mead Webber meat processing plant at Eardisley in Herefordshire. [122956]

Ms Stuart: An independent investigation on the closure of the Mead Webber plant has been agreed following discussions between the Meat Hygiene Service Chief Executive and a representative of Mead Webber Ltd.

It would be inappropriate to comment further until this investigation has been completed.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Asylum Seekers

14. Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the most recent figures for the processing of asylum applications. [121544]

Mrs. Roche: The number of initial decisions made in March increased by 44 per cent. on the figure for February, rising to 11,340, the highest monthly total ever recorded and the first time ever the level has climbed above 10,000. As a result, the backlog of initial asylum decisions has begun to fall.

26. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received concerning the administration of the voucher system for asylum seekers and their families. [121557]

Mrs. Roche: I and my officials have over the last few months received a number of representations concerning the administration of the voucher system. These include letters from the public and from hon. Members. Parliamentary questions have also been asked in both Houses about the system.

28. Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the number of failed asylum seekers since 1997 who have disappeared within the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [121559]

Mrs. Roche: No official estimate has been made of the numbers of failed asylum seekers since 1997 who have disappeared in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to use the Farringdon House Territorial Army Centre in North Cheam for use as accommodation for asylum seekers. [122841]

Mrs. Roche: The National Asylum Support Service has no plans to use the Farringdon House Territorial Army Centre in North Cheam to accommodate asylum seekers.

Rural Policing

15. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on rural policing. [121545]

Mr. Straw: We recognise the policing needs of rural areas. We will publish a rural White Paper later this year, including a section dealing specifically with rural crime. At present, the particular needs of rural areas are taken into account in the current police funding formula that distributes approximately £35 million of available funding to authorities with low population density, and so benefits rural areas.

Rural areas also participate in the range of initiatives already available, the Crime Fighting Fund, Crime Reduction Programme and recently approved funds to build a modern crime fighting machine and to modernise the police service.

34. Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which police authorities will benefit from his proposed additional funding for policing in rural areas. [121565]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We have retained the sparsity element introduced by the previous Government in the formula for calculating police funding of 0.5 per cent. (about £35 million) which benefits rural forces.

An added 2 per cent. sparsity element was also used in allocating 4,000 of the 5,000 police officers being recruited through the crime fighting fund. The remaining 1,000 officers were divided between the 34 forces putting in the best bids. In deciding the allocation of resources between forces, we took particular account of the information forces supplied to explain the size of their bids, including the particular need of rural areas.

Under the Crime Reduction Programme, some of the initiatives fund rural crime reduction projects. Under the Targeted Policing Initiative, Northumbria police, in partnership with Tynedale district council, local parish councils and the Northumberland Social Services and Probation Service, have been granted £40,000 for a project to develop an integrated strategy to tackle crime and disorder in rural towns and remote villages.

A number of projects funded under the Closed Circuit Television Initiative requirement have been relaxed from twice to one-and-a-half times the national average burglary rate. This will allow more areas to bid funding, though the burglary rate in most rural areas is still well below this level.

Police Manpower (Greater London)

16. Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if minimum manpower shift levels are being applied in the Metropolitan police area. [121546]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that the level of manpower for each core shift is an operational matter for borough commanders. Where borough commanders have agreed minimum manpower shift levels, they are set for each shift according to local demands.

Illegal Immigrants

17. Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress is being made in checking heavy goods vehicles for illegal would-be immigrants seeking to enter this country. [121548]

Mrs. Roche: The Immigration Service has increased the number of checks on vehicles entering the United Kingdom. These checks support the civil penalty provisions of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, which were recently implemented.

Domestic Violence

18. Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to protect women who have come to the United Kingdom through marriage and are subject to domestic violence. [121549]

Mr. Boateng: We have introduced a range of measures to protect women from overseas who have applied to settle in the United Kingdom—but are subject to violence by their spouse or partner—including a concession outside the immigration rules and the provision of culturally appropriate support by the police, National Health Service, housing and other agencies.

Crime and Disorder Partnerships (Schools)

19. Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with his counterparts in the Department for Education and Employment to ensure that schools are fully involved in local partnerships to combat crime and disorder. [121550]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Following agreement with Ministers in the Department for Education and Employment, we have designated schools as bodies with which local authorities and police forces must co-operate in partnership to develop and implement their local crime and disorder reduction strategies.

Crime Statistics

20. Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department by how much crime increased in the Metropolitan police area during the year to 31 March; and if he will make a statement. [121551]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that the total number of notifiable offences in the Metropolitan Police District for the year ending 31 March 2000 was some 12.6 per cent. higher than that in the previous financial year.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the proportion of crime, based on (a) recorded crime statistics and (b) the British Crime Survey, which (i) does not result in a caution or conviction and (ii) is not cleared up; and if he will make a statement. [123227]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The latest assessment of the proportion of crimes not cleared up and those not resulting in a caution or a conviction is detailed on page 29 of "Digest 4—Information on the Criminal Justice System in England and Wales", published by the Home Office in October 1999. A copy of this publication is available in the Library.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what the recorded crime clear-up rate in each Metropolitan Police division was in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement; [123150]

(2) how many recorded crimes there were in each Metropolitan Police division in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement; [123149]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The requested details are included in the table.

Notes:

There was a change in counting rules for recorded crime on 1 April 1998, with the aim of wherever possible measuring one crime per victim. The coverage of offences was also expanded. It was estimated that these changes in themselves increased the overall number of crimes recorded by the Metropolitan Police by 21.7 per cent. Numbers of offences and clear-up rates before and after this date are not directly comparable.

The basis for the collection of clear-ups changed on 1 April 1999. The major changes were a reduction in the number of offences taken into consideration being counted (only those that were previously recorded will now be counted), and with more stringent rules applying to 'prison visit' clear-ups. Clear-up rates subsequent to this date are not directly comparable with previous years.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many recorded crimes there were in the Metropolitan police area, in each category of crime and in total, in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement; [123152]

(2) what the recorded crime clear-up rate for the Metropolitan police was, for each category of crime and in total, in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [123151]

Crime Prevention (Technology)

23. Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with representatives of the business community about the use of technology to prevent crime. [121554]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We have established a number of initiatives to discuss with the business community the use of technology to prevent crime. We are working with industry to encourage the comprehensive electronic tagging or "chipping" of goods. The ability to track and trace goods effectively will have far-reaching implications for commerce and crime reduction. We are funding the Foresight Crime Prevention Panel, which includes business and industry representatives and is specifically seeking to identify opportunities for using advances in technology to reduce crime. Action teams, with representatives and is specifically seeking to identify opportunities for using advances in technology to reduce crime. Action teams, with representatives from business community, have also been established to look at retail, vehicle and property crime, including the use of technology.

Germar Rudolf

21. Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement concerning the case of Germar Rudolf. [121552]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Government are aware of the reports in some quarters that Mr. Rudolf may be in the United Kingdom. The police have also been informed of the allegations against Mr. Rudolf.

Closed Circuit Television (Chelmsford)

22. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the impact of CCTV in Chelmsford on the level of crime; and if he will make a statement. [121553]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Essex Police crime statistics show a 7 per cent. reduction in recorded crime in Chelmsford Town Centre since the Closed Circuit Television system became operational in January 1996. The true reduction is greater, as the figures are affected by a statistical change in 1998 in the method of recording violent crime. There have been 1,012 arrests directly attributable to CCTV, mainly for theft and public order offences.

E-commerce

24. Mr. St. Aubyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent discussions he has had with the Department of Trade and Industry concerning e-commerce. [121555]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I have had a number of discussions with the Minister for Small Business and E-Commerce concerning e-commerce, particularly on the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill and the Electronic Communications Bill. Officials in the Home Office and the Department of Trade and Industry are working together closely to pursue the Government's policy of making the United Kingdom the best and the safest place in the world to conduct e-commerce.

Home Detention Curfew Scheme

27. Mr. Forth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many further offences have been committed by prisoners released under the Home Detention Curfew scheme while on the scheme; and if he will make a statement. [121558]

Mr. Boateng: Information based on notifications direct to the Prison Service and data from the Police National Computer show that fewer than 2 per cent. of prisoners placed on the Home Detention Curfew scheme since January 1999 have committed further offences while subject to the scheme. As at 15 May 2000, the Prison Service knew of 395 cases where curfewees had been convicted or cautioned for offences committed while subject to the scheme, or were awaiting prosecution for such offences. The total number of offences known to the Prison Service was 701.

Mr. Hope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners placed on the Home Detention Curfew scheme have committed further offences while subject to the scheme; and if he will make a statement. [123374]

Mr. Boateng: The latest information shows that fewer than 2 per cent. of the 20,632 prisoners placed on Home Detention Curfew by 15 May 2000 had committed further offences while subject to the scheme.

Interrogation of data on the Police National Computer (PNC) (covering 14,646 of the 14,837 prisoners placed on Home Detention Curfew up to 31 December 1999) indicates that, as at 13 April 2000, 351 of this group had been convicted of, or cautioned for, an offence committed while subject to the Home Detention Curfew scheme, or had a prosecution pending in respect of such an offence. In addition, there are 44 cases where the Prison Service has been notified of new charges involving prisoners placed on Home Detention Curfew in 2000 and prisoners placed on Home Detention Curfew in 1999 who could not be traced on the Police National Computer. (The figure of 44 excludes cases where the Prison Service is aware that charges were brought but not proceeded with, or resulted in acquittal). This means that at 15 May 2000 the total number of cases where the Prison Service knew of convictions, cautions or pending prosecutions in respect of curfewees was 395, or 1.9 per cent. of the total.

Table 1 gives a breakdown of the offences which led to convictions or cautions or where prosecutions are pending. Table 2 shows the number of cases in which these offences are similar in type to the original offence leading to a custodial sentence, and provides a breakdown.

Figures used in responding to previous Parliamentary Questions in relation to reoffending by those placed on the Home Detention Curfew (both in 1999 and 2000) were based on information about charges reported to the Prison Service by the police. The Prison Service had been previously notified of 171 cases where charges had been brought against offenders placed on Home Detention Curfew in 1999, and 37 cases involving offenders placed on Home Detention Curfew in 2000.

The interrogation of data from the Police National Computer was undertaken as part of the continuing evaluation of the Home Detention Curfew scheme by the Home Office Research Development and Statistics Directorate. The evaluation exercise has not to date covered those placed on Home Detention Curfew in the current year, but regular updates are planned.

The figures obtained from the Police National Computer cannot be compared directly with those previously used in responding to Parliamentary Questions. The new figures are based on convictions, cautions and pending prosecutions, rather than charges reported to the Prison Service by the police. However, the figures show that there has been some under-reporting of charges by the police.

This means that the procedures for notifying the Prison Service of curfewees charged with further offences have not fully been followed. These procedures are set down in Home Office Circular 1/99, issued to Chief Constables and police Home Detention Curfew Liaison Officers in January 1999. The circular requires the police to notify the Prison Service either at the time the charge is laid or at the first opportunity thereafter. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has today written to the President of the Association of Chief Police Officers, asking that the Association give this matter their attention and identify what steps can be taken to improve compliance with the circular. Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary will also be monitoring actions taken by the police to improve compliance with the notification procedures.

As a reinforcing measure, other agencies will also be asked to alert the Prison Service to any case that comes to their attention, where a curfewee has been charged with an offence committed while subject to curfew. As already indicated, the Police National Computer will also be interrogated on a regular basis in order to monitor the effectiveness of the notification procedures, and to ensure that information on the numbers of convictions, cautions and pending prosecutions is kept up to date.

Although more curfewees have been charged with further offences than originally notified, overall compliance with the scheme remains high. Taking account of the new information, the successful completion rate is around 94 per cent. (93.6 per cent.).

The scheme is designed to ensure a better transition for short-term offenders between custody and the community. Prisoners are only placed on Home Detention Curfew after a careful risk assessment. The safety of the public is paramount at all times and, with this in mind, Prisoner Governors will be reminded of the importance, when considering a prisoner's suitability for Home Detention Curfew, of assessing the likelihood of reoffending while subject to curfew.

[1] One of the three rape cases was listed on PNC as pending prosecution, and is therefore included in the table. However, the Prison Service has since been informed that the offender was acquitted. The two other rape cases were previously known to the Prison Service and have been referred to in replies to earlier Parliamentary Questions.

Notes:

1. The table includes all 351 cases drawn from the PNC analysis and the 44 cases where the data is based on police notifications (excluding those cases where, following initial notification of a charge, the Prison Service was informed that the charges had been withdrawn or resulted in acquittal).

2. Where a curfewee was convicted of, or cautioned for more than one offence, or prosecution is pending in respect of more than one offence, the table shows the most serious offence.

Anti-social Behaviour Orders

29. Mr. McWalter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the causes of the low take-up of anti-social behaviour orders. [121560]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Records of the number of orders granted are not currently held centrally, although we believe that about 40–45 orders are currently in force. The number of orders in force has been increasing steadily and continues to do so. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary set up an action group last year to consider issues relating to the use of anti-social behaviour orders. The group recommended a series of 10 regional seminars to provide an opportunity to share good practice, and to consult on the terms of a model agreement or protocol which local partnerships can use as a basis for effective co-operation in tackling anti-social behaviour. The seminars have now been successfully completed and I look forward to a further increase in the number of orders granted.

32. Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many anti-social behaviour orders under the provisions of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 have been issued against persons under the age of 16 years. [121563]

Mr. Charles Clarke: As I stated in my reply to the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) on 21 February 2000, Official Report, column 824W, records of the numbers of anti-social behaviour orders issued are not currently held centrally. We understand that since the relevant provision came into force on 1 April 1999, at least 13 anti-social behaviour orders have been in respect of persons aged under 16.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many anti-social behaviour orders have been implemented in the Greater London area in the last 12 months. [122369]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Figures for the number of orders granted are not yet held centrally. We are, however, aware of one order currently in force in the Greater London area.

Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the implementation of the Government's anti-social behaviour strategy in (a) England (b) the North West region and (c) the area covered by the Greater Manchester Police Authority; and if he will make a statement. [122574]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We will be reviewing the effectiveness of anti-social behaviour orders early next year.

Police Racism

30. Mr. Casale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about progress in tackling racism in the police force. [121561]

Mr. Straw: In February, I published my first annual report on progress of the implementation of my action plan to take forward the recommendations of the report of the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry, a copy of which is in the Library. I was able to report that over half of the report's 70 recommendations had already been implemented and work was under way on the others. The Bill to extend the Race Relations Act 1976 to the police and other public authorities was introduced in December 1999. I have set targets for forces on recruitment, retention and progression of ethnic minority officers. In addition, a research programme to broaden the understanding of stop and search and the way it can be improved is currently well advanced. I have made increasing trust and confidence in policing among minority ethnic communities one of just two ministerial priorities for the current year.

Disorder (Parliament Square and Whitehall)

31. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been charged with offences in connection with the disorder in Parliament Square and Whitehall on 1 May; how many have been charged with criminal damage to (a) the Cenotaph and (b) the statue of Sir Winston Churchill; and if he will make a statement. [121562]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Metropolitan police advise me that 51 persons have been charged so far in relation to the disorder in London on 1 May. In addition, seven people have been given a caution or formal warning.

No person has yet been charged in connection with damage to the Cenotaph, but one person has been charged and convicted of criminal damage to the Sir Winston Churchill statue. He received a sentence of 30 days imprisonment and a compensation order of £250.

Female Circumcision

33. Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received concerning training for police officers for the policing of the Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985. [121564]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The only representations on this subject were parliamentary questions from my hon. Friend the Member for Calder Valley (Ms McCafferty), which I replied to on 18 April 2000, Official Report, column 421W and on 17 May 2000, Official Report, columns 171–72W.

Hilda Murrell Case

35. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 14 April 2000, Official Report, column 292W, concerning the Hilda Murrell case, what options are being examined in the discussions with the forensic science service Major Crime Specialist Adviser on the strategic way ahead; and if he will make a statement on the use of second generation multiplan plus and low copy number systems. [121566]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand that advice has now been received from the Major Crime Specialist Adviser, but that to disclose its nature could reduce the chances of a successful outcome to the investigation. I shall write to my hon. Friend about the forensic techniques mentioned.

Anti-drugs Strategy

36. Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent assessment he has made of the effectiveness of his measures against drug dealers; and if he will make a statement. [121567]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Activity aimed at stifling the availability of illegal drugs on our streets is set out in the Government's 10-year anti-drugs strategy for which demanding targets have been set in the United Kingdom Anti-drugs Co-ordinator's National Plan. The police, with other enforcement agencies, have been working towards achieving these and interim targets. The United Kingdom Anti-drugs Co-ordinator will report on progress in his second annual report, to be published in the summer.

The "Drug Seizure and Offender Statistics Bulletin", published in February, reports that the overall number of seizures in the United Kingdom went up by 8 per cent. in 1998 to 149,900. The number of persons found guilty of, or cautioned for, offences of unlawful supply and of possession with intent to supply, totalled 16,246.

Immigration and Nationality Directorate

37. Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what targets he has set for the Immigration and Nationality Directorate to respond to hon. Members' correspondence. [121568]

Mrs. Roche: The Home Office Public Service Agreement commits the Immigration and Nationality Directorate to reply to 95 per cent. of correspondence from hon. Members within 15 working days.

Neighbourhood Watch

38. Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what support his Department currently gives to neighbourhood watch schemes. [121569]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Home Office does not provide core funding for neighbourhood watch. Rather, we direct funding towards national initiatives designed to support and encourage the local activity. We also support the National Neighbourhood Watch Association in its efforts to promote increased involvement in neighbourhood watch.

Drug-related Crime

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the increase in the number of crimes in the last year which were related to illegal drugs. [121556]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The statistical data are collected on drug offences but not on other offences which may have been committed due to drug taking. In the 12 months ending September 1999, the police in England and Wales recorded 129,782 notifiable drug offences, a decrease of 9.2 per cent. on the corresponding period in the previous year.

A programme of research carried out on behalf of the Home Office by the University of Cambridge, involving the drug testing of arrestees, indicates a strong connection between drug misuse, particularly heroin and crack/cocaine, and crime. The research suggests that about one third of all property crime is committed in order to buy these drugs. Further data are being analysed and it is hoped to publish the next set of full results in the summer.

Humberside Police

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on Humberside police's bid for funding for extra officers from the Crime Fighting Fund. [121936]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to the announcement I made on 17 May 2000, Official Report, columns 169–70W, which sets out details of the revised distribution of the 5,000 recruits under the Crime Fighting Fund for all forces in England and Wales.

Humberside police bid for 251 officers and were allocated a total of 74 officers. Although the total number of officers has not changed, the accelerated scheme will enable Humberside to recruit 47 extra officers under the scheme this year and 27 next year.

The Humberside police bid was considered most carefully, as were all the bids. 4,000 of the 5,000 officers were allocated between forces using the Police Grant and Standard Spending Assessment formula, which included an additional 2 per cent. sparsity factor to benefit forces such as Humberside that cover rural as well as urban areas. The remaining 1,000 officers were divided between the 34 forces putting in the best bids.

Begging (Children)

Ann Keen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with local authorities on their interpretation of the definition of child in need contained in section 17(1) of the Children Act 1989, in respect of babies and children involved in begging; and what plans he has to establish national guidelines on this issue. [122373]

Mr. Charles Clarke: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has had no discussion with local authorities on their interpretation of the definition of "child in need" contained in section 17(1) of the Children Act 1989, in respect of babies and children involved in begging. The most objectionable aspects of begging are already covered by the criminal law. Where there are child protection concerns, local authorities have a statutory duty under Section 47 of the Children Act 1989 to make inquiries where they have reasonable cause for concern that a child may need protection.

The law has always made clear how unacceptable it is to use children for the purposes of begging. It is there to be enforced as and when the situation requires it.

Prison Officers (Retirement Age)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will raise the maximum retirement age for prison officers from 60 to 65 years. [122523]

Mr. Boateng: In the light of the Home Office review of age retirement policy, the Prison Service is reviewing the age retirement of prison officers and other related grades. It is intended that this review will be completed within the next few months.

Wheelclampers

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many wheelclampers working on private land have been prosecuted since 1990; [122519]

(2) what powers of arrest will be given to the police in respect of wheelclampers who operate without licences granted under the proposed Private Security Regulations. [122520]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Wheelclamping on private land is not a criminal offence, although there have been civil actions. Information on such actions is not collected centrally. The number of criminal offences committed by wheelclampers during their work on private land is not available, as the Home Office Proceedings Database does not identify the employment status of a defendant.

We will be introducing proposals to regulate wheelclampers as soon as parliamentary time allows.

Nicholas Tucker

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the Criminal Cases Review Commission to report on the case of Nicholas Tucker. [122506]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand that an application for review of Nicholas Tucker's case was submitted to the Criminal Cases Review Commission in January 1999. The Commission has determined that the case will require an extensive view. Mr. Tucker has not presented any special factors that would justify giving his application priority, and it is therefore awaiting allocation to a caseworker, on the basis of date order of receipt. The Commission expects to begin the review within 12 months. The Commission will continue to communicate directly with Mr. Tucker or his representatives.

Gammahydroxybutyrate

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the Scientific Committee of the European Monitoring Centre on Drug and Drug Addiction to complete its formal risk assessment of the drug gammahydroxybutyrate. [122584]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Further to my replies to my hon. Friend on 10 May 2000, Official Report, column 405W, and to my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) on 24 January 2000, Official Report, column 95W, I can report that the European Union Horizontal Drugs Working Group considered a report on gammahydroxybutyrate (GHB) from the European Monitoring Centre on Drugs and Drug Addition (EMCDDA) at its meeting on 12 April.

The decision was taken at that meeting to refer GHB to the Scientific Committee of EMCDDA for a formal risk assessment under the Joint Action adopted by the Council of the European Union regarding the information exchange, risk assessment and control of new synthetic drugs. The risk assessment is expected to be completed by early to mid October.

Rape

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the Metropolitan police research initiative into drug-assisted rape to be concluded and a report published. [122585]

Mr. Charles Clarke: This research into drug assisted sexual assault is sponsored by the Home Office through the Policing and Reducing Crime Unit under the Police Research Award Scheme.

The research is complete and a launch by the Metropolitan Police Service is scheduled for 21 June 2000.

Police Stations (Staffing)

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what (a) uniformed and (b) civilian staffing levels were in operation in each of the police stations within the Metropolitan Police Service Hillingdon Division for each shift on (i) 30 April, (ii) 1 May, (iii) 2 May and (iv) 3 May. [122823]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that uniform police officers on duty have responsibility for the whole borough and not specific stations. Furthermore, not all civil staff operate shifts. The information in the table, provided by the Commissioner, shows the number of uniform officers and civil staff deployed in Hillingdon Division for the period 30 April to 3 May:

	Inspector	Sergeant	Constable	Civilian staff
30 April
Early turn	1	5	18	4
Late turn	1	5	22	6
Night duty	1	6	26	6

Early turn	1	6	30	5
Late turn	1	8	38	5
Night duty	1	5	30	4
2 May
Early turn	1	6	25	5
Late turn	1	7	27	4
Night duty	1	6	26	3
3 May
Early turn	1	7	25	7
Late turn	1	5	24	3
Night duty	1	6	26	3

[1] The figures for 1 May include an additional shift brought on duty in response to central requirements to provide a reserve of aid, if needed, for the May Day demonstration. These were deployed for local policing in Hillingdon only.

Prisoners (Medical Records)

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will ensure that when prisoners are transferred from one prison to another, their medical records are transferred at the same time. [123099]

Mr. Boateng: The Prison Service standard on health services for prisoners, issued on 5 October 1999, required establishments to have written and observed guidelines which set out the procedures for reception, transfer and discharge and include means of ensuring information on continuing care is conveyed to other establishments on transfer. The documentation required to achieve continuity of care is expected to include prisoners' health and treatment records.

Immigration Services Commissioner

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the appointment of the Immigration Services Commissioner. [123519]

Mr. Straw: I am pleased to announce that Mr. John Scampion has agreed to serve as the Immigration Services Commissioner and Mrs. Linda Allan has agreed to serve as the Deputy Immigration Services Commissioner. Mr. Scampion will be appointed from 22 May and Mrs. Allan from 5 June. Mr. Scampion is currently the Social Fund Commissioner for Great Britain and Northern Ireland and a member of the Data Protection Tribunal. Mrs. Allan is a member of the Police Complaints Authority.

Metropolitan Police (Special Constables)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many special constables there were in the Metropolitan police area on 1 May; and if he will make a statement. [121532]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me there were 758 special constables serving with the Metropolitan police on 1 May.

Correspondence

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South will receive a reply to his letter of 13 April to the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche), concerning Mrs. Alexandra Wieringa. [123067]

Mrs. Roche: Unfortunately, my hon. Friend's correspondence was not received in my Department. His office has now kindly provided a copy and I replied on 18 May.

Police Terms and Conditions

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the terms and conditions available to police officers of each rank from police constable to chief constable who have completed 30 years of service. [123107]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Police Regulations 1995 (as amended) set out terms and conditions of service for police officers of all ranks, regardless of length of service.

The Police Pensions Regulations 1987 (as amended) set out the circumstances in which a regular policeman can retire with a policeman's ordinary pension.

Officers below Association of Chief Police (ACPO) rank are entitled to retire on completion of 25 years' pensionable service if they give the police authority a month's written notice of the intention to retire—or such shorter notice as may be accepted by the authority.

Officers of ACPO rank are entitled to retire on completion of 25 years' pensionable service if they have attained the age of 55 and give the police authority three months' written notice of the intention to retire; on completion of at least 25 years' pensionable service, regardless of age, if they are subject to a fixed term contract that is not, or cannot, be extended; or if the police authority otherwise decide to permit retirement before age 60. The full text of Regulation B1 of the Police Pensions Regulations 1987 (as amended) is as follows:

An ordinary police pension is generally not payable until age 50 unless an officer has completed 30 years' pensionable service. Maximum pension benefits under the Police Pension Scheme are payable on completion of 30 years' pensionable service.

Police (Early Retirements)

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many early retirements were granted by police authorities in each of the last four years. [123108]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Police officers are entitled to retire with an ordinary police pension on completion of 25 years' pensionable service, subject to certain conditions. However, most police officers choose to retire on completion of 30 years' pensionable service, as this is when maximum pension benefits are accrued.

There are currently no provisions for early retirement from the police service with an actuarially reduced pension. However, officers may retire early on the ground that they are permanently disabled from performing the ordinary duties of a police officer and will receive an ill-health pension.

Tables which contain information on ill-health retirements for civilian and non-civilian employees from each police authority for the last four years for which such information is available have been placed in the Library.

Police Staff Numbers

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) police officers and (b) civilian staff there were in each Metropolitan Police division on the most recent date for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [123148]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is given in the table, provided by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Criminal Record Checks

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police forces failed to meet targets for processing criminal record checks under child protection targets in each of the last three years; how long checks took on average in each force in each year; and if he will make a statement. [123228]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Under arrangements agreed with the Home Office, police forces in England and Wales aim to reply to employers and other agencies within 10 days, unless inquiries need to be made of other forces—in which case the aim is to reply within three weeks. These targets are subject to the allocation of resources within each police force, which is the responsibility of the Chief Constable.

Available information in relation to the average time taken by forces in England and Wales to carry out checks under the terms of Home Office Circular 47/1993 in the three years to 31 March 1999 was shown in the reply which I gave to the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) on 17 March 2000, Official Report, columns 371–74W.

Arrangements in Scotland and Northern Ireland are a matter for the respective Secretaries of State.

Police Numbers

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers there were per head of population in each police force and in total in (a) 1992, (b) 1997 and (c) on the latest date for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [123147]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is set out in the table in the form of population per police officer. The additional funds we are making available over the next two years to recruit 5,000 more officers over and above those that forces would otherwise have recruited should improve on the 1999 ratios.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) police officers and (b) officers per head of population there were (i) per police force and (ii) in England and Wales on 31 March; and if he will make a statement. [123226]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) on 15 May 2000, Official Report, columns 59–60W.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the change in the total number of police officers was in Hertfordshire between (a) 1992 and 1997 and (b) 1997 and the latest date for which figures are available, taking into account border changes with the Metropolitan police. [123154]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The change in the total number of police officers available for ordinary duty in Hertfordshire Constabulary between 31 March 1992 and 31 March 1997 was an increase of 64, from 1,695 to 1,759.

The change from 31 March 1997 to 30 September 1999, the most recent date for which figures are available was an increase of one, from 1,759 to 1,760.

The boundary changes for the Metropolitan Police District came into effect on 1 April 2000. The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis informs me that 182 police officers have been seconded from the Metropolitan Police Service to Hertfordshire Constabulary for periods of up to two years.

The Commissioner also informs me that historical information on Metropolitan Police Divisional Staffing is unavailable.

Right to Silence

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research he has undertaken into the impact of the change to the right to silence made by the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 on the number of convictions; and if he will make a statement. [123138]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Home Office Research Study 199, "The right of silence: the impact of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994", which was published in March 2000, examined the practical impact of the provisions on the interviewing of suspects at the police station and on proceedings in court. The report found a significant reduction in the extent to which suspects rely on silence when questioned by the police. The report concludes that conviction rates do not appear to have been affected, but the provisions may have introduced efficiencies in the investigation and prosecution process, with more productive interviews; greater scope for the investigation of accounts provided by suspects during interviews; and greater certainty of convictions where silence augments an already sound prosecution case. A copy has been placed in the Library.

Young Offenders

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures he is taking to ensure young offenders take greater responsibility for their behaviour. [121547]

Mr. Boateng: We have introduced the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999—which have led to the availability of reparation and action plan orders—and a range of new disposals aimed at early intervention in youth offending with a view to young people being challenged to face up to the consequences of their actions and make amends to their victims and the wider community.

SOCIAL SECURITY

NIRS2

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners are still waiting to receive their correct pension as a result of the problems with the NIRS2 computer system; and how much compensation has been paid to (a) pensioners and (b) pension companies as a result of these computer problems. [121037]

Mr. Rooker: The number of pension cases waiting to be reviewed is 128,000.

As at 31 March 2000, £2,125,147 compensation has been paid to retirement pensioners because of the delayed implementation of NIRS2.

Compensation to pension companies amounts to £44.3 million for scheme members owing to the late payment of their age-related rebates for the 1997–98 tax year. In addition, £52,215 has been paid for work they undertook to modify their IT systems so as to minimise the impact that incorrect payments of rebates generated by NIRS2 would have on their customers' investments.

The Benefits Agency will complete its review of the Retirement Pension claims affected by the delayed implementation of NIRS2 by the end of this year.

Benefit Payment Methods

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will place in the Library copies of communications sent to (a) new and current pensioners and (b) new and current recipients of child benefit concerning methods of payment of their benefits. [120343]

Mr. Rooker: The latest copies of the main communications to new and current pensioners and new and current Child Benefit recipients, concerning methods of payment of their benefits, have been placed in the Library.

Stakeholder Pension

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security up to what level of income people will be eligible to hold a stakeholder pension concurrently with an occupational pension. [122591]

Mr. Rooker: People will be able to hold both an occupational pension and a stakeholder pension. They will be able to contribute to both only when the occupational scheme is approved under the new defined contribution tax regime. Total contributions to defined contribution schemes will be subject to existing income related ceilings. We are still considering how concurrent contributions might be extended to other occupational schemes without introducing unnecessary complexity or excessive cost.

Guillain-Barré Syndrome

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the training needs of examining medical practitioners and adjudicating officers in the Disability Benefits Unit of the Benefits Agency in relation to Guillain Barré syndrome. [122915]

Mr. Bayley: The training of examining medical practitioners and decision makers for Disability Living Allowance concentrates on explaining disability in functional terms and in particular on the assessment of individual care and mobility needs, rather than being focused on particular diagnoses. The whole of the examining medical practitioner training is currently being reviewed and any revised package will cover the disabling effects likely to arise from conditions such as Guillain-Barré Syndrome. In addition, both examining medical practitioners and decision makers have access to the Disability Handbook. This is written by the Department's Medical Policy Group and contains guidance on the care and mobility needs likely to arise from a range of medical conditions. It contains a specific section on Guillain-Barré syndrome which sets out the level and range of needs likely to arise in people with this disease.

Helplines

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many calls have been received by each telephone helpline administered by his Department in each month since January 1999; and what the salary levels are for those who work on each helpline. [121059]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the table.

Pension Schemes

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many new personal pension schemes were set up in each year from 1979 to 1999; [122356]

(2) how many new occupational pension schemes were set up in each year from 1979 to 1996. [122355]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the table.

1998	4,939	21
1999	3,170	11

Notes:

1. Scheme numbers are only part of the picture. More importantly, around 60 per cent. of employees currently have some form of non-state pension, either an occupational pension or a personal pension. In due course, numbers of people with non-state pensions should increase once stakeholder pensions are launched.
2. Personal pension schemes were introduced in 1988.

Minimum Income Guarantee

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the expenditure on administration costs for the minimum income guarantee for 2000–01 (a) in total and (b) per recipient. [123258]

Mr. Bayley: The total estimated expenditure on administration costs for the minimum income guarantee for 2000–01 is £4 million.

Details on administrative costings can be found in the Departmental Report. A copy has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if, for the minimum income guarantee take-up campaign, he will estimate (a) the total administration cost to date (b) the number of pensioners that have so far responded and (c) the number of respondents that were found to be eligible. [123257]

Mr. Rooker: The information requested is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is as follows.

The total administrative costs, to the end of April, for the project team and Teleclaims service is £1,120,369. To date the minimum income guarantee (MIG) claimline has received over 32,000 calls and from these calls over 19,000 claim packs have been issued. Current provisions allow for a claim to be submitted within one month from the initial date of contact so we are unable to specify, at this stage, how many eligible respondents have been found. The MIG campaign will be launched on 30 May. The above information does not include the costs of the proposed advertising campaign.

Pension Rights

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he plans to bring into effect those parts of the Welfare Reform and Pensions Act that will protect tax-approved pension rights when a person is made bankrupt. [123520]

Mr. Rooker: The relevant sections will come into effect from 29 May 2000.

From that date, most tax-approved occupational pension rights and personal pension rights will be protected on bankruptcy.

Small Businesses (Benefit Payments)

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the extent of increased administrative costs imposed on small businesses by the processing of state benefits through the payroll. [122358]

Dawn Primarolo: I have been asked to reply.

Having confirmed that my hon. Friend is referring to tax credits rather than to state benefits, I refer him to the regulatory impact assessment which was published and placed in the House Library in December 1999.

WALES

Opinion Research

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much his Department spent on opinion research in the financial year 1999–2000. [123122]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Wales Office has commissioned no opinion research since it was established on 1 July 1999. Welsh Office expenditure prior to that date cannot ben separately identified.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the opinion research projects undertaken on behalf of his Department in the financial year 1999–2000, itemising (a) focus group research, (b) quantitative surveys and (c) other surveys, in each case indicating when and where the results were published. [123123]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Wales Office has commissioned no opinion research since it was established on 1 July 1999. Prior to that date, the following projects were undertaken on behalf of the Welsh Office:

(a) Focus Group Research—Nil

(b) Quantitative Surveys—Nil

(c) Other Surveys

TREASURY

National Insurance

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many people are in contracted out money purchase pension schemes that are owed backdated national insurance contribution rebates; [119941]

(2) how much money is owed in backdated national insurance contribution rebates to contracted out money purchase pension schemes; and what arrangements have been made to make these backdated payments. [119942]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answers 20 May 2000]: There are approximately 280,000 people awaiting rebates for the 1997–98 and the 1998–99 tax years. About £140 million of rebates remain to be paid. Rebates are outstanding because of problems with the NIRS2 system and errors in end of year returns. Inland Revenue's National Insurance Contributions Office is working closely with its IT suppliers to resolve outstanding difficulties with the NIRS2 system. They are also liaising with Scheme Administrators and employers to correct errors in end of year returns.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people paid (a) only class II National Insurance Contributions and (b) class II in addition to other National Insurance Contributions in each of the last 10 years; what revenue the Government received from class II National Insurance Contributions in each of these years; and if he will make a statement. [122521]

Dawn Primarolo: The number of people who paid National Insurance Contributions (NICs) in tax years 1978–79 to 1995–96, by type of contribution are shown in table 11 of the DSS publication "Contributions and Qualifying Years for Retirement Pension 1995–96 volume 2", a copy of which is available in the Library of the House. Consistent data for 1996–97 are shown in the table.

Number of people—Great Britain

Thousand

Type of contribution: men and women	1996–97
Class 1 and class 2	352
Class 2 only	2,049
Combinations of class 1, 2 or 3	10

This information is based on the DSS Lifetime Labour Market Database (LLMDB) which uses a 1 per cent. sample of National Insurance records. I regret that the LLMDB does not collect information about class 4 and an analysis including class 4 would be available only at disproportionate cost.

However, in general terms, around three-quarters of those with a class 2 liability have profits greater than the lower profits limit and therefore should pay some class 4 contributions. This estimate is based on the Inland Revenue's Survey of Personal Incomes.

Class 2 contribution receipts for the years available are shown in the table:

Year	Class 2 receipts for Great Britain
1990–91	660
1991–92	650
1992–93	680
1993–94	760
1994–95	760
1995–96	760
1996–97	770

Children's Tax Credit

Ms Kelly: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the (a) forecast cost of introducing the children's tax credit and (b) projected number of claimants. [122612]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 18 May 2000]: I refer my hon. Friend to tables A.13 and A2.1 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" 2000.

Correspondence

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South will receive a reply to his letter of 14 April, concerning Mrs. Gillian McCubbin. [123068]

Dawn Primarolo: I wrote to my hon. Friend on 16 May.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the average cost per week, per recipient, of the Working Family Tax Credit, to the Inland Revenue in administration. [122575]

Dawn Primarolo: During the six months to March 2000, the average Inland Revenue cost per recipient of administering the Working Families Tax Credit (and the remaining Family Credit awards) was £1.61 per week.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Calf Exports

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on the export of calves. [119582]

Ms Quin: The UK is currently banned from exporting calves. Despite the progress that we have made with the lifting of the beef export ban, it is unlikely that the European Commission will propose the removal of the ban on live cattle exports in the near future. We are, however, working with the NFU to explore possibilities such as opportunities for high welfare standard veal exports as an alternative outlet for dairy calves.

Badger Culling

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department applied for a Home Office licence under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 for its recent badger culling experiment; and if he will make a statement. [120777]

Ms Quin: The Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, which regulates animal experiments, only applies where animals are killed in establishments specifically designated under the Act. It does not apply to the badger culling trial.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will answer the Question tabled by the hon. Member for Tewkesbury on 17 January (Ref. 105197). [120923]

Ms Quin: I refer the hon. Member to my answer given to him on 18 May 2000, Official Report, column 269W.

GM Crops

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will list, in relation to those who have submitted to him a request to be heard orally in respect of the proposed decision to add the genetically modified maize variety Chardon LL to the UK National List, each of the locations in the UK where such hearings have been requested, and the numbers requesting hearings at each such location; [121447]

(2) if he will break down by region the representations and requests for oral hearings he has received on the proposed decision to add the genetically modified maize variety Chardon LL to the UK National List, indicating how many have (a) objected to and (b) supported the proposed decision. [121449]

Ms Quin: The information requested is set out in the table. To date, 227 individuals/organisations have submitted written representations, of which 63 have also requested to be heard by a person appointed by Ministers. A further four requests for a hearing have been received where no written representations have been made. Of the 227 written representations, four supported the proposed decision and the remainder objected. Of the 67 requests for a hearing, one supported the proposed decision and the remainder objected.

Action Plan for Farming (Budget)

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list, for each UK-funded component of the Government's £203.5 million Action Plan for Farming, the departmental budget concerned. [121425]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 9 May 2000]: The departmental budgets concerned with each UK-funded component of the Government's Action Plan for Farming are listed:

Action plan for farming (8 May 2000)

Measure	Value	Departmental budget
Introduce a scheme to encourage the restructuring of the pig industry in order to improve its long-term viability	£26 million (in 2000–01)	MAFF

Pig Industry

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will take measures to ensure that the £26 million package for United Kingdom pig farmers, aimed at restructuring the industry, will enable UK pig farmers to retain their export capacity. [121768]

Ms Quin: The ongoers element of the Pig Industry Restructuring Scheme is aimed at those pig farmers who wish to remain in pig production and want to restructure their business to make it viable in the longer term. Export demand for pigmeat is determined by a number of factors but the nature of the domestic market is such that we would expect the UK to continue as a significant exporter of fresh and frozen pork.

Penalty Clauses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the contracts entered into with private sector companies for the provision of goods or services since May 1997 where penalty clauses were triggered for non-performance; and if he will make a statement. [122024]

Mr. Morley: Penalty clauses are unenforceable under the law of contract, and contracts let by core-MAFF and its Agencies do not contain them. Contracts let by the Ministry do, where appropriate, contain contractual provisions setting out remedies for non-performance of contractual obligations by contractors but these are enforced only when contract management and disputes resolution procedures have been exhausted.

Fisheries

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 3 May 2000, Official Report, column 142W, on fisheries, what is the required procedure for maintaining (a) the national fisheries quota system based upon the existing relative stability and (b) restrictions upon access within national six and 12 mile limits beyond 2002. [122742]

Mr. Morley: Article 14(2) of Council Regulation 3760/92 requires the Council to decide by 31 December 2002, on the basis of a Commission report to the Council and the European Parliament and in accordance with the procedure laid down in Article 43 (now 37) of the Treaty (which requires a qualified majority in favour of a Commission proposal and consultation with the European Parliament):

on the provisions to follow the access restrictions within national six and 12 mile limits which, in accordance with Article 6 of the Regulation, expire on 31 December 2002; on any necessary adjustments to be made to other provisions of the Regulation, including those concerning the national quota system based on relative stability: if no such adjustments are made, existing arrangements will continue unchanged beyond 2002.

As indicated in my reply to the hon. Member of 3 May, the Government are confident that both these provisions will be retained beyond 2002.

Arable Area Payments Scheme

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of croppable land in Britain is eligible for the arable area payments scheme; and what the figures are for other EU states. [123020]

Mr. Nick Brown: MAFF June census data show the total UK agricultural area in 1999 as 18.6 million hectares. Of this, roughly 35 per cent. meets the equivalent of the 1991 definition used to determine eligibility under the arable area payments scheme. About a further 30 per cent. is shown as grass five or more years old, which would represent the most obviously croppable part of the balance. Taking these two areas together would give a figure of around 55 per cent. as the amount of croppable land which would be eligible. But this can only be a rough approximation, because there is neither an agreed definition of croppable nor an absolute total for eligible land, as eligibility is only assessed when actual claims are made.

We have no figures for land eligible for arable area payments in other member states.

Uninhabitable Dwellings

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the economic impact on farmers of the decision to limit the exemption from council tax on uninhabitable dwellings; and what studies his Department has made of that impact. [122997]

Mr. Nick Brown: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State on 5 May 2000, Official Report, column 242W.

Press Officers

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many press officers there were in his Department in (a) May 1997 and (b) May 2000. [122995]

Mr. Nick Brown: The number of press officers in my Department in May 1997 was 10; and in May 2000, there are 10.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Opinion Research

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how much the Lord Chancellor's Department spent on opinion research in the financial year 1999–2000 [123253]

Jane Kennedy: The Lord Chancellor's Department spent a total of £224,794 on opinion survey research in the financial year 1999–2000. The figure comprises the costs of 12 items of research, all of which relate to the Department's role as a service provider, to new initiatives such as the Community Legal Service or to areas of policy interest.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list opinion research projects undertaken on behalf of the Lord Chancellor's Department in the financial year 1999–2000 itemising (a) focus group research, (b) quantitative surveys and (c) other market research surveys and in each case stating when and where the results were published. [123254]

Jane Kennedy: The list of opinion research items undertaken by the Lord Chancellor's Department during the financial year 1999–2000 is as follows. All the research listed relates to Departmental initiatives; areas of policy interest; or client satisfaction research required for Business Plans or Chartermark controls.

LCD Opinion Research Items 1999–2000

Focus Group Research

Two Market Research Projects—Community Legal service

Commissioned through the Central Office of Information in connection with the development and introduction of the Community Legal Service. Both projects—Strategy Development Research; and CLS Quality Mark & Brand Identity evaluation—included focus group research. This research was part of the development of the Community Legal Service and was not published.

Research Project: New Public Management & the Administration of Justice in Magistrates' Courts

Research to describe, analyse and evaluate changes to the Magistrates' Courts Service brought about by the Police and the Magistrates' Courts Act 1994, and the Justices of the Peace Act 1997. It includes six focus group studies of members of Court Users Committees and core user groups. This project is still underway. Consideration about publication will be given on receipt of the final report, which is likely to be in the autumn.

Quantitative Surveys

Quality of Service (User Reaction) Survey

Survey of customer perceptions using data gathered by way of a questionnaire distributed to Magistrates' Courts users. Processing of the data was completed in-house and the results released in Information Bulletins.

Office for National Statistics Omnibus Module: Legal Problems

The Department included three questions on the extent of civil legal problems, the seriousness of particular types of problems and people's experiences in seeking legal advice in the Office for National Statistics Omnibus Module. It is expected that the results will be published this year. They will be placed in the data archive at the University of Essex.

Customer Service Surveys

The Court Service has carried out local customer satisfaction surveys every two years in Crown Court centres, the Crown Office, the Criminal Appeal Office, county courts and tribunals by the Court Service since 1998. Each survey is undertaken in-house on a local basis with no external costs. The results are published in the public area of the local court.

Juror Satisfaction Pilot Survey

Recently serving jurors have been asked about their level of satisfaction with their treatment in the criminal justice system. The results were used to set a target for this area within the new Criminal Justice System Business Plan.

Other Market Research Surveys

Market Research: Provision of Information Meetings

A study has been completed by KPMG in order to assess potential interest in the private sector in the provision of information meetings under Part II of the Family Law Act 1996. It is not intended that this report will be published.

Research Project: Alternative Dispute Resolution in Commercial Cases

A study has been commissioned to assess the impact of Commercial Court ADR orders on the outcome of cases in which they are made; and the influence of the emphasis of ADR in the Commercial Court on the conduct of commercial litigation. It includes interviews (personal or telephone) with private practice practitioners, in-house lawyers and parties. Publication of the report of the research is expected this year.

Research Project: Factors Affecting the Decision to Apply for Silk and Judicial Office

A study has been commissioned to identify the factors which encourage or deter applicants from under-represented groups to apply for appointment as Queen's Counsel and judicial office. It is based on questionnaires and interviews with applicants and potential applicants. Publication of the report of the research is expected this year.

Research Project: Identifying Thresholds—Arrangements for Contact in the Context of Domestic Violence and Child Welfare Concerns

This research is based on two sets of interviews. The first is with professionals to identify whether and how they draw distinctions between different forms of contact. The second set is with children and adults who have had a range of contact experiences in order to identify their expectations and satisfaction with arrangements. It will also investigate users' views on the way contact provisions could develop. This project is underway and consideration on publication will be given on receipt of final report in 2001.

Research Project: Monitoring the Rise in the Small Claims Limit

A study to provide follow-on information from the earlier research, published in 1997, on the small claims court. This research involves interviews with litigants. The project is underway and consideration on publication will be given on receipt of final report in 2002.

Coroner Inquiries

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department for what reasons the coroner has not opened an inquest into the death of Sam Marshall in 1990. [121864]

Mr. Lock: The holding and listing of inquests is a matter for judicial discretion of the coroner for the district in which a person has died. I understand that the coroner was in correspondence with the deceased's relatives' solicitor, Mrs. Rosemary Nelson, in relation to an inquest into Mr. Marshall's death. Mrs. Nelson was tragically killed on 15 March 1999. The coroner has only recently been contacted by the solicitor now representing the deceased's family and would intend to liaise with her in relation to the holding of an inquest.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (1) how many politically motivated or violent deaths have been the subject of a coroner's inquiry in each of the past 15 years; what was the verdict in each such case; and how much time elapsed between death and completion of the coroner's inquiry in each case; [121865]

(2) in how many cases of (a) politically motivated and (b) violent death a coroner's inquiry had not opened a year after that death in the last 10 years; [121866]

(3) if he will set out, for the last 10 years, the number of (a) politically motivated and (b) violent deaths subject to a coroner's inquiry and the time taken to complete each stage of the inquiry process prior to a final verdict in respect of such deaths. [121867]

Mr. Lock: General statistics are available in relation to deaths in Northern Ireland. I am informed by the General Register Office for Northern Ireland that figures in relation to deaths registered in the last 15 years where the cause of death has been due to injury or poisoning (coded E800-E999) and homicide and injury inflicted by other persons (coded E960-E969) are available. These figures are detailed in the table. However, the specific information requested by my hon. Friend in relation to politically motivated deaths is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Tax Appeal Tribunals

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many ex parte hearings at tax appeal tribunal level there have been in each of the last five years. [122721]

Jane Kennedy: Ex parte hearings are applications from the Inland Revenue for Consent to issue a notice requiring the production of documents or information. The application is made to a single commissioner of income tax, and is not considered to be a part of the appeals meeting. The number of these applications is not reported separately from the meeting statistics.

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many tax appeal tribunals have been held in each year following the introduction of self-assessment [122722]

Jane Kennedy: Self-assessment was introduced with effect from 6 April 1996 and applied to returns for the 1996–97 tax year. The time limit for these returns to be set to the Inland Revenue was 1 January 1998. While information on the number of tax appeal tribunal hearings is not available, the number of appeals decided in 1998 by the General Commissioners of Income Tax are 95,073.

The cases heard by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax are 92.

Figures for 1999 will be available in July.

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many tax appeal tribunals were held in each of the three years before the introduction of self-assessment. [122723]

Jane Kennedy: Self-assessment returns were introduced with effect from 6 April 1996, with the first returns being issued after 5 April 1997. The time limit for these returns to be sent to the Inland Revenue was 31 January 1998. While information on the number of tax appeal tribunal hearings is not available, the figures for decisions to 31 December in each year are:

HOME DEPARTMENT

Involuntary Manslaughter

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to reform the law relating to involuntary manslaughter, and in particular corporate manslaughter; and if he will make a statement. [123518]

Mr. Straw: I have today issued a consultation document containing the Government's proposals on how the law on involuntary manslaughter might be reformed. The paper accepts and builds on the Law Commission's proposals contained in their report number 237, "Legislating the Criminal Code: Involuntary Manslaughter".

Copies of the consultation document have been placed in the Library.

This is an important document dealing with a complex area of the law, but one which most commentators accept is in need of reform. The Government are deeply indebted to the Law Commission, not only for the detailed consideration they gave to this subject in their report number 237, but for their continuing help by participating in the inter-departmental working group we set up to consider their proposals.

The consultation document concentrates on those areas of the Law Commission's proposals which are more contentious or where, for the reasons set out in the document, we have taken a different view from the Law Commission. In a number of areas we have not come to any conclusion but are seeking comments on possible options.

We wish to clarify and rationalise the existing law relating to individual involuntary homicide and we agree with the Law Commission that the law relating to corporate liability for involuntary manslaughter is in need of radical reform. Our proposals in this respect raise important and difficult issues of policy, principle and practice.

I would urge all those who are concerned about the reform of the law on involuntary manslaughter to read this paper and respond to it.

Criminal Justice System Business Plan

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to publish the criminal justice system business plan. [123711]

Mr. Straw: My right hon. and noble Friends the Attorney-General, Lord Williams of Mostyn QC, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Irvine of Lairg, and I will today be publishing jointly a Business Plan for the criminal justice system in England and Wales 2000–01.

The Plan describes the aims, objectives and performance targets that the Government expect the criminal justice system as a whole to work to deliver.

Copies of the Plan have been placed in the Library.

Immigration and Asylum (Financial Bonds)

Mr. Pond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will announce the results of the consultation process on the design of a pilot study for financial bonds for visitors under sections 16 and 17 of the Immigration and Asylum Act. [123712]

Mrs. Roche: I have today placed in the Library a detailed analysis of responses to our recent consultation paper on bonds for visitors, together with an analysis of responses to this proposal in the 1998 White Paper on Immigration and Asylum. I am grateful to all those who responded to our consultation document. We have taken full account of their views, and of the many other representations made to us, in considering how the pilot study should run.

The pilot study on financial bonds will begin in October at two posts overseas, Manila and Casablanca. It will run for six months, followed by a further six months to monitor departure from the United Kingdom, and a further brief period for analysis of the results.

The scheme is intended to enable more people to visit the United Kingdom by providing an additional facility to prospective visitors in borderline cases where their intention to return is in doubt. It will enable a British Citizen or overseas national settled in the United Kingdom who is a family member to provide a financial bond, in the form of a cash payment in advance, as an additional guarantee that the visitor will leave the United Kingdom at the end of their stay. The scheme will be open only to those seeking to visit close family members in the United Kingdom. The amount of the bond will be set at £3,000. The bond will be returned when the visitor leaves the United Kingdom.

We shall monitor the scheme closely to ensure that it operates fairly, effectively and swiftly. We shall make available our analysis of the operation of the pilot study when it is complete.

Further details about how the scheme will operate will be provided nearer the time.

Pet Cloning

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidelines exist in respect of the use of DNA from pets for future cloning purposes; and if he will make a statement. [122920]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The cloning of a pet animal would not be a permissible purpose under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 which the Home Office operates. There are, therefore, no guidelines for the use of DNA from companion animals for cloning purposes.

Prisoner Education

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many teaching staff have been employed in prisons and other custodial institutions in each of the last five years. [123496]

Mr. Boateng: Prison education is contracted out. The Prison Service purchases and measures education in terms of teaching hours rather than numbers of teaching staff. The number of teaching hours purchased in each of the last five years is given in the table.

Financial year	Teaching hours bought
1995–96	1,245,580
1996–97	1,169,717
1997–98	1,117,214
1998–99	1,213,562
1999–2000	1,354,165

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the procedure is for prisoners receiving educational publications from relatives. [123492]

Mr. Boateng: Educational publications for prisoners, such as books or periodicals, can either be left at reception, brought in on visits or sent in by post. These would be checked by prison staff before being passed on to the prisoner.

The governor of each establishment has the discretion to restrict the handing or sending in of any item of property. If the governor of an establishment restricts the handing or sending in of property which prisoners may normally have in their possession, facilities will be made available for prisoners to purchase these items either through the prison shop or through approved mail order arrangements by using their private cash and/or earnings.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what educational facilities are available in the Aylesbury Young Offenders Institution. [123493]

Mr. Boateng: The education department at Aylesbury Young Offenders Institution is run by Amersham and Wycombe College, which is expected to deliver 16,000 hours of education classes in the current financial year. Prisoners who are employed on a full-time basis have access to two hours education per week, and those in part-time employment for approximately 12 and a half hours per week. A wide range of courses is available and prisoners' individual needs are identified as part of their sentence plan.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners undertake distance-learning courses at their own expense. [123498]

Mr. Boateng: As at 3 April 2000, a total of 383 prisoners in England and Wales were registered on Open University distance-learning courses. Of these, 139 have not previously studied with the Open University.

A range of other distance-learning courses are available in prison, including GCSE, A level and vocational courses.

The majority of prisoners undertaking distance-learning courses pay for their courses through mixed funding arrangements, including self funding and charitable funding. Information on the number of prisoners who undertake distance-learning courses entirely at their own cost is not held centrally.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much has been spent on educational facilities in prisons and other custodial institutions in each of the last five years. [123495]

Mr. Boateng: Information is not available centrally on funds spent at individual prison establishments specifically on the provision of educational facilities over the last five years.

However, funds from the Comprehensive Spending Review (CSR) have been made available to prison establishments to spend mainly on enhancing basic and key skills through, for example, extending education contracts, improvements to prisoners' basic pay to encourage them to participate in basic education, training Prison Service staff as basic skill support tutors and developing imaginative integrated basic skills tuition. Some of this money will also be invested in enhancing educational facilities. The table gives a breakdown of these funds provided to each prison establishment over the three year period covered by the CSR.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what educational facilities are available to sex offenders in prisons held in accommodation separate from other prisoners. [123497]

Mr. Boateng: It is not possible to identify separately the education provision for sex offenders. The Prison Service aims to provide them with similar education facilities to other prisoners. However, where sex offenders have to be segregated for their own protection pending allocation to a prison which offers suitable training facilities for them, safety considerations may limit their access to education.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what separate educational facilities are available for sex offenders in the Aylesbury Young Offenders Institution. [123494]

Mr. Boateng: At Aylesbury, sex offenders are fully integrated with the rest of the establishment's population and have access to the same education.

Pilot Voting Schemes

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what conclusions he has drawn about the impact of pilot voting schemes in the 4 May local elections. [123483]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Jones) on 15 May 2000, Official Report, column 62W.

Prisoner Suicides

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many suicides there have been by prisoners in each of the last five years. [123491]

Mr. Boateng: The information requested is given in the table.

Self-inflicted deaths in HM Prison Service establishments in England and Wales: 1995–99

Calendar year	Number of self-inflicted deaths
1995	59
1996	64
1997	68
1998	83
1999	91

Notes:

1. To date (19 May) there have been 35 self-inflicted deaths in prison custody in England and Wales.
2. Totals for each year contain the numbers of all self-inflicted deaths in prison custody; not only those deaths where there has been an inquest verdict of suicide.
3. The term employed by the Prison Service to refer to an apparent suicide is "self-inflicted death". This is broader than the term suicide and includes all those deaths where it is clear that the person has acted specifically to take his/her own life. It is not restricted to the official verdict from the Coroner's inquest where verdicts of "open" or "misadventure" may be recorded in cases where there was doubt about a person's intent to end their life.

Force Reaction Unit

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many former members of the group known as the Force Reaction Unit have been interviewed by the Metropolitan police Special Branch in the past 12 months. [122761]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis has informed me that 15 former members of the Ministry of Defence Force Research Unit have been interviewed by the Metropolitan police Special Branch during the past 12 months.

Arrested Football Fans (Copenhagen)

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what legal action will be taken in the United Kingdom against those English football fans recently arrested in Copenhagen; [123414]

(2) what action will be taken to prevent those English football fans recently arrested in Copenhagen from travelling to football matches overseas during Euro 2000; [123476]

(3) how many of the English football fans recently arrested in Copenhagen have restriction orders against them prohibiting them from travelling abroad to football matches. [123475]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The 15 individuals arrested in Copenhagen were not convicted of any offence and no legal action can be taken against them in the United Kingdom. None are subject to a restriction or any other category of football banning order. Under current football legislation, the only individuals who can be prevented from travelling to Euro 2000 are the 106 hooligans currently subject to an international ban. However, the Dutch and Belgian police have extensive powers to refuse entry to any individual or group felt to pose a risk to public order. The National Criminal Intelligence Service will provide them with details of the 15 individuals along with details of the 388 persons currently subject to domestic football bans. Police will be monitoring all England supporters at every United Kingdom exit point throughout the tournament and the information gathered will be shared with the Dutch, Belgian and French police, in addition to the United Kingdom police teams operating in all three countries.

Crossbows

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what powers are available to him to control the ownership and use of crossbows; and what plans he has to extend them. [123469]

Mr. Charles Clarke: No such powers are available to the Secretary of State.

The Crossbows Act 1987 applies to crossbows with a draw weight of 1.4 kilogrammes or greater. It makes it an offence to sell or hire a crossbow to persons under the age of 17, and prohibits persons aged under 17 from possessing a crossbow unless supervised by someone aged 21 or over.

In addition, the Prevention of Crime Act 1953 prohibits the possession in a public place of any offensive weapon without good reason or lawful excuse.

There are no plans to amend this legislation at present.

Cultural Events (Security)

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will publish the criteria by which police forces charge for providing security at (a) folk festivals and (b) other cultural events; [123468]

(2) if it is his policy that police forces should have discretion as to (a) the amount of security that they provide at public and private events and (b) how much they charge for such services. [123467]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The decision whether to charge for costs of policing at local events is for the local police authority and the Chief Constable.

Under Section 25(1) of the Police Act 1996, > the Chief Officer of Police may provide, at the request of any person, special police services at any premises or in any locality in the police area for which the force is maintained, subject to the payment to the police authority of charges on such scales as may be determined by that authority.

The rationale behind charging is that the taxpayer at large should not be asked to pay for services provided at private events or events which benefit only a relatively small section of the community. It is for the Chief Officer concerned to determine whether a given service would constitute a special police service. Special police services are not defined in the 1996 Act or elsewhere. I would expect them to be services which meet some or all of the following criteria:

> they are not part of the general duty of the police to keep the peace and protect life and property;
> the service to be provided is on private land; and > the Service to be provided is for a commercially organised event.

European Convention on Human Rights

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the cost to public funds of incorporation of the European Convention on Human Rights into United Kingdom law. [121906]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We set out our views on the general financial effects of the Human Rights Act 1998 in the Explanatory and Financial Memorandum to the Human Rights Bill. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, Lord Chancellor's Department, set out the position with respect to the courts in her reply to the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) on 10 April 2000, Official Report, column 21W.

Home Detention Curfew Scheme

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for the period between the commencement of the Home Detention Curfew scheme on 28 January 1999 and 30 April 2000 inclusive, (a) the total number of prisoners released on the scheme, (b) the number of prisoners convicted of each specific offence who were released on the scheme, broken down by offences committed, including the specific offences committed by prisoners normally classified under the categories (i) other homicide and attempted homicide, (ii) other violence against the person, (iii) drug offences, (iv) assaults and (v) other offences, (c) the average sentence (i) received and (ii) served, and the average period spent on the scheme, in respect of each specific offence, (d) the number of prisoners released on the scheme, broken down by offences committed, who (A) breached the conditions of the curfew, (B) disappeared and were recaptured, (C) disappeared and remain unlawfully at large and (D) had their licences revoked, and for what reasons, (e) the specific offences committed by prisoners released on the scheme while on the scheme and (f) the specific offences committed by prisoners released on the scheme who committed a further offence while on the scheme that was similar in character to that for which they were originally convicted; and if he will make a statement. [121288]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 8 May 2000]: As of 30 April 2000, a total of 20,028 prisoners had been released on Home Detention Curfew since the scheme commenced on 28 January 1999.

The original offences committed by prisoners released under the scheme during that period, the number of prisoners convicted of each specific offence, the average sentence received and served for those offences, and the average period spent on the scheme in respect of the prisoners convicted of each specific offence, are shown in table 1. The data are taken from the Prison Service's inmate information system based on the data recorded by each prison. The table provides as detailed a breakdown of offences as is possible from central records.

As of 30 April 2000, 710 prisoners placed on the Home Detention Curfew scheme had breached the conditions of the curfew.

Information on curfewees whose licences are revoked and who disappear before being recaptured is not held centrally. However, information is held on the number of curfewees unlawfully at large at any one time. On 30 April, there were 40 curfewees who remained unlawfully at large. This represents less than 5 per cent. of the total number of revocations. In the vast majority of cases, when a curfewee's licence is revoked, he can expect to be quickly apprehended and returned to custody. While the priority to be given to pursuing individual cases will be an operational matter for local police forces, Home Office Circular 1/1999 made clear that Home Detention Curfew recalls should be regarded as "urgent action" cases. In addition, the National Identification Service at New Scotland Yard issues "The Police Gazette" weekly to all police forces, including details of curfewees who are unlawfully at large. When curfewees are apprehended following a period unlawfully at large, they are required to serve the period of time outstanding at the point their licence was revoked.

As of 30 April 2000, 965 curfewees had their licences revoked, using the powers available to the Secretary of State under Sections 38A(1) and 39 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991. The reasons for revocation were as follows:

for breach of the curfew;

because the curfewee's whereabouts could no longer be electronically monitored; because it was necessary to protect the public from serious harm; and because the curfewee had committed an offence or breached any requirement of probation supervision. (Curfewees who are charged with new offences may also be recalled on any of the preceding grounds depending on the circumstances of the case).

Information on the specific offences committed by prisoners placed on Home Detention Curfew while on the scheme, and a breakdown of the specific offences committed by prisoners released on the scheme who committed a further offence while on the scheme that was similar in character to that for which they were originally convicted were set out in the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Hope) on 22 May 2000, Official Report, columns 360–64W.

Tobacco Smuggling

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were convicted of tobacco smuggling in the last 12 months; and how many of them were (a) imprisoned and (b) fined. [122903]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information held centrally on the Home Office Court Proceedings Database combines sections 50(2)(3), 68(2) and 170(1)(2) of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 "Fraudulent evasion of duty etc. other than drugs". However, the type of goods involved (tobacco, spirits, beers, wines, oils and guns) are not identified separately.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his policy is in respect of experiments involving animals where the primary objective is to obtain information concerning human medical conditions which can reasonably be assumed to be self-inflicted. [122918]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Evaluating research proposals involving the use of animals is difficult and requires a delicate moral balance to be struck. Scientific developments have saved many human lives and cured many illnesses. Human medical conditions are likely to derive from a variety of causes. For example, bronchitis and emphysema can be caused by a genetic predisposition, various occupational causes and passive smoking as well as smoking. It would be immoral, in our view, to deny victims of such diseases the assistance that new scientific knowledge could bring from current work.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he plans to establish a Royal Commission into animal experimentation. [122940]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The position remains that we have not ruled out a Royal Commission, but strongly believe that resources can best be used to make immediate improvements to the operation of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 and to promote the fullest application of the 3Rs: to replace the use of animals with alternative methods, to reduce the numbers of animals used and to refine the procedures to minimise pain, suffering, distress or lasting harm.

In this context, the Animal Procedures Committee will be issuing a public consultation paper this summer as part of its review of the cost/benefit assessment. As part of this work, the Committee plans to produce an authoritative statement on the validity of animal experiments.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his policy is in respect of animal experiments where the sole or primary purpose is one of commercial gain. [122916]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Section 5(4) of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 requires that, in determining whether and on what terms to grant a project licence, the Secretary of State must weigh the likely adverse effects on the animals concerned against the benefit likely to accrue as a result of the programme specified on the application.

For the purposes of the cost/benefit assessment, the cost to the animal is considered as the adverse effects of pain, suffering, distress or lasting harm. The benefits must be for humans, animals or the environment and relate to the scientific and/or medical progress likely to result directly from the programme outlined in the application.

The identification and assessment of benefit is set out in detail in the Chief Inspector's paper on the cost/benefit assessment, included in the Annual Report of the Animal Procedures Committee for 1997. My policy is that the profitability of a company applying for authorities and the researchers' career prospects are not valid considerations for the purposes of the cost/benefit assessment, but that the socio-economic advantages of cheaper healthcare cannot be ruled out as possible legitimate benefits.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what criteria have been used to make appointments to the Inspectorate in respect of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986; what plans he has to review these criteria; and if he will make a statement; [122305]

(2) if he will list the names of those appointed to the Inspectorate in respect of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986; [122306]

(3) what steps he is taking to ensure that those inspectors appointed under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 to investigate allegations against licence holders have not been party to the original decision on granting that licence; and if he will make a statement; [122302]

(4) how many establishments have been inspected by the Inspectorate appointed under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 over the last three years; and with respect to each establishment of how many visits notification of the inspection was given; how many visits were unannounced; and if he will make a statement. [122304]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: There are approximately 300 designated establishments and the Inspectorate visits all of them. The number of visits to each establishment varies according to its size and the type of work being conducted at any particular time.

Approximately 1,800 visits of inspection are conducted each year, two-thirds of which are without notice. Visits by appointment are usually made to conduct interviews with staff, to discuss new work proposals and ongoing work, to examine records of work, to investigate non-compliance or to view premises being considered for designation.

When third party allegations are made against establishments or individuals, the investigation is handled by a Superintending Inspector from another region with no connection with the establishment or person, and no line management responsibility for the local inspector. The Chief Inspector quality assures these investigations and the resulting reports.

The 1986 Act requires that Inspectors must be either medical or veterinary graduates: the former must be registered with the General Medical Council and the latter must be Members of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons.

Candidates are expected to have additional higher professional or academic qualifications, and to have first hand experience of designing and conducting research in a clinical, academic or commercial environment. They must have a sound knowledge of medicine and surgery and be familiar with current trends and technologies used in medical and biological research.

Members of the Inspectorate are civil servants, appointed to advise the Secretary of State whether and on what terms authorities should be granted under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986. It is the Secretary of State who has ultimate responsibility for deciding what is licensed and the conditions which will apply. It is not normal practice to reveal widely the names of individuals where it is not in the interests of personal safety and security to do so.

Performing Animals

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent estimate he has made of the number of animals used in entertainment other than in circuses; and if he will make a statement. [122919]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Certificates of registration are sent to the Home Office by local authorities under the Performing Animals (Regulation) Act 1925. Local authorities were reminded in January of their statutory obligation to provide this information. The Home Office has so far this year received details of over 2,000 animals which perform other than in circuses. Of these, 1,390 are included in two registration entries, and are used in promotional, film and television work.

Burns Inquiry

Mr. Cawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if any of those appointed to the Burns Inquiry secretariat have been (a) members and (b) supporters of (i) fox, deer, hare or mink hunts and (ii) other pro-field sports organisations, or have participated in hare coursing events; [123516]

(2) if he sought to determine if those appointed to the Burns Inquiry secretariat had views on hunting with dogs prior to their being selected. [123515]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Committee of Inquiry into Hunting has been set up as a Committee which is independent of Government.

The appointment of the Inquiry team's Secretariat, and other issues relating to the Secretariat, are matters for the Chairman of the Inquiry team, Lord Burns.

Mr. Cawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many visits have been undertaken by each member of the Burns Inquiry team in the course of the inquiry to events and functions organised by (a) anti-hunting groups and (b) pro-hunting groups. [123514]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I understand from the Secretariat to the Committee of Inquiry into Hunting with Dogs that the information is as follows:

Members of the Committee of Inquiry attended 11 events organised by, at the suggestion of, or in conjunction with, anti-hunting organisations. Attendance was as follows: Lord Burns 10; Dr. Victoria Edwards seven; Professor Sir John Marsh six; Lord Soulsby of Swaffham Prior one; Professor Michael Winter four.

Members of the Committee attended 23 events organised by, at the suggestion of or in conjunction with, pro-hunting organisations. Attendance was as follows: Lord Burns 16; Dr. Victoria Edwards 12; Professor Sir John Marsh 11; Lord Soulsby of Swaffham Prior seven; Professor Michael Winter 12.

Criminal Justice (Mode of Trial) (No. 2) Bill

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what meetings he has had with the Law Society over the introduction of the Criminal Justice (Mode of Trial) (No. 2) Bill. [121897]

Mr. Charles Clarke: There have been no meetings on this issue.

Trustees

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he plans to bring forward legislation regarding the role of trustees. [123499]

Mr. Lock: I have been asked to reply.

The Government have no plans to bring forward such legislation. However, the Trustee Bill, presently awaiting its Committee Stage in another place, would make certain provisions in relation to the powers and duties of trustees and particularly in relation to their powers of investment and related matters.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Sexual and Reproductive Health Projects

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the UK aid contributions for sexual and reproductive health projects for the years (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999. [123284]

Clare Short: My Department's bilateral contributions to sexual and reproductive health, including HIV/AIDS, in 1997–99 were:

1997—£53.4 million

1998—£58.4 million

1999—£57.3 million

Gaza Hospital

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when the new EU-funded Gaza Hospital will open; and if he will make a statement. [123294]

Clare Short: I am informed that Commissioning of the EU funded Gaza Hospital is now likely to start in July 2000 and be completed by the end of the year, when it is expected that the hospital will be fully operational. An interim Management Team has been recruited by EC and will gradually hand over responsibility for day-to-day operations to local counterparts. It is intended that the Management Team will remain in place until July 2001.

Air Strip (St. Helena)

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development for what reasons a further study has been commissioned on the feasibility of an air strip on St. Helena. [123328]

Clare Short: A desk study undertaken in 1999 considered the regulatory and technical feasibility of operating an air service to St. Helena. It did not consider the engineering, economic, financial, environmental and social feasibility of developing appropriate facilities on the island. These issues will be investigated as part of the comparative study of air and sea access which is now being commissioned. The study will compare air with future options for continuation of sea access and will identify the most cost-efficient permanent solution to St. Helena's international passenger and cargo needs.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development who will have responsibility for paying the cost of the air strip feasibility study on St. Helena. [123470]

Clare Short: The cost of the comparative study of air and sea access will be met by my Department from within the £29 million development assistance package agreed for the 2000–01 to 2002–03 Country Policy Plan period.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when the study on the feasibility of an air strip on St. Helena will be completed; and if she will ensure it is published. [123413]

Clare Short: The comparative study of air and sea access for St. Helena is currently being tendered. Work is expected to commence in August. The study will take about 14 weeks. As the study is being undertaken on behalf of the St. Helena Government it is they who should decide if the final report is published.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Penalty Clauses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the contracts entered into with private sector companies for the provision of goods or services since May 1997 where penalty clauses were triggered for non-performance; and if he will make a statement. [122022]

Mr. Chris Smith: My Department has no record of any such contracts in the last three years.

National Lottery

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the role of the members of the National Lottery Charities Board and the role played by Ministers in their appointment. [123082]

Kate Hoey: Members of the National Lottery Charities Board take decisions on applications for grants from charitable, benevolent and philanthropic organisations. They formulate policies that continually improve and develop the Board's grant-making and contribute to the strategic development of the Board in a changing environment. Members also act as the public face of the Board.

Board members are appointed for up to five years by the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport. The Board's Scottish, Welsh and Northern Ireland representatives are appointed following consultation with the relevant head of the devolved Administration.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Indonesia

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will provide support for the Indonesian administration in order to reduce fighting between Muslims and Christians in Indonesia; [122853]

(2) what representations he has made to the Indonesian Government regarding religiously motivated violence in Indonesia; [122852]

(3) what recent reports he has received concerning religious violence in the Moluccas Islands. [122850]

Mr. Battle: The violence in Ambon and elsewhere in Maluku is a major concern for the Indonesian administration as well as for Britain and the international community. The new Indonesian Government aim to resolve regional conflicts through dialogue and reconciliation. We fully support that process, and have pressed upon them the need for conflict resolution work in particular communities. As part of the international effort through the United Nations Development Programme, we have already funded two conferences promoting reconciliation in Maluku, between 28 March and 3 April. We stand ready to help with further conflict prevention projects.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what UK expertise he will provide for training the Indonesian police force in managing conflict. [122854]

Mr. Battle: To explore the scope for the UK to support the Indonesian national police in its transition to a civilian accountable service, a senior British police officer will be attached to our Embassy in Jakarta from 1 June.

Moluccas Islands

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent reports he has received concerning the arrival of Jihad warriors in the Moluccas Islands. [122851]

Mr. Battle: We have received reports that a number of extremists from outside Maluku have travelled to the province, and are under the close scrutiny of the authorities in Maluku. We are concerned at recent reports that these extremists have threatened further violence in the province. We have urged the Indonesian Government to ensure the security forces maintain law and order and the protection of all citizens.

Fundamental Rights Charter

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of the implications for the British legal systems of the incorporation of the Charter of Fundamental Rights into the Treaty of European Union. [121896]

Mr. Vaz: The Cologne Conclusions state that the question of > whether and if so how the Charter should be integrated into the Treaties will be considered only once the drafting body has presented its draft before the European Council in December.

Sierra Leone

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when Peter Penfold left his post as High Commissioner in Sierra Leone; and what his last day was in Sierra Leone. [123269]

Mr. Hain: Mr. Penfold left his post as High Commissioner, and Sierra Leone, on 29 April 2000, his tour of duty having been the normal length for such postings.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what representations his Department made to President Kabbah regarding accepting Foday Sankoh into the Sierra Leonean Government; [123313]

(2) what representations were made to his Department regarding Foday Sankoh's inclusion in the Sierra Leone Government by (a) President Kabbah, (b) the Nigerian Government and (c) the United States Government; [123312]

(3) what guidance he received on the decision to include Foday Sankoh into the Sierra Leonean Government; [123315]

(4) what factors underlay the decision to include Foday Sankoh in the Government of Sierra Leone; [123314]

(5) what representations were made by the Government on Foday Sankoh's inclusion in the Government of Sierra Leone. [123311]

Mr. Hain: Foday Sankoh has no formal post in the Sierra Leone Government. Under the Lomé Peace Agreement, he was made Chair of the Commission for the Management of Strategic Resources, National Reconstruction and Development, with the status of Vice-President.

Representatives of Nigeria, the US and Britain were among those present as observers during the negotiations in Lomé between the Government of Sierra Leone and the Revolutionary United Front.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to (a) the US Administration and (b) his European counterparts regarding the freezing of bank accounts of leading members of the Revolutionary United Front in Sierra Leone and their families. [123320]

Mr. Hain: UN sanctions are already designed to target the Revolutionary United Front. UN Security Council resolution 1171 (1998) imposes a travel ban on leading members of the former military junta and of the Revolutionary United Front. It also imposes an embargo on the supply of arms and related material to Sierra Leone other than to the Government of Sierra Leone (with certain exemptions). We have not discussed the option of freezing the bank accounts of leading members of the Revolutionary United Front and their families with the US Administration or with European counterparts. However, the UK will ensure that the Security Council keeps the impact and effectiveness of sanctions under review and will make proposals for modification of the sanctions regime as we consider appropriate.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received of illegal arms shipments going through Burkina Faso to the Sierra Leone rebels. [123317]

Mr. Hain: Her Majesty's Government are aware of allegations that arms flown from Ukraine to Burkina Faso in March 1999 were subsequently forwarded via Liberia to the rebels in Sierra Leone. We raised our concerns regarding this matter with the Burkinabe authorities and the UN Sanctions Committee at the time. The Chairman of the UN Sanctions Committee also raised these allegations with the Governments concerned.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what role the Commonwealth has played in finding a peaceful solution to the latest crisis in Sierra Leone. [123316]

Mr. Hain: The Commonwealth remains an active supporter of the Government of Sierra Leone's efforts to secure lasting peace. Meeting on 2 May, the Commonwealth Ministerial Action Group condemned the killings and detention of UNAMSIL peacekeepers; expressed its determination to stand by the people of Sierra Leone; and reiterated its readiness to assist the reconstruction of Sierra leone and the consolidation of its democracy.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what recent representations he has received from the US Administration on the situation in Sierra Leone; [123323]

(2) what recent representations he has made to the US Administration on the situation in Sierra Leone. [123322]

Mr. Hain: We remain in close touch with the US Administration over the situation in Sierra Leone, particularly over the need for practical help to enable UNAMSIL to build itself up over the next few weeks. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary most recently discussed this with the US Secretary of State on 20 May. We welcome the US announcement of $20 million to support peacekeeping in Sierra Leone.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what factors influenced the decision to offer amnesty to all the Sierra Leone Revolutionary United Front's members, as part of the Lomé peace accord. [123319]

Mr. Hain: Granting an amnesty for crimes committed before the signature of the Lomé Peace Agreement on 7 July 1999 was one of the many hard decisions taken by the Government of Sierra Leone in their efforts to reach a negotiated settlement.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he was first informed about the worsening situation in Sierra Leone after January. [123318]

Mr. Hain: We have kept the situation in Sierra Leone under careful and constant review. The present crisis began when the Revolutionary United Front attacked UN peacekeepers at a Disarmament, Demobilisation and Reintegration camp in Makeni on 1 May. Reports of this attack were received early the following day.

The security situation deteriorated rapidly thereafter.

Mr. Roger Crooks

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 3 April 2000, Official Report, column 284W, concerning officials who met Mr. Roger Crooks, which official they have been unable to contact; and what the reason is for the delay. [123386]

Mr. Hain: We had been unable to contact the relevant official, due to his absence on annual leave. He has now confirmed that he has not met Mr. Crooks.

Lomé Agreement

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what part the Government played in negotiating the Lomé agreement of 7 July 1999. [123321]

Mr. Hain: The Lomé Peace Agreement was negotiated between the Government of Sierra Leone and the Revolutionary United Front, under the auspices of the Economic Community of West African States. Representatives from the international community, including the United Nations, the Commonwealth, the Organisation of African Unity, and the United States, as well as Britain, attended the negotiations.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Lomé peace accord. [123310]

Mr. Hain: The Lomé Peace Agreement was signed on 7 July 1999. It provides for a permanent end to hostilities in Sierra Leone; disarmament, demobilisation and reintegration of all former combatants; democratic elections; the creation of effective and democratically accountable armed forces; and an international peacekeeping force to supervise the peace process.

Western Sahara

Mr. Quinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Western Sahara. [123648]

Mr. Hain: With the support of the UN Security Council, James Baker, the UN Secretary-General's Personal Envoy on the Western Sahara recently visited several north African countries to assess the prospects for resolving the long-standing dispute over the Western Sahara.

Following these visits, Mr. Baker invited the two main parties—Morocco and the Polisario Front—and the two front-line states—Algeria and Mauritania—to meet in order to consider the options for moving discussions forward. The UN asked the British Government if we could provide a venue for 14 May. We agreed, and the UN accepted our offer of Lancaster House.

We welcome the willingness of the two parties to engage. We hope they will respect the spirit and aims of Mr. Baker's mission and work with him to secure an early, durable and agreed resolution of this dispute.

The 14 May talks were private and conducted throughout by Mr. Baker and his United Nations team. The UK's role was limited in this instance to logistical support. But I hope it sends a clear signal of our continuing willingness to support UN efforts to resolve conflicts in the African continent.

Kosovo

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the health of the Serbs held by KFOR in Kosovo who are on hunger strike. [121578]

Mr. Vaz: There are around 40 Kosovo Serbs on hunger strike in Mitrovica. We understand that they are being held in UNMIK detention facilities guarded by KFOR troops. Four of the 40 have been hospitalised. In three of the four cases, this was principally due to poor general health rather than the effects of the hunger strike.

Joannou and Paraskevaides Group

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which of his Department's trade promotion initiatives in the last three years have involved the Joannou and Paraskevaides Construction Group. [123140]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 22 May 2000]: A representative from the Joannou and Paraskevaides Construction Group (J + P) attended and spoke at a promotional event in the UK in November 1998 to publicise export opportunities presented by the 2004 Olympics in Athens. J + P were also present at a follow-up event in Athens a year later.

There is no other record of the Joannou and Paraskevaides Construction Group having been involved in FCO (and since may 1999 in British Trade International) trade promotion initiatives in the last three years.

TREASURY

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the proportion of (a) recipients of Working Families Tax Credit and (b) partners of the recipients of Working Families Tax Credit who earn within (i) 5 per cent. and (ii) 10 per cent. of the minimum wage; and if he will make a statement. [123069]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) on 8 March 2000, Official Report, column 771W.

Green Transport

Mr. Moore: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the key buildings for which his Department (a) submitted and (b) did not submit green transport plans by March. [122623]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 18 May 2000]: The Treasury submitted green transport plans in March 1999 covering the two buildings it occupies.

Euro

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the capital contribution which Britain would have to make to the European Central Bank on joining the euro. [123043]

Miss Melanie Johnson: As set out in Article 29 of the Statute of the European System of Central Banks and of the European Central Bank, each national central bank of participating member states contributes to the ECB's capital according to a weighting, based on their relative population and national income.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the total conversion costs for business of switching from the pound to the euro. [123044]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The level of costs would depend on the approach adopted by individual companies.

Cross-departmental Reviews

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place the terms of reference of the 13 cross-departmental reviews announced on 21 December 1999 in the Library; and if he will make a statement on their progress. [122785]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The terms of reference of the 13 cross-departmental reviews announced on 21 December 1999 have been placed in the Library, along with the terms of reference of the two cross-departmental reviews announced since December. The 15 reviews are making excellent progress. The 2000 Spending Review will report in due course.

Occupational Review

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to introduce tax relief for pensioners in receipt of low levels of occupational pensions which are subject to tax. [122095]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Only four out of 10 pensioners have any income tax to pay. People aged 65 or more receive a higher level of income tax personal allowance: for example, someone aged between 65 and 74 has a personal allowance of £5,790 in 2000–01, in contrast with the allowance for people under 65 of £4,385. The age-related personal allowances were increased by substantially more than statutory indexation in 1999–2000 and have risen in line with indexation this year. They are gradually withdrawn in cases where income exceeds £17,000 a year.

Endowment Mis-selling

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to require banks and insurance companies to compensate mortgage borrowers who have been the victims of endowment mis-selling. [123250]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 22 May 2000]: Where mortgage borrowers have been mis-sold an endowment, the regulators have powers to take disciplinary action which can result in firms being directed to make compensation. Mis-selling may arise from unsuitable advice, ie recommending that a borrower plans to repay a mortgage with a product which is either unsuitable for the purpose or unsuitable for the borrower's circumstances. The Government intend that the FSA will have comparable powers under the Financial Services and Markets Bill when enacted.

Recently many endowment providers have contacted their customers to tell them that their endowments may not yield enough to repay associated mortgages. This does not necessarily arise from mis-selling and reflects the reduction in inflation in response to the Government's policy to deliver a stable macroeconomic environment conducive to long term economic growth. When inflation falls, investment returns also reduce so that the cash proceeds of an endowment may be lower than initially expected, eg insufficient to repay an associated mortgage.

Changeover Plan

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much his Department plans to spend on the national changeover plan (a) in total, (b) in Wales and (c) in Ceredigion in this financial year; and if he will make a statement. [123454]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Information on changeover planning is contained in the second Outline National Changeover Plan, published on 9 March.

Landfill Tax

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the proceeds have been from the landfill tax in each of the last five financial years; how much of this has gone to (a) the Exchequer and (b) community projects; and what figures are estimated for the current year. [123481]

Mr. Timms: Total landfill tax receipts net of credits claimed in respect of contributions to environmental bodies, for each financial year since the introduction of the tax on 1 October 1996, are as follows.

£ million

Year	Total receipts
1996–97	112.8
1997–98	360.7
1998–99	333.1
1999–2000[1]	439

[1] Provisional

The revenue raised from landfill tax is general Government revenue not earmarked for particular purposes. However, funding is available through the Landfill Tax Environmental Bodies Credit Scheme to support projects which achieve lasting community and environmental benefits and advance more sustainable waste management practices. Under the scheme, landfill site operators who are registered for landfill tax may claim tax credits to the value of 90 per cent. of any contribution they make to an approved environmental body, subject to an overall cap of 20 per cent. of their annual tax liability, in each 'contribution year'.Total credits claimed in respect of contributions to the scheme, for each financial year since the introduction of the tax are as follows.

£ million

Year	Total credits
1996–97	0.1
1997–98	67.0
1998–99	68.8
1999–2000[1]	89

[1] Provisional

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the independent environmental trusts which have benefited the proceeds of the landfill tax in each of the last five years in each local authority area in England and Wales. [123482]

Mr. Timms: Information about which environmental bodies have received contributions under the Landfill Tax Environmental Bodies Credit Scheme is a matter for the Regulator for the scheme, ENTRUST. I have therefore asked them to provide such data as they hold and will place a copy of their response in the Library.

Road Fuel Tax

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much revenue has been raised from (a) tax and (b) VAT on road fuels in each of the last five financial years. [123479]

Mr. Timms: The amount of excise duty raised on road fuels for the last five years is published in Table K2 of "HM Customs and Excise Annual Report 1998–1999". The estimated amount of VAT raised on road fuels can be calculated from the amount of household expenditure on petrol and derv. This is shown in Table 6.1 of "Consumer Trends", published by the Office for National Statistics.

EU Contributions

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the impact of the fall in the value of the euro on the cost of the UK's contributions to the EU; and if he will make a statement. [123272]

Miss Melanie Johnson: In the long term the UK's gross contributions, in sterling and before abatement, remain largely unaffected by exchange rate movements.

Sub-post Offices

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list documents and publications produced by the Treasury, Bank of England and associated public bodies that are available at sub-post offices. [121629]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to her by the Minister for Competitiveness on 15 May 2000, Official Report, column 23W.

Premium Bond Prizes

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the number and value of unclaimed premium bond prizes for the last 12 months for which figures are available. [122328]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The number and value of unclaimed Premium Bond prizes each month from May 1999 to April 2000 is as follows:

Month	Number	Value (£)
May 1999	2,476	157,200
June 1999	2,484	156,600
July 1999	2,474	158,000
August 1999	2,571	167,400
September 1999	2,502	160,850
October 1999	2,478	174,850
November 1999	2,495	171,700
December 1999	2,560	181,270
January 2000	2,508	173,900
February 2000	2,608	181,450
March 2000	2,594	193,900
April 2000	2,648	194,850

NORTHERN IRELAND

Biodiversity

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of the Northern Ireland Structural Funds Plan 2000–06 will be allocated to nature conservation projects; how much of this will be allocated to (a) projects relating to the Draft Northern Ireland Biodiversity Strategy and (b) the protection and restoration of Northern Ireland's Natura 2000 network; and if he will make a statement. [122097]

Mr. Ingram: Negotiations on the Northern Ireland Structural Funds 2000–06 and the Community Support Framework are ongoing with the European Commission and allocations to specific areas of spend will not be known until Programme Complements have been determined by the yet-to-be-appointed Monitoring Committees. The information requested is therefore not available.

Consideration is being given to including in the Structural Funds Plan measures for environmental enhancement which could embrace projects to benefit both biodiversity and Northern Ireland's Natura 2000 network.

Saville Inquiry

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what were the total sums spent in each financial year, up to 30 April in the current year, on the Saville Inquiry into the events in Londonderry on 30 January 1972, broken down into (a) salaries of staff, (b) travel and subsistence, (c) accommodation, (d) hearing and witness costs, (e) fees to solicitors representing those killed and others, (f) fees to barristers representing those killed and others, (g) IT and communications and (h) miscellaneous, including general office expenditure. [121359]

Mr. Ingram: Expenditure on the Bloody Sunday Inquiry is summarised in the table, broken down into the subheadings requested. Figures are currently available only up to the end of the financial year (31 March 2000) and not the end of April as requested. The figures for moneys paid to solicitors and barristers cannot readily be provided separately, nor can the payments for their professional services be readily separated from other expenses. However, these amounts have been split between payments to lawyers representing the families and payments to other lawyers, including Counsel to the Inquiry.

Civil Servants

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants, excluding members of the senior Civil Service, in his Department for 1999–2000; and to what extent the pay awards were staged. [121655]

Mr. Mandelson: The headline pay settlement for 1999–2000 in the Northern Ireland Office was 2.5 per cent. on the pay bill and, with the additional funds from staff turnover, staff in post received performance-related increases averaging 3.62 per cent. The increases were not staged.

Shipbuilding

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what recent measures he has taken to support the shipbuilding industry in Belfast. [122772]

Mr. Ingram: Following the recent announcement by Harland and Wolff of a conditional order for up to six Roll on/Roll off passenger vessels, the Company and the Government remain in close contact on a number of detailed matters arising from that business. The Government will continue to assist Harland and Wolff in whatever way they can to safeguard employment and skills at the Belfast shipyard and to help it seek out profitable new work there. Ministers and Departments in Northern Ireland have, in recent weeks, had a series of meetings with the company, trades unions and others to discuss current shipbuilding issues and the way ahead for the shipyard. That important work will continue.

Housing Debt

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the total is of housing debt owned by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. [123016]

Mr. George Howarth: The Northern Ireland Housing Executive's outstanding loan debt at 31 March 2000 is £1,654,277,867 (£1.654 billion).

DVLNI

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what performance targets have been set for Driver and Vehicle Licensing Northern Ireland in 2000–01. [123784]

Mr. George Howarth: For 2000–01, the following key performance targets have been set for the Agency:

Neurology Services

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what consultations he has had with (a) medical (b) patient and (c) other organisations as part of the review of the funding of specialised neurology services; [122579]

(2) what representations he has received from (a) medical, (b) patient and (c) other organisations as part of the review into the funding of specialised neurology services. [122580]

Mr. Denham: We are currently considering how best to undertake an independent review of the evidence for the use of neurostimulator implants in the treatment of severe Parkinson's Disease and we are not in a position at the moment to undertake consultations. Once we have established the best mechanism for taking this work forward we will then consult with the relevant bodies.

Since February 2000 we have responded to 35 representations in the form of ministerial correspondence regarding specialised neurology treatments. These representations are categorised as follows:

(a) Medical: 6

(b) Patients: 1

(c) Other organisations: 25 (generally the Parkinson's Disease Society and its local branches)

(d) Hon. Members' constituents: 3 (whether clinician or patient is unknown)

In addition, we have responded to three pieces of ministerial correspondence about the use of out of area treatments to fund specialised treatments in general.

Officials regularly meet with representatives from a range of the relevant voluntary and patient organisations.

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in implementing service agreements for neurosurgery and specialist neurology in the Eastern region. [122578]

Mr. Denham: The Eastern Region Specialised Services Commissioning Group is reviewing the arrangements for specialised neurosciences in the light of the two recent national reports on standards and models of care.

In the meantime, health authorities in the Eastern region have no plans to change existing commissioning arrangements.

Secondments

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) the commercial companies which have paid staff on secondment to his Department and (b) the projects on which each secondee is working. [122909]

Ms Stuart: Interchange is a key component of the reform agenda. The Modernising Government White Paper committed us to increasing interchange, in particular by bringing in more people on secondment and sending more people out. Secondments and attachments are part of the Interchange Initiative which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. All sectors of the economy are involved: voluntary, education, health, public and private.

Central records are held on five secondments from the private sector.

Human Vaccines (BSE)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in what year the first vaccine was used on humans which may have utilised bovine material from BSE-infected cows in the early stage of manufacture. [122973]

Yvette Cooper: This information is not available because the precise date of the emergence of BSE in cattle is not known and it is also not known if bovine material for use in the manufacture of vaccines was taken from BSE-infected cattle.

Waiting Lists (Mid Essex)

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each month from March 1997 until the latest available period the total number of people (a) waiting for hospital treatment and (b) waiting more than 12 months for hospital treatment in the Mid Essex Hospital Trust area. [122797]

Mr. Denham: The total number of patients waiting and the number of patients waiting over 12 months for hospital treatment at Mid Essex Hospital Services National Health Service Trust for each month from March 1997 until March 2000 (the latest available information) is shown in the table.

Dioxins

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what research has been undertaken or evaluated by his Department to establish the health risks to the public posed by dioxins in the environment; [123510]

(2) if links have been established between dioxins and cancer in humans; [123511]

(3) what assessment he has made of the incidence of illnesses in the United Kingdom linked to dioxins (a) currently and (b) in 1995. [123480]

Yvette Cooper: The Department and the Food Standards Agency seek advice on the health implications of dioxins from the independent expert advisory Committees on the Toxicity and on the Carcinogenicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment. The Committee on Toxicity has evaluated the scientific data on dioxins on a number of occasions, most recently in 1995. The evaluation can be found in the 1995 Annual Report of the Committee which is available in the Library. The Committee on Carcinogenicity concluded in 1998 that it would be prudent to consider one specific dioxin, 2, 3, 7, 8-tetrachlorodibenzo-p-dioxin, as a "probable weak human carcinogen". The Committee's statement can be found on the Department's Internet site www.doh.gov.uk/coc.htm, and in the 1998 Annual Report.

The Food Standards Agency funds research on dioxin in food and staff in the Agency actively contribute to the work of the European Commission Scientific Committee on Food Task Force on Dioxins. The Medical Research Council, which is the main agency through which Government supports research on the causes and treatment of disease, also funds research on dioxin as part of a programme on genetic susceptibility and resistance to xenobiotics.

No specific assessment has been made of the incidence of illnesses in the United Kingdom linked to dioxins.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Driving Licences

Mr. Darvill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many applications for renewal of driving licences accompanied by Form D4 medical reports were received by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency in (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999. [122825]

Mr. Hill: The number of applications received by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency in 1997, 1998 and 1999 for renewal of driving licences accompanied by a D4 medical report form, was as follows:

1997: 147,677

1999: 58,591.

Mr. Darvill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on how many days during (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999 has the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency experienced exceptional heavy workloads giving rise to delays in issuing renewal driving licences where applications for renewal were accompanied by Form D4 medical reports. [122824]

Mr. Hill: Information about the number of days during 1997, 1998 and 1999 that the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency experienced delays in issuing renewal driving licences accompanied by a D4 medical report is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, this type of transaction is given high priority at all times.

Mr. Darvill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many applications for renewal of driving licences accompanied by Form D4 medical reports were received by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency in (a) April, (b) May, (c) June, (d) July , (e) August and (f) September 1999. [122829]

Mr. Hill: The number of applications processed by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency in April, May June, July, August and September 1999 for renewal of driving licences accompanied by a D4 medical report form was as follows:

Month	Applications
April	5,865
May	4,994
June	5,364
July	4,763
August	4,331
September	4,914

Mr. Darvill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the average period of time that the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency took to issue renewal driving licences when the application for renewal was accompanied by a Form D4 medical report in (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999. [122826]

Mr. Hill: The average time taken by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency in 1997, 1998 and 1999 to renew driving licenses accompanied by a D4 medical report form is published in the Agency's Corporate and Business Plans and was as follows:

	Working days
	Target	Actual
1997	10	8
1998	9	8
1999	9	8

Housing

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to increase housing investment over the next five years; and if he will make a statement. [123009]

Mr. Mullin: When this Government came to power they inherited spending plans under which capital investment in housing was set to fall from £1.54 billion in 1997–98 to £1.37 billion by 1999–2000. We took early action to reverse this decline through our Capital Receipts Initiative and the Comprehensive Spending Review. As a result, we are making available nearly £5 billion extra over the life of this Parliament. In 2001–02, capital investment in housing will be over £3 billion—double the level we inherited in 1997–98. Our current Spending Review will determine investment levels in future years and decisions will be announced in the summer.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the link between investment in housing and directly and indirectly related employment creation. [123010]

Mr. Mullin: There are a number of important links between housing and employment, many of which are set out in our Housing Green Paper, "Quality and Choice: A decent home for all". Housing investment supports employment in the construction industry, while the provision of decent homes enhances people's educational attainment and employment opportunities. The Government are investing nearly £5 billion extra in housing over the life of this Parliament.

Policies for housing and employment are being integrated through regional planning guidance which takes account of Regional Development Agencies' economic strategies and regional housing statements.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the priorities for housing in this year's comprehensive spending review. [123008]

Mr. Mullin: Our aim is to offer everyone the opportunity of a decent home, so promoting social cohesion, well-being and self-dependence. Our priorities are set out in the Housing Green Paper, "Quality and Choice: A decent home for all"—widely recognised as the most comprehensive review of housing for over 20 years.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will take steps to develop action zones in areas where the market has failed to provide sufficient housing in order to promote the development of additional housing. [123011]

Mr. Mullin: The Government are not aware of any areas where the market is failing to provide a sufficient amount of housing but we are aware of examples where housing is not necessarily of the right quality or design, and where it does not meet the most urgent needs of the community. That is why we have put in place the range of policies set out in revised Planning Policy Guidance for housing—PPG3—and our Housing Green Paper, "Quality and Choice: A decent home for all". Our policies encourage more sustainable patterns of development, improvements in quality and design, better use of existing housing, and the provision of more affordable housing.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate the number of additional affordable homes required in each of the next five years; and how many are currently provided for under the Housing Corporation Programme and the local authority social housing grant. [123012]

Mr. Mullin: We do not make national estimates of housing need, since these are unable to adequately reflect the diversity of needs and priorities at the local level. The Housing Corporation forecast that the Approved Development Programme will provide around 18,000 homes for rent, and 4,000 homes for sale on a low cost basis in 2000–01. The Housing Corporation also forecast around 11,000 completions in 2000–01 through Local Authority Social Housing Grant.

Marine Surveyors

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if his Department will ensure that practising marine surveyors are professionally qualified and covered by professional indemnity insurance. [123006]

Mr. Hill: Marine surveyors are required to hold professional qualifications before they can apply to join the Maritime and Coastguard Agency (MCA—an executive Agency of my Department). Their training needs are reviewed on an annual basis as part of the MCA's performance appraisal and development system to ensure they remain up to date and qualified for the jobs they are required to undertake.

Servants of the Crown are not covered by professional indemnity insurance. The Crown is its own insurer and does not effect insurance.

Landfill Sites, Devon

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps his Department plans to take concerning the lack of a waste strategy plan for landfill sites in Devon after 2007. [123077]

Mr. Meacher: Devon county council is preparing a Waste Local Plan for Devon to cover the period up to 2011 (the Plan will not include the administrative areas of Plymouth City council, Torbay council and Dartmoor National Park Authority as they will be covered by the emerging Local Plans of those authorities).

In October 1998, the county council consulted interested parties about the draft Waste Local Plan which contained policies for waste disposal by landfill. In their response to the consultation, the Government Office for the South-West commented that:

> The Plan does not convey a clear sense of the spatial strategy, or of the preferred mix of waste management methods, and there are no specific development proposals or land allocations, or clear locational guidance. Government policy advises that local plans need both to set out the authority's policies for the control of development and to make proposals for the development of land and to allocate land for specific purposes. It is important to confront these issues, because the Plan indicates that important choices will need to be implemented well within the plan period to 2011. The Plan should therefore make those choices and propose the key developments necessary to implement them.

The Plan will be deposited for public consultation in the autumn; if a public local inquiry is necessary it is likely to take place in the autumn of 2001, and the Plan is expected to be adopted in the summer of 2003. The county council will review the Plan every five years in order to take account of evolving technology, any revised planning policies and new legislation.

Gas Safety

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the average time taken to report on incidents involving (a) gas explosions and (b) fires in the last 12 months for which statistics are available. [123042]

Mr. Meacher: On the assumption that the question refers to the average time taken by HSE inspectors to report on such incidents following investigation, the answer is that data are not maintained that would provide an average time for the completion of a report. The time taken depends on the nature of the incident and the complexity of the investigation; one recent example has taken five months while another was completed in 48 hours.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what research he has commissioned into ways of improving gas safety. [123040]

Mr. Meacher: HSE is making a contribution towards the costs of the following research projects carried out by British Gas Technology (BGT) under the auspices of the Joint Industry Programme:

(i) compartment ventilation

(ii) vitiation modelling

(iii) open flue interaction

(iv) reliability of CO alarms

(v) information dissemination

(vi) emergency response

(vii) incident data.

Research has been commissioned separately by HSE on:

(i) the reliability of CO detectors (BGT)

(ii) incident data (BGT)

(iii) test methods for room-sealed appliance seals (BGT)

(iv) flue performance (at BRE).

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what procedures exist to ensure that lessons learnt from inquiries into gas explosions are circulated to local authorities, housing associations, and those involved in gas installations. [123038]

Mr. Meacher: It is normal practice to publish public inquiry reports, for example those which covered gas explosions at Ronan Point and Putney. These and other serious accident investigations inform the development of regulatory controls governing gas installation and use, and related guidance for duty holders.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what funding his Department has allocated in the current year for research into gas safety. [123041]

Mr. Meacher: For the financial year 2000–01, £307,000 has been allocated by HSE for gas safety research.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when was the last time his Department issued guidelines to local authorities, housing associations and house builders on safety relating to gas installations. [123039]

Mr. Meacher: The Health and Safety Commission approved on 12 October 1998 a Code of Practice giving practical guidance on complying with the provisions of the Gas Safety (Installation and Use) Regulations 1998. Guidelines were issued to local authority enforcement officers on the enforcement of the Regulations in assigned premises in November 1999.

In addition, the Building Regulations make requirements for the safe accommodation of combustion installations in buildings. Approved Document J, which supports the legal requirements, gives technical guidance on some ways of achieving compliance when installing gas combustion systems; this would include following the recommendations in certain British Standards. Approved Document J was last amended in 1989, and the current edition came into effect on 1 April 1990.

Common Land

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what reasons underlay the decision not to include the New Forest in the reports commissioned by his Department entitled "Greater Protection and Better Management of Common Land and Good Practice Guide on Managing the use of Common Land". [123256]

Mr. Mullin: These two reports were not aimed at any specific commons, but were intended to cover issues and problems arising on the majority of common land throughout England and Wales.

The publications will be less relevant to those commons which benefit from their own legislation, and particularly those such as the New Forest which are exempted from registration under the Commons Registration Act 1965. It will be a matter for consideration how far, if at all, any new legislation should apply to those commons, and we will naturally listen to views in this respect. The advice contained in the Good Practice Guide may be applied in the New Forest, provided it is consistent with local legislation. Similarly, those who administer that legislation may pursue legislative changes consistent with those proposed in the consultation paper Greater Protection and Better Management of Common Land in England and Wales.

Methyl Tertiary Butyl Ether

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the recommended limit is of methyl tertiary butyl ether (ug/L) in drinking water, and what monitoring the Drinking Water Inspectorate has made of drinking water supplies to detect methyl tertiary butyl ether. [123445]

Mr. Mullin: There is no standard for methyl tertiary butyl ether (MTBE) in drinking water. MTBE is detected in drinking water by its odour/taste at concentrations much lower than concentrations that would be a risk to health. Because MTBE has the potential to contaminate groundwater sources used for drinking water supply, the Drinking Water Inspectorate has checked the monitoring for MTBE carried out by water companies. Apart from one site specific incident in 1990 which resulted in the water company treating water to remove MTBE, this monitoring has not revealed a problem. The water companies are aware of the potential problems and remain vigilant. The Inspectorate is liaising with the Environment Agency on MTBE.

Chinese Herbal Medicines

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he takes to ensure Chinese herbal medicines on sale do not contain ingredients derived from endangered species. [122921]

Mr. Mullin: The Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species (CITES), which regulates and sometimes bans trade in endangered species including plants, is strictly implemented in the UK under both European and National legislation. Medicines derived from species listed on Appendix II or III of the Convention need an import permit issued by my Department before they can enter the country. Permits will not normally be issued for products containing the most endangered species listed on the Convention's Appendix I. Any products that are derived from, or even claim to be derived from, wild taken Appendix I specimens will not normally be allowed on sale in the UK.

The CITES Convention is actively enforced by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise and the Police who work together with my Department, other government departments and certain non-governmental organisations on the Government's Partnership for Action against Wildlife Crime. My Department produces general guidance on the Convention and has recently launched a dedicated website on CITES. We have also worked with the enforcement agencies to produce specialist material including leaflets, posters and videos aimed directly at Britain's Chinese speaking community. We are currently working on new guidance, to be produced in English and Chinese, for practitioners and retailers of traditional Chinese medicines and have signalled our intention to work with Middlesex University on new scientific research into the use of alternatives to replace endangered species contained in traditional medicines.

Plywood Timber

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proportion of the Government's plywood timber procurement originated in (a) Indonesia and (b) the Brazilian Amazon in the last three years. [123160]

Mr. Mullin: The information requested is not held centrally and cannot be provided without incurring disproportionate cost.

St. John's Wood Station

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he was consulted or informed in advance by London Underground about its plans to place restrictions for several hours per day on use of St. John's Wood Underground Station during the test match at Lords and on 10 June; if he will call for a report from London Underground on the cost of (a) additional staff at that station during this period and (b) buses used to provide alternative transport; what action has been taken in respect of the London Underground employees responsible for this situation; and if he will ensure that closures of this nature are not repeated. [123455]

Mr. Hill: The Secretary of State was informed in advance about the proposed restrictions at St. John's Wood. These are operational matters for London Underground and the Secretary of State does not propose to call for any further report. While we regret the inconvenience caused by the restrictions we recognise that London Underground must make decisions about station closures which give the highest regard to passenger safety.

Incinerators

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the Government's criteria are for the siting of new incinerators. [123500]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The building of new incinerators will normally require the grant of planning permission from the waste planning authority under the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 (as amended) and an authorisation from the Environment Agency under the Environmental Protection Act 1990. Government guidance on the planning considerations which should be taken into account in the siting of new incinerators is contained in Planning Policy Guidance Note 10 "Planning and Waste Management".

Longbridge Rover Plant

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has held with the West Midlands Development Agency on the future of the Longbridge Rover plant. [123477]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Discussions on the future of the Longbridge Rover plant have been undertaken by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. My right hon. Friend established a Task Force to assess the impact of Rover restructuring on the West Midlands economy. He appointed Alex Stephenson, the Chairman of Advantage West Midlands, as Chairman of the Task Force, and received an interim report in April. My right hon. Friend met with the Task Force on two occasions, and is due to meet with them before they submit their final report in June. The Government Office for the West Midlands is involved in working with the Task Force, and helping to co-ordinate effort across a number of Government Departments.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what part was played by West Midlands RDA in connection with the recent negotiations over the Longbridge Rover plant. [123478]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Negotiations for the sale of the Rover Group were a matter for the owners, BMW, and prospective bidders. The West Midlands RDA, Advantage West Midlands, was not involved in those negotiations.

However, Advantage West Midlands supported the Rover Task Force established by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. Representatives of AWM, on behalf of the Task Force, were involved in discussions with BMW and the bidders about their proposals, in order to understand the likely impact on the regional economy.

"Environmental Snapshot for the East of England"

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) for what reason figure 19 on page 13 of the Environment Agency's document, "Environmental Snapshot for the East of England", does not include landfill sites in Basildon and Thurrock; and if he will make a statement; [123385]

(2) what the cost was of the production of the Environment Agency's document, "Environmental Snapshot for the East of England"; and who its author was; [123271]

(3) for what reason figure 1 on page 2 of the Environment Agency's document, "Environmental Snapshot for the East of England", does not include the Unitary Borough of Thurrock. [123270]

Mr. Mullin: The omission of the Unitary Borough of Thurrock and the landfill sites in Basildon and Thurrock was an oversight, due to an editorial error. This has already been brought to the attention of the Environment Agency by local government and the Agency will amend the snapshot when it publishes the second edition in September 2000.

The cost of production of the "Environmental Snapshot for the East of England" was £4,470. The report was produced by Robert Runcie, Regional Director of the Environment Agency (Anglian Region).

Heathrow Airport

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on how many occasions this year a mixture of landings and take-offs on the same runway has been allowed at Heathrow Airport because of congestion. [123259]

Mr. Mullin: The Tactically Enhanced Arrival Measures (TEAM) procedure at Heathrow involves the use of the departure runway to increase arrival rates and reduce holding delays. The procedure is approved only when it can be accommodated within the Heathrow Departure air traffic controllers' workload.

For environmental reasons, controllers are required to record the occasions on which the TEAM procedure is implemented. During the period 1 January to 18 May the TEAM procedure was implemented on the westerly runways at Heathrow on 53 occasions.

In accordance with local environmental restrictions, when the easterly runways are in use, arriving aircraft are permitted to use either of the parallel runways, Runway 09 Right or Runway 09 Left, at any time without restriction during the majority of the operating day. For environmental reasons, Runway 09R is normally used for all departures.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact of the proposed Terminal 5 on the number of air traffic movements at Heathrow Airport. [123260]

Mr. Mullin: This matter was explored fully at the public inquiry into BAA's planning application for a fifth terminal at Heathrow Airport and because of the Secretary of State's quasi-judicial role in the planning system, it would not be appropriate to comment on the application or its implications until the inspector's report has been received and carefully considered.

Correspondence

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will reply to the letter from the hon. Member for West Derbyshire, dated 16 March 2000, regarding Mr. D. Williams of Kirk Ireton. [123306]

Mr. Mullin: This letter was sent for advice in March. Due to a clerical error the advice was delayed. However, I have now sent the hon. Member a full reply.

North Wales Main Line

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will verify the accuracy of Virgin Trains' commercial study of the electrification of the North Wales mainline by using external consultants. [123458]

Mr. Hill: The Franchising Director did use external consultants to satisfy himself of the validity of the Virgin study.

Local Authority Housing

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on progress towards the introduction of the new financial framework for local authority housing. [123709]

Mr. Raynsford: My right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and the Regions announced on 22 June 1999, Official Report, column 337W, that the Government intended to proceed with their proposals for the introduction of a new financial framework for local authority housing. Our Housing Green Paper "Quality and Choice: A Decent Home for All" repeated that commitment. The new financial framework will place authorities' accounts on a more businesslike footing and encourage more efficient investment in the stock. Together with Best Value, it will help ensure that local authority housing assets are managed in a way which will ensure that the resources which have been and will continue to be invested in them provide good-quality homes which reflect tenants' wishes and needs.

Our intention remains to introduce the new financial framework from 1 April 2001 with the exception of removing rent rebates from the HRA where primary legislation is needed. We are providing resources through HRA subsidy to help authorities with initial costs. Over recent months we have undertaken consultation on a number of detailed aspects of the new system and my officials have continued to work closely with local government and others. Significant progress has been made and my officials are today writing to local authorities with detailed material on various aspects of the change. The material is also being made available in the Library of the House and will shortly be available on the Department's website.

We have consulted on four particular topics since my right hon. Friend's announcement of 22 June. On stock valuation, we are today publishing the final version of the guidance. There was general support for the approach proposed based on the identification and valuation of beacon properties. The final version of the guidance reflects a number of detailed comments made in response to consultation. It will help authorities in preparing the valuations which will be necessary for the new-style accounts.

On business planning, there has been a general welcome for the concept. We will be publishing final guidance taking account of comments made in response to consultation in June; authorities will be expected to produce initial business plans by 31 October.

On the methodology for calculating the Major Repairs Allowance, we have carefully considered the comments made and are sending authorities a detailed list of our responses. We have made some adjustments to the assumptions underpinning the calculations as a result of the consultation process. The Major Repairs Allowance will be part of HRA subsidy from April 2001, and will form part of our normal consultation on subsidy later this year. All this material, and the guidance on shadow accounts which the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy expect to be issuing in June, will help authorities prepare for the new regime.

On removal of rent rebates from the HRA, there was general support for the principle involved. The majority of respondents agreed that it was right to regard local authority housing as a national programme and that assumed surpluses in authorities' housing accounts should be retained within housing and redistributed through a pooling mechanism. Some authorities in negative subsidy have expressed particular concerns about the impact of the new system, and the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), announced on 4 April 2000, Official Report, column 810, that we would introduce transitional arrangements for authorities in negative subsidy from 2001. We will be consulting on the details of the transitional measures.

I am grateful for the positive and helpful contribution that local authorities have made to the development of these important proposals. I hope that they will approach their implementation in the same way.

Councils (Beacon Status)

Mr. Hope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will invite councils to apply for beacon status. [123785]

Ms Armstrong: We will publish tomorrow an Application Brochure, inviting councils to apply for beacon status by 25 July. Copies of the brochure will be placed in the Libraries of the House.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

School Security

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what was the total amount spent by schools on security measures in 1999 (a) by constituency and (b) by local education authority; [123134]

(2) how much the Government have awarded to local education authorities in each year since 1995 for schools to (a) implement security reviews and (b) undertake measures to make their premises more secure. [123167]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Department does not collect information in the level of detail requested. Expenditure by each local education authority in England supported by the Government's Standards Fund grant for school security, which is allocated directly to authorities, is shown in Table 1 for 1998–99, the latest year for which outturn information is available, along with the total sums available to authorities for 1999–2000.

Specific grants for school security measures have been made available since 1997–98, following a recommendation from the Government's Working Group on School Security. To date, £94 million has been made available to support a variety of security measures in schools in England, to help make a safer environment for pupils and staff. A breakdown, by year, of this total funding is given in Table 2.

Notes:
1. GEST and the Standards Fund grants for school security had grant rates. This means Government provide the set grant rate and local education authorities are required to contribute the remainder in order to take up the grant.
2. In 1997–98 and 1998–99, an additional £2 million per year was made available to schools in the grant-maintained sector via the Funding Agency for Schools.
3. The Standards Fund school security grant is allocated to local education authorities by formula and can be used on a variety of physical measures and on security related training for staff and governors. Local education authorities are required to devolve at least 70 per cent. of their grant allocation to schools, while being allowed to retain a maximum of 30 per cent. of their allocation to co-ordinate a training programme for staff and governors.

Pre-school Education

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many early childhood education places are provided for four-year-olds by maintained sector providers in each local education authority as part of their agreed Early Years Childcare and Education Development Partnerships. Ms Hodge: The information is not available in the form requested. The latest estimates of the number of four-year-olds educated in maintained nursery and primary schools by local education authority area is shown in the following table.

Age Diversity

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the impact of the code of practice on age diversity in employment on reducing discrimination in the workplace. [122524]

Ms Hodge: The Government have been encouraged by the high level of interest shown by employers, the media, other organisations and individuals in age diversity since the publication of the Code and we have made it clear that the effectiveness of the Code on reducing age discrimination in the workplace will be fully evaluated, with comprehensive findings published early next year.

To this effect an independent organisation, NOP (National Opinion Polls) has been commissioned to carry out a large scale research project in three stages, to help evaluate the effectiveness the Code is having on reducing discrimination. We will be publishing the first and second stage findings of the evaluation in June.

Lone Parents

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much was spent in each year on the New Deal for Lone Parents; and how many lone parents have benefited from this scheme in each year. [122602]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 18 May 2000]: The full national New Deal for Lone Parents (Phase 3) was implemented on 26 October 1998. It had already been operating in eight prototype areas from July 1997 (Phase 1), and nationally for new and repeat claimants from 6 April 1998 (Phase 2).

The cost of implementing the New Deal for Lone Parents (NDLP) prototype phase 1 areas was £7.9 million. The cost of implementing the national programme has been £58.6 million—broken down as £0.311 million in 1997–98, £22.3 million in 1998–99 and £36 million in 1999–2000. The figure for 1999–2000 is provisional.

Both sums include the cost of project management, the development and provision of IT support, publicity, the cost of evaluation and the costs of NDLP Innovative Pilots.

The numbers of lone parents who have benefited from the scheme are set out in the following table.

	Prototype phase 1 [1]	Phase 2 [2]	National programme [3]

Dissection

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what his policy is in respect of the practice of dissecting animals for educational purposes in (a) maintained and (b) independent schools. [122941]

Jacqui Smith: There is no requirement in the National Curriculum for dissection to be carried out although individual teachers may choose to use dissection to illustrate various aspects of the science curriculum. In the key stage 3 schemes of work which have been published recently by the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority, organ dissection is suggested as one of a range of possible teaching activities in some contexts. Where dissection is used, teachers in both state and private schools must always take account of potential threats to the well-being of pupils, particularly in relation to health and safety, religious or ethnic background and individual sensitivities. GCSE and A level exam boards no longer require pupils to undertake dissection for assessment and there should therefore be no pressure on pupils to dissect or watch a dissection. Dissection of living vertebrates and bovine eyeballs is banned in all schools and further directives or advice may be given to teachers by their employers. In maintained schools this is provided by the local education authority, in foundation and voluntary aided schools by the governing body and in private schools by the head teacher or governing body.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Human Rights

38. Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the President of the Council what consultations she has held about terms of reference for the Joint Committee on Human Rights. [121917]

Mr. Tipping: Preliminary consultations on principle have taken place between the usual channels. The House will, of course, have the opportunity to debate the proposed Standing Orders in due course, and I will ensure the motions appear well before the debate. The Government expect to propose very broad terms of reference for the Committee.

Trade Unions

39. Angela Smith: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, when the Commission last met representatives of the recognised trade unions in the House. [121918]

Mr. Kirkwood: It is not the practice of the Commission to engage in direct negotiations with the trade unions. This function has been delegated to the Board of Management; senior staff are in frequent touch with trade union representatives.

Westminster Hall

40. Miss McIntosh: To ask the President of the Council what recent representations she has received on proceedings in Westminster Hall. [121919]

Mrs. Beckett: I have received no recent direct representations.

43. Mr. Paterson: To ask the President of the Council if she will make a statement on the (a) capital and (b) running costs of the Westminster Hall experiment to date. [121922]

Mrs. Beckett: The capital costs of refurbishment of the Grand Committee Room, brought forward to allow Westminster Hall to function, were given by the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee as £882,000, Official Report, 23 November 1999, column 57W. It is not possible to state precisely how much of this sum is directly attributable to Westminster Hall; some £30,000 was spent on furniture, and a proportion of the professional fees of £71,000 went towards design services. For running costs, I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given on 20 March 2000, Official Report, column 456W.

Voting Methods

41. Jean Corston: To ask the President of the Council if she will make a statement on proposals for reform of the voting methods of the House. [121920]

Mr. Tipping: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Helen Jackson), Official Report, column 860.

Oral Questions

42. Mr. David Heath: To ask the President of the Council if she will recommend to the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons that it examines the benefits of reducing the period between tabling oral questions to Ministers and the date for answer. [121921]

Mrs. Beckett: I have no plans to do so.

Modernisation Committee

44. Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the President of the Council if she will make a statement on the progress made to date on reforms proposed by the Modernisation Committee. [121923]

Mrs. Beckett: A full analysis of the recommendations of the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons and their implementation is set out in that Committee's First Special Report of Session 1998–99, HC 865. Since that report was published, the Royal Parks (Trading) Bill has been debated in Standing Committee so 48 of the 56 recommendations of the Committee have now been implemented in whole or in part.

Voicemail

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Chairman of the Information Committee, pursuant to his answer of 4 May 2000, Official Report, column 215W, on voicemail, for what reason he was not able to provide the installation cost; and on what basis the service cost of £92,000 was calculated. [122536]

Mr. Allan: I am advised by the Head of Telecommunications that the voicemail facility currently used by Parliament is purchased as a service from the Central Computing and Telecommunications Agency (CCTA). Since it is a service, and since it is provided globally via Parliament's voice network, there are no site specific installation costs.

The sum of £92,000 can be broken down as follows: megastream rental £8,225 (this provides the connection between Parliament's voice network and the external CCTA managed voicemail system); mailbox rental £37,900 (annual cost—the last quarter has been estimated); applications development and manual £800; and training £45,330.

I am advised that training costs are expected to fall in the current financial year, since the first and major tranche of roll-out to new users is now completed. Mailbox rental costs are expected to increase as the majority of mailboxes will now incur full-year rental costs.

Animal Welfare

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chairman of the Catering Committee what account his Committee takes of animal welfare issues in determining purchasing policy. [122917]

Mr. Dennis Turner: Purchasing policy is essentially a matter for the Refreshment Department. However, I am advised by the Director of Catering Services that the Department's purchasing guidelines include the following provisions related to animal welfare:

1. fresh meats must be sourced from livestock raised under an accredited "farm assurance scheme". Such schemes ensure that all stock is reared according to good animal husbandry and welfare practices. The Department periodically tests the claims of suppliers by requiring them to provide documentary evidence tracing the cut of meat delivered back to source and, where possible, to the animal;
2. fresh meat suppliers must meet standards set by the Meat and Livestock Commission, who provide both detailed and general advice to the Department about animal welfare issues in the meat industry;
3. veal must be from calves raised in group housing systems, not crate systems;

4. pigmeat supplied to the Department must be from pigs raised in loose-housed systems, not stall and tether systems; and

5. eggs must be from free-range flocks. The supplier is licensed under the RSPCA's Freedom Food Scheme.

The Refreshment Department consults widely with other organisations to ensure that its purchasing guidelines are regularly and authoritatively reviewed. In addition to working closely with the Meat and Livestock Commission, the Department is a member of the Soil Association, and periodically seeks advice from bodies such as the Freedom Food Association, Compassion in World Farming and the NFU.

Voting Procedures

Mr. Baker: To ask the President of the Council if she will propose to the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons that it examine changes to the House's voting procedures which would allow abstentions to be recorded. [121915]

Mrs. Beckett: The Modernisation Committee may examine this as part of its work on electronic voting.

CABINET OFFICE

Government Car Service

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what proportion of cars bought by the Government car service since May 1997 have been Rovers. [120862]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Since May 1997 the Government Car and Despatch Agency has purchased 16 Rovers. Six were purchased in the financial year 1996–97.

Civil Service Code

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when it is intended to introduce a Bill to give statutory basis to the Civil Service Code. [123281]

Marjorie Mowlam: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) on 8 May 2000, Official Report, column 215W.

People's Panel

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when the report of the first evaluation of the People's Panel will be published; and if she will make a statement. [123708]

Mr. Ian McCartney: I have today placed copies of the first report on the evaluation of the People's Panel in the Libraries of the House. The report is also available on the People's Panel website at www.servicefirst.gov.uk.

Business Regulation Costs

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make it her policy to undertake an annual audit of the cost to business of regulations and to publish the result. [123305]

Mr. Stringer: All regulatory proposals likely to have a significant cost or benefit to business are subject to Regulatory Impact Assessment. These assessments are published by Departments and placed in the Libraries of the House. In addition, a series of twice yearly Command Papers, entitled Regulatory Impact Assessments, list the assessments for each six month period.

SCOTLAND

Honours System

5. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received about the honours system in Scotland. [121876]

Dr. Reid: I have received only one letter making representations about the honours system in Scotland.

New Deal

6. Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the most recent figures on the take-up of the new deal in Scotland. [121877]

Dr. Reid: Take-up of the New Deal in Scotland is good. 1,700 people joined the New Deal for Young People in February, bringing the number of starts to 48,400 since the introduction of the programme.

7. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the impact of the new deal on employment in Clydebank and Milngavie. [121878]

Dr. Reid: The New Deal is making a significant impact, with employment in Scotland at its highest level since 1966.

9. Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had about the application of New Deal programmes in Scottish football clubs. [121880]

Dr. Reid: I have regular discussions about the New Deal. The New Deal is good news for all jobseekers including those who want to work within football clubs. Hearts, Hibernian, Kilmarnock, Dunfermline, Raith Rovers, Dundee, Livingston, Ross County and Dumbarton Football Clubs participate in the New Deal as employers.

Ferry Services

8. Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has made to the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions regarding ferry services between Scotland and Northern Ireland. [121879]

Mr. Wilson: My right hon. Friend has frequent contact with the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on a number of issues including ferry services between Scotland and Northern Ireland.

12. Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with the Scottish Executive on the tender of Caledonian MacBrayne's ferry services under article 87.1 of the EC treaty and the 1992 European Regulations on Maritime Transport (Council Regulation 3577/92); and if he will make a statement. [121884]

Mr. Wilson: My right hon. Friend has discussions with the Scottish Executive on a number of issues including issues relating to ferry services.

Unemployment

10. Mr. Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to assist the unemployed in Scotland to take up available jobs. [121881]

Mr. Wilson: The Secretary of State and I take a close interest in assisting unemployed people in Scotland find work and in the New Deal. We frequently carry out New Deal engagements and take every opportunity to publicise its success and to encourage employers to participate. The Secretary of State wrote on 4 May encouraging all Scottish Members to work closely with the Employment Service to help bring together jobseekers and employers with vacancies within their constituencies. The New Deal has helped nearly 23,000 young people into work since its introduction in April 1998.

Fuel Poverty

11. Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has had with the Scottish Executive on fuel poverty issues in Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [121883]

Mr. Wilson: My right hon. Friend and I have frequent discussions with Scottish Ministers on a wide variety of issues, including poverty. There will be a meeting of the Joint Ministerial Committee on Poverty, which brings together UK Ministers and ministers from the devolved administrations, on 26 May, in Edinburgh. UK Ministers and ministers from the devolved administrations also meet in a ministerial group on fuel poverty.

The UK Government are taking a number of practical steps to alleviate fuel poverty. This past winter around £70 million was paid in Winter Fuel Payments to over 900,000 Scottish pensioners: £944,000 was paid out in my hon. Friend's constituency to 10,964 people. The payment will be increased next winter to £150 per eligible household. In addition, the Government made almost 20,000 Cold Weather Payments in Scotland this past winter. The Scottish Executive are responsible for the Warm Deal in Scotland, which provides a package of energy efficiency measures of up to £500 for those on low incomes. The Warm Deal is a devolved matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Minimum Wage

13. Mrs. McKenna: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many enforcement actions have been taken in Scotland to ensure that employers meet their obligation to pay the national minimum wage. [121885]

Dr. Reid: As at the end of April this year, minimum wage inspectors in Scotland have received 356 complaints and served 14 enforcement notices. £13 million is being spent over three years in the United Kingdom on enforcement. The Low Pay Commission reported on 15 February that the Inland Revenue has made a successful start to enforcement and was working proactively to ensure compliance with the legislation.

Shipbuilding Industry

14. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with bodies in the shipbuilding industry on raising the competitiveness of the industry. [121886]

Dr. Reid: This Government are firmly committed to improving the competitive position of the shipbuilding industry across the UK. Both the Department for Trade and Industry and the Scottish Executive chair industry forums which aim to address the issues involved. My regular contact with the Department for Trade and Industry and the Scottish Executive includes matters relating to the shipbuilding industry.

Freight Trains

15. Mr. Eric Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what meetings he has held with EWS Railway Freight Company to discuss the shortage of freight trains to meet the contracts with the Scottish coal companies over the last year. [121887]

Mr. Wilson: I had a very useful meeting with EWS on 13 April, together with representatives of coal producers and generators, to discuss issues relating to the transport of coal by rail.

I and my colleagues wish to ensure that the arrangements for transporting coal make the best use of the railway system, and provide a more secure future for all concerned.

Regional Selective Assistance

16. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with representatives of manufacturing interests on the areas in Scotland to be covered by Regional Selective Assistance; and if he will make a statement. [121888]

Dr. Reid: My Department and I have received a wide range of representations since the 10 April announcement of revised proposals for the Assisted Areas map which determines the potential coverage of the Regional Selective Assistance scheme.

Forth Railway Bridge

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 18 April 2000, Official Report, column 475W, what representations he has made to the Rail Regulator to ensure that Railtrack complies with its obligations under the Railways (Safety Cover) Regulations 1994, with particular reference to the Forth railway bridge. [121874]

Dr. Reid: Monitoring of Railtrack PLC's compliance with its railway safety case is carried out by the Health and Safety Executive's Railway Inspectorate who also considered Railtrack's safety case and any subsequent revisions. The safety case includes a strategy for the maintenance of structures on Railtrack's infrastructure. The Railway Inspectorate hold regular meetings with Railtrack to establish that they are maintaining this strategy robustly for the Forth Rail Bridge and other structures.

ADVOCATE-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Ministerial Meetings

19. Mr. Clappison: To ask the Advocate-General how many meetings she has held with hon. Members in order to give guidance about the exercise by her of her powers. [121893]

The Advocate-General for Scotland: As I indicated in my response on 18 April 2000 to my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman), Official Report, column 816, I am delighted to meet hon. Members to discuss the Advocate-General's powers. To date, no such meeting has yet taken place, but I look forward to arranging meetings in the near future.

European Convention on Human Rights

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Advocate-General for Scotland, pursuant to her answer of 18 April 2000 to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Savidge), Official Report, column 476W, if she has visited the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions to discuss Scottish experience in applying the European Convention on Human Rights since devolution. [121889]

The Advocate-General for Scotland: I and my officials are regularly in contact with the UK Government Departments, including the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, to discuss matters of common interest, which would include human rights issues.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Public Trust Office

22. Mr. Colman: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on progress on reform of the Public Trust Office. [121898]

Jane Kennedy: My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor made a statement on the reform of the Public Trust Office on 11 April. We are presently consulting all interested parties on the programme of reform set out in the document "Making Changes: The Future of the Public Trust Office".

24. Dr. Naysmith: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if the Public Trust Office executive agency has met its key performance targets for 1999–2000; and if he will make a statement. [121900]

Jane Kennedy: The Public Trust Office had seven key performance indicators for the 1999–2000 financial year, and it met five of them. These figures are provisional pending National Audit Office audit of the Public Trust Office's accounts.

Mr. Darvill: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when he will be able to provide the detailed estimated costs to the Lord Chancellor's Department of implementing the recommendations of the Quinquennial Review of the Public Trust Office. [122805]

Jane Kennedy: My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor announced his plans for the future of the Public Trust Office on 11 April in a consultative document called "Making Changes: The Future of the Public Trust Office". I expect to have detailed estimated costs of implementing the planned changes by the autumn.

Mr. Darvill: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the estimated additional cost to those individuals who have their financial affairs managed by the Receivership Division of the Public Trust Office of having their financial affairs managed by accredited panel solicitors. [122802]

Jane Kennedy: The provision of Receivership Division services by solicitors is just one of the options we are considering. There are other potential service providers who have the requisite skills to undertake this work. As the work will be put out to tender the estimated cost is, at present, commercially sensitive information. We will, however, be entering into detailed negotiations with potential service providers to ensure that we secure the best value for money for our clients that we possibly can.

Mr. Darvill: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the estimated cost to his Department of implementing the recommendations of the Quinquennial Review in developing supporting information and communications technology for the Public Trust Office, including the additional costs of training and monitoring external providers. [122804]

Jane Kennedy: This is a very early stage of a complex change programme. My officials are currently assessing the various computer and technology options available to us, prior to developing detailed design and implementation plans. As a result, specific costings are not available for the individual elements of the programme. I would anticipate that these will be available by the autumn.

Mr. Darvill: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the estimated cost to his Department of administering the Public Trust Office for the financial years (a) 1999–2000 and (b) 2000–01. [122803]

Jane Kennedy: The total, unaudited, cost of running the Public Trust Office in 1999–2000 was £22.2 million. The budgeted cost for 2000–01 is also £22.2 million.

Courthouse, Colchester

26. Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on progress towards building a new courthouse at Colchester. [121903]

Jane Kennedy: There are no plans to build a new Crown court or county court in Colchester. I cannot say when a new magistrates court will be built there as the accommodation requirements for Essex is a matter for the Magistrate's Courts Committee. The need to improve magistrates courts accommodation in Essex has been accepted by the Lord Chancellor's Department and is in the Private Finance Initiative building programme.

County Court Actions

29. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what steps are being taken to reduce the time taken in bringing action for enforcement of payment to the county courts. [121907]

Mr. Lock: Since March 1998, we have been engaged in a comprehensive review of the enforcement of all civil court judgments. As part of that review, we will be looking at how to reduce delay in the enforcement process. I anticipate being able to report the conclusions of the review in June.

Rural Magistrates Courts

30. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the future of rural magistrates courts in Buckinghamshire. [121908]

Jane Kennedy: The Government's policy is that magistrates courts in Buckinghamshire are best managed locally by Thames Valley Magistrates Courts Committee under the provisions of the Justices of the Peace Act 1997. Decisions concerning the future of magistrates courts in their area, whether rural or urban, are for that magistrates courts committee to determine.

Bailiffs

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what assessment he has made of the Citizen's Advice Bureaux report "Undue Distress"; if he will review the powers and role of bailiffs; and if he will make a statement. [122820]

Mr. Lock: I am considering the CAB report, which was published on 15 May, and will respond to it in due course. Professor Beatson, of Cambridge University, is currently conducting a review of bailiff law on behalf of the Department and is due to report to us by the end of June 2000. We will look closely at the powers and role of bailiffs in the light of both these reports.

Commissioner for Judicial Appointments

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when he plans to appoint the Commissioner for Judicial Appointments; and if he will make a statement. [122808]

Mr. Lock: The Lord Chancellor intends to appoint the First Commissioner for Judicial Appointments this year.

Human Rights Act 1998

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how much of the legal aid budget has been earmarked to support cases (a) with a Human Rights Act 1998 element and (b) based on the Human Rights Act 1998; and if he will make a statement. [122809]

Mr. Lock: In the Comprehensive Spending Review in 1998 we estimated that the cost to legal aid of implementation of the Human Rights Act 1998 would be of the order of £40 million per annum. However, no separate estimates were made to distinguish costs in cases involving a Human Rights Act element from those exclusively brought under the Act.

High Court Vacancies

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many vacant posts there are for the High Court Bench; when he proposes to fill the vacancies; by what procedure he will fill the vacancies; and if he will make a statement. [122807]

Mr. Lock: There are currently no vacancies on the High Court Bench. The assessment of my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor is that the current demands on the High Court are fully met by the number of judges in post.

In November 1999 the statutory ceiling on the number of High Court judges was increased by eight, from 98 to 106. Since then, four additional High Court judges have been appointed in preparation for the implementation of the Human Rights Act in October 2000. This has taken the number of judges from 98 to 102 (excluding Mr. Justice Bratza, who is serving full-time on the European Court of Human Rights).

There remains capacity within the statutory ceiling to appoint a further four judges. The Lord Chancellor will continue to monitor the demands on the High Court, and he will recommend the appointment of further judges, within the statutory ceiling, when he considers it is necessary.

In February 2000, as part of his regular search for potential candidates, the Lord Chancellor again invited applications for consideration for appointment to the High Court Bench. When vacancies arise, appointment will be made on merit from those who have applied, either in 1998 or this year, or from others whom the Lord Chancellor regards as meeting the criteria to the required degree of distinction. Of the 19 High Court judges appointed since February 1998, eight had applied for appointment, and 11 were invited to accept appointment.

Careless Driving Charges

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many careless driving charges authorised by the Crown Prosecution Service in Essex were heard by magistrates in the 12 months from May 1999 to the end of April 2000; and how many were still to be determined by the courts on 1 May 2000. [122902]

Jane Kennedy: Magistrates in Essex heard 942 careless driving charges in the period from January 2000 to the end of April 2000. Records before January are not readily available. There remain 644 charges to be determined.

Damages Act 1996

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he proposes to set a rate of return under section 1 of the Damages Act 1996; and if he will make a statement. [121902]

Mr. Lock: The Lord Chancellor published a consultation paper in March seeking views on the exercise of his powers under the Damages Act and raising alternatives to lump sum payments. The deadline for responses is 31 May and he will announce decisions following an analysis of the responses to that consultation paper.

Criminal and Civil Cases

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department for what reason a non-molestation order is treated as a criminal case and an access order is treated as a civil case. [121499]

Mr. Ingram: I have been asked to reply.

The Family Homes and Domestic Violence (NI) Order 1998 creates a new unified and coherent legal regime for dealing with domestic violence. The old personal protection orders have been replaced by non-molestation orders. The non-molestation orders are civil orders made by the court for the protection of the applicant and any children who may be at risk of family violence. The breach of a non-molestation order, involving as it does the threat of violence to the protected person(s), is appropriately a criminal offence and police officers are empowered to arrest for breach of such an order.

An access order, since the introduction of the Children (NI) Order 1996 known as a contact order, is an order by the court to provide for contact between a parent and a child in circumstances where that parent is not living with the child. Breach of contact orders may be treated as contempt of court. However, difficulties in ensuring contact between children and parents may involve many complicated relationship factors and require to be dealt with sensitively within the family civil law system.

DEFENCE

Army Training Ranges

Mr. Neil Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the competition to find a strategic partner for the management of the Army's training areas and ranges. [123710]

Dr. Moonie: As my hon. Friend the then Under-Secretary of State for Defence, now Minister for the Armed Forces, said in his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. Brown) on 25 November 1998, Official Report, column 10W, we have been conducting a competition to seek a long-term strategic partner from the private sector to help introduce best commercial practice in supporting and managing the Army Training Estate. As a result of the work conducted thus far, it has been decided to include all non-core training support activities and services because there is scope for better value for money if the boundaries of the study were to be extended in this way. In addition, a site utility review is going to be conducted to establish the usage of sites and this may lead to rationalisation of some sites. It is too early to say what the impact of this work is going to be, both on jobs and individual sites, but the MOD Trades Unions will be consulted at every stage. Should any redundancies result from this study, these will be handled in accordance with MOD procedures agreed by the Trades Unions.

Logistic Information Systems Agency

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what performance targets have been set for the Logistic Information Systems Agency for 2000–01. [123715]

Mr. Spellar: The Chief Executive of the Logistic Information Systems Agency has been set the following Key Targets for 2000–01.

Key Target 1

To deliver all Customer-agreed outputs to budget.

Key Target 2

To maintain or improve the cost ratio of Information Systems Delivery staff to Administrative staff of 1:0.58.

Key Target 3

To improve delivery performance to customer requirements such that:

The average time for Requests For Change assessment is reduced by 4 per cent. to five days.

The average period required for Requests For Change Authorisation is reduced by 5 per cent. to 64 days.

Key Target 4

To be graded as three or better for overall delivery, on a scale of one (exceptional) to five (ineffective), based on 100 per cent. of customer reports.

Merchant Navy Reserve

Mrs. Gilroy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the Merchant Navy Reserve. [123786]

Mr. Spellar: I have recently decided, as part of my Department's continuous attempts to improve the effectiveness and operability of the naval reserve forces, to disband the Merchant Navy Reserve (MNR).

The MNR was formed in 1989 to provide a modest pool of experienced British Merchant Seamen to augment the crews of UK registered merchant ships in times of tension and war. The MNR's membership has never been called-out since its inception and there are no foreseen circumstances where the Government may be required to do so. The Cold War environment that generated the requirement for the Merchant Navy Reserve has changed fundamentally, resulting in the necessity for the Government to review all elements of the armed forces. Such reviews have demonstrated there is no longer a requirement to maintain the Merchant Navy Reserve in circumstances where there is no foreseeable need for its services.

My Department has therefore made arrangements for letters to be sent to individual members of the MNR thanking them for their past service and informing them of this decision and the reasons behind it. The letters encourage MNR personnel to consider joining the Royal Naval Reserve, an organisation which offers valuable training and personal development opportunities to all those with an interest in acquiring or maintaining the Nation's much-needed maritime skills.

The measure in no way effects the Government's wholehearted and continuing support for the Merchant Navy, a matter demonstrated amply in the 1998 White Paper "British Shipping: Charting A New Course". Industry, the unions and Government continue to work together to regenerate the UK merchant navy and seafaring skills base to meet the Nation's future needs.

Service Personnel (Marriage Statistics)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of (a) the Army, (b) the Royal Navy and (c) the RAF of age group (i) 16 to 24, (ii) 25 to 29, (iii) 30 to 34, (iv) 35 to 44, (v) 45 to 49 and (vi) 50 years and over have changed from Maristat One in each year between and including 1989 and the current financial year, stating in each age category the (1) proportional change from strength, (2) proportional change from married strength, (3) proportional change from married to divorced from the national population as a whole and (4) proportional change from married to divorced from the national married population; and if he will make a statement. [123242]

Mr. Spellar: This information is not held centrally by my Department and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of the married strength of the (a) Army, (b) RAF, (c) Royal Navy and (d) all services, are married to a serving member of the Armed Forces not including Reserve Forces; and if he will make a statement. [123159]

Mr. Spellar: The information requested is as follows:

	Total married strength	Married to serving person	Proportion (Percentage)
(a) Army	48,614	2,868	5.9
(b) Royal Navy	20,014	844	4.2
(c) Royal Air Force	34,219	2,400	7.0
(d) All services	102,847	6,112	5.9

The table may contain some inaccuracies as some personnel may not have amended their records following the discharge of their spouse from the Armed Forces.

Labour Committee on Ireland

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what date permission was granted to conduct surveillance of the Labour Committee on Ireland; and for what period this surveillance was conducted. [122763]

Mr. Spellar: It has been the long-standing practice of successive Governments not to comment on alleged intelligence activities, which are covered by exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) documents and (b) photographs are held relating to the activities of the Labour Committee on Ireland; and how many files on the Labour Committee on Ireland are currently being maintained. [122764]

Mr. Spellar: It has been the long-standing practice of successive Governments not to comment on alleged intelligence activities, which are covered by exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Bloody Sunday

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 17 February 2000, Official Report, column 648W, on Bloody Sunday, if he will make a further statement about the destruction of self-loading rifles. [122765]

Mr. Hoon: The Ministry of Defence/West Mercia police investigation, which is urgently investigating the whereabouts and possible recovery of the surviving so-called 'Bloody Sunday rifles' and the destruction of two rifles that had been previously identified, is still under way. It would be inappropriate to comment further until this investigation is complete.

Mr. Liam Clarke

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has asked the Metropolitan police Special Branch to conduct an investigation into Mr. Liam Clarke. [122757]

Mr. Spellar: No.

Sunday Times (Injunction)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whom he consulted before seeking an injunction against The Sunday Times and others preventing publication of information obtained from the person known as Martin Ingram. [122758]

Mr. Spellar: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence obtained advice on this matter from a number of sources within Government. The Secretary to the independent Defence Press and Broadcasting Advisory Committee was also consulted.

Mr. Tony Geraghty

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost of the 1998 Ministry of Defence police search of the home of journalist Tony Geraghty; how many hours this search lasted; how many personnel and of what rank were present; what items were removed from the premises; what items have been retained by the Ministry of Defence police; what items have been passed on to other agencies; what items have been returned to the owner; what charges were brought against Mr. Geraghty; what considerations led to charges being dropped; and what compensation has been offered to Mr. Geraghty. [122760]

Mr. Spellar: The additional cost of the Ministry of Defence Police (MDP) search of the home of Tony Geraghty was £606.00. The search lasted just under seven hours and was conducted by two detective sergeants and four detective constables. A computer, associated equipment and documentation was taken by the MDP. Items for use in a forthcoming court case involving one of Mr. Geraghty's associates have been retained by the MDP. Items relevant to a West Mercia police investigation, concerning Mr. Geraghty, were passed to that Force. All items not required for the forthcoming court case and not passed to West Mercia police have been returned to Mr. Geraghty. Mr. Geraghty was charged under section 5 of the Official Secrets Act 1989 on 13 May 1999. The decision not to proceed against Mr. Geraghty is a matter for the Attorney General. My Department has not made an offer of compensation to Mr. Geraghty.

Armoured Support Vehicles

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will ensure that the requirement for armoured battle group support vehicles will be met by UK companies and that the vehicles will be built in the UK; and if he will make a statement; [122387]

(2) what is the cost of meeting the requirement for armoured battlegroup support vehicles; when this requirement will be met; and if he will make a statement. [122385]

Dr. Moonie: We require in total about 1,000 vehicles to provide armoured support to the front line, the majority of which will be Armoured Battlegroup Support Vehicle. Deliveries are planned to begin by the end of the decade. The programme is currently at the concept stage and initial estimates indicate an acquisition cost of around £1.5 billion including early years of in-service support.

The procurement strategy has yet to be finalised, but will be based on achieving best value for money for the tax payer. The MOD has a policy of open international competition whenever this is possible. However, all procurement options will be investigated taking account of security of supply, UK technological capabilities and the benefits to the MOD of potential exports.

Departmental Housing Stock

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the regulations he intends to implement on the disposal of MOD housing stock; and what discussions he has held with relevant local councils and housing associations to reach an early conclusion. [122110]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 17 May 2000]: The guidelines to which all Departments work when disposing of surplus property assets are contained in Chapter 32 of Government Accounting.

Houses in England and Wales which were included in the sale of service families accommodation to Annington Homes Ltd., are passed to the company for disposal in accordance with the terms of the sale.

When disposing of surplus housing owned by the Ministry of Defence my Department seeks to achieve the maximum return for the taxpayer generally. In most instances this is through sale on the open market.

Local authorities and Housing Associations formally become aware of our surplus housing through the planning and marketing process, and have the opportunity to take part in the purchase process should they wish to do so. There is of course extensive contact between officials in Defence Estates and local authorities on the range of estate planning and disposal issues.

It is our policy to dispose of surplus properties as soon as possible to enable their early and productive re-use.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the Defence Housing Executive has reached a conclusion as to the method and timing of surplus MOD housing stock being released to council and housing association stock. [122109]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 17 May 2000]: There has been no change in the Defence Housing Executive's (DHE's) policy on the method and timing of the release of surplus Ministry of Defence housing stock to local authorities and housing associations.

The bulk of Service Families Accommodation (SFA) in England and Wales are held by the Ministry of Defence on an underlease from Annington Homes Ltd. (AHL). Properties which become surplus to military requirements are handed back to AHL for disposal. Where appropriate, the DHE does release properties to housing associations and local authorities for short term let, but the properties which are available are often not attractive to them.

Surplus SFA in Scotland is passed to Defence Estates (DE) who determine the appropriate disposal strategy. All relevant factors are taken into consideration and DE will normally liaise with the local authority housing division to ensure that they are made aware of the intention to offer housing for sale. This is intended to allow the council time to plan accordingly and to consider whether they may wish to bid for the properties when they are offered for sale.

Where appropriate, consideration can be given to a sale to a local authority or housing association by private treaty at open market value, in line with existing Treasury guidelines.

Armed Forces Personnel Costs

Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate the average annual cost of paying and accommodating 20,000 armed forces personnel and their families. [121804]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 16 May 2000]: The average annual cost of paying and accommodating 20,000 armed forces personnel and their families is £562 million. In calculating this figure, it has only been possible to take account of Pay, Employer's-Related National Insurance Contributions and Pensions contributions. Any calculation of overheads such as rents, rates, utilities costs, food, office equipment and services could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Joint NBC Regiment

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will place in the Library (a) the study and (b) the investment appraisal led by the Directorate of Joint Warfare on the final location of the Joint Nuclear Biological and Chemical Regiment; [123119]

(2) if transport costs of (a) personnel and (b) vehicles were included in the investment appraisal which informed the decision to locate the Joint NBC Regiment at RAF Honington; and if he will make a statement. [123116]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 22 May 2000]: A copy of the investment appraisal will be placed in the Library of the House. I am withholding a copy of the study in accordance with Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, which relates to defence, security and international relations.

Joannou and Paraskevaides Group

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what construction contracts his Department has awarded to the Joannou and Paraskevaides Group in the last three years. [123145]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The Ministry of Defence has not awarded any construction contracts to Joannou and Paraskevaides within the last three years.

Mr. Mullineux

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) (a) if he will make a statement on the reasons which underlay the decision (i) to remove the body of the son of Margaret Maurex from an NHS hospital to a Ministry of Defence site, where a post-mortem examination was performed and (ii) not to ask the permission of Margaret Maurex, (b) what tests were performed on the body, (c) what were the results of the post-mortem examination and (d) for what reasons such exercises were performed in secret; and if he will make a statement; [115926]

(2) what notification was given to Mrs. Margaret Maurex of the post-mortem conducted at a Ministry of Defence site on her son. [116283]

Dr. Moonie: Mr. A. I. Mullineux was discharged from the Regular Army on 10 August 1992 under Queen's Regulations 9.374—"At the Soldier's request on payment—transfer to the Regular Reserve". He was not employed in support of any UK sponsored military operations at the time of his death in Bosnia in February 1993. A careful examination of Mr. Mullineux's contemporary Service records indicates that the Ministry of Defence did not play any role in the repatriation of Mr. Mullineux's body to the UK, nor any post-mortem, which would properly have been the responsibility of the civil authorities.

Imported Meat

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the prescribed welfare standards included in the legislative requirements governing the supply of imported meat to Her Majesty's forces. [115639]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 22 May 2000]: There are no prescribed welfare standards included in the legislative requirements governing the import of meat for consumption by HM Forces. However the hygiene standards to which meat imported into the EU most comply are regulated by EU legislation. Welfare standards applying to the rearing, transportation and slaughter of livestock within the EU is subject to regulation by EU Directives.

Gulf Veterans

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reasons his Department has performed post mortem examinations on Gulf veterans; how many post mortems have taken place and where they were conducted; what types of specimen have been taken and where they were tested; what tests were performed on cadavers and with what results; and if he will make a statement. [116284]

Mr. Spellar: The MOD has no specific arrangements to request post mortem examinations on Gulf veterans, nor is it routinely informed of the results of such examinations. While the MOD is aware that post mortems have been performed on some Gulf veterans, data on numbers, locations, types of specimen taken, tests and results could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Press Officers

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many press officers were employed by his Department in (a) March 1997 and (b) March 2000. [123304]

Mr. Byers: On 1 March 1997 there were 17 Press Officers employed in the DTI Newsroom. On 1 March 2000 there were 21 Press Officers.

Regulations

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the total cost to (a) business and (b) the public sector of regulations introduced by his Department since May 1997. [123303]

Mr. Byers: Details are contained in the Regulatory Impact Assessments that have been carried out for all regulations introduced by my Department that impose or reduce costs. Copies of all such assessments are available in the Library of the House.

Recruitment

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish summary information on his Department's recruitment for the calendar year 1999 and the use of permitted exceptions to the principles of fair and open competition and selection on merit, as required by the Civil Service Commissioners' Recruitment Code. [123767]

Dr. Howells: It is DTI policy that recruitment is carried out on the basis of fair and open competition and selection on merit, subject to the exceptions permitted by the Civil Service Commissioners. My Department has systems in place, which ensure that the principles of fair and open competition are understood and followed in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Commissioners' recruitment Code. These Systems are subject to internal check and to external check by the Commissioner's approved auditors.

The following table and narratives describe DTI recruitment other than for the DTI's Executive Agencies and the Government Office network who make separate arrangements for publishing recruitment data.

Secondments—56

Re-appointment of former civil servants—Two Range 4s recruited by Employment relations resigned and asked for re-instatement.

Transfers of staff with their work (not under TUPE)—none

Transfer of staff from other public services without work (unless from a public body staffed exclusively by civil servants)—none

Appointments of surplus acceptable candidates to shortage posts—none

No disabled candidates were appointed under modified selection arrangements.

Any use of the exceptions reserved for the Commissioners (i.e. appointments on the basis of the proven distinction of the individual and appointments not in order of merit)—none.

Miners Strike

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement regarding dismissals by British Coal during the 1984–85 miners strike. [123768]

Mrs. Liddell: In their report, the Coalfield Task Force established by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister recommended that the DTI review the pension entitlements of men who were not reinstated following their dismissal during that dispute. True to our commitment to investigate this matter, I have today distributed to interested parties a consultative document.

The document endeavours to present a broadly factual account of British Coal's dismissal and re-employment policy around the time of the strike and in its aftermath. It focuses in particular on those individuals who were not re-employed in the aftermath of the strike and whose cases were not considered by Industrial Tribunals at the time. It also addresses concerns which have been expressed over the pension rights of individuals who were found by Industrial Tribunals to have been unfairly dismissed.

The document also proposes a twin approach aimed at achieving a resolution which I hope will be seen as just in the eyes of all those who continue to live with the effects of this tragic period in the industry's history.

I am placing copies of the document in the Libraries of the House.

Parental Leave

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to allow adoptive parents entitlement to parental leave. [123230]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The Maternity and Parental Leave etc. Regulations 1999, which came into effect on 15 December 1999, entitle adoptive parents to 13 weeks unpaid parental leave.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Department of Trade and Industry made an announcement on 9 May setting out the details of a review looking at the issues surrounding maternity pay and parental leave. The review will look at increasing adoption and whether rights to adoption leave are being taken up.

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received on the subject of entitlement to (a) statutory maternity and (b) parental leave for parents adopting a child. [123229]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The Department received 107 responses to the 1998 "Fairness at Work" White Paper proposal to provide adoptive parents with three months parental leave. Of these, 104 respondents agreed with Government's proposal.

The Maternity and Parental Leave consultation in summer 1999 invited views on the Government's detailed proposals for framing parental leave for adoptive parents. Over 200 responses were received on this subject, over three-quarters of which supported the proposals.

The Department has also received about 20 letters on adoption leave since 1999.

In addition to these representations we have discussed this issue with representatives of key adoption organisations.

Paternity Leave

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what improvements he plans for statutory entitlement to paternity leave; and when he intends to propose them. [121580]

Mr. Alan Johnson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry made an announcement on 9 May setting out the details of a review on maternity pay and parental leave. The review will look at ways of providing further support and choice for working parents with young children. We will consider how best to build on statutory parental leave entitlement in the context of the review.

Post Offices

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the environmental impact of post office closures, with particular reference to the effect on the number and length of additional car journeys which result. [123279]

Mr. Alan Johnson: No such assessment has been made by my Department. But the Government remain fully committed to the maintenance of a nationwide network of post offices and fully recognise the valuable social and environmental role played by post offices in their local communities.

Indonesian Plywood

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much plywood from Indonesia was imported into the United Kingdom in each of the last five years. [123157]

Mr. Caborn [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The information is given in the table:

	£ million	Thousand tonnes
1995	56.5	105.9
1996	64.5	118.0
1997	76.1	139.5
1998	49.9	130.7
1999	60.2	147.9

Plywood is defined by headings 634.31 to 634.49 of the Standard International Trade Classification (Revision 3)

Export Licences

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many open export licences for the export of aircraft spares to Kenya remained in force between January and April; what items have been supplied under these licences during this period; and what end-use assurances have been given by the Kenyan authorities in relation to the re-export of equipment supplied under these licences. [122554]

Dr. Howells: The export of military aircraft spares is controlled under entries ML5, ML10, ML11, ML15, ML16 and ML21 in the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994, commonly known as the Military List. The entry in the relevant legislation under which the export of goods is controlled is known as their rating. The Export Control Organisation's computer databases have been interrogated. Between 1 January and 30 April 2000, 30 Open Individual Export Licences (OIELs) gave licence coverage to export to consignees or end-users in Kenya, goods with the relevant ratings.

Individual licences may cover a range of goods with various ratings. Where this is so, the licence is included in the table in the total for all of the relevant ratings.

Open Individual Export Licences valid for the export to Kenya of goods with the relevant ratings

Rating	Number of valid OIELs covering goods with this rating and including Kenya as a permitted destination (OIELs may cover a range of countries)
ML5	5
ML10	19
ML11	9
ML15	2
ML21	2

In the period, there were no valid OIELs for Kenya covering goods with the rating ML16.

This information should be considered in light of the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) on 27 July 1999, Official Report, columns 307–08W.

An Open Individual Export Licence (OIEL) is specific to an individual exporter and covers multiple shipments of specified goods to specified destinations and/or, in some cases, specified consignees. The exporter must obtain from each consignee an appropriate written undertaking for each export before the export takes place, or not later than one month after the date of exportation. Where the exporter intends to make more than one exportation to the same consignee in any period of one year, an annual written undertaking may be obtained in fulfilment of this requirement. As with SIELs, where goods are being consigned direct to a Government body, the DTI will normally accept a copy of the Government purchase contract order, or the relevant extracts from the contract.

In addition, Kenya is a permitted destination on certain Open General Export Licences covering the export of goods on the Military List. An Open General Export Licence (OGEL) allows the export from the UK of goods specified in the goods coverage of the OGEL to specified destinations. In such circumstances, end-user undertakings are not required. Copies of OGELs are routinely placed in the Library of the House.

As regards the additional information requested, inquiries are being made under the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. Where confidential information is involved, the parties concerned will be asked if they object to its disclosure, and this can take some time. I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible and place a copy of that letter in the Library of the House.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry since December 1998 how many (a) single and (b) open export licences have been issued for the export of aircraft spares to Kenya. [122555]

Dr. Howells: The export of military aircraft spares is controlled under entries ML5, ML10, ML11, ML15, ML16 and ML21 in the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994, commonly known as the Military List. The entry in the relevant legislation under which the export of goods is controlled is known as their rating. The Export Control Organisation's computer databases have been interrogated. Between 1 December 1998 and 8 May 2000, one Standard Individual Export Licence (SIEL) and 12 Open Individual Export Licences (OIELs) were issued covering the export to consignees or end-users in Kenya of goods with the relevant ratings. Individual licences may cover a range of goods with various ratings. Where this is so, the licence is included in the total for all of the relevant ratings.

Open Individual Export Licences valid for the export to Kenya of goods with the relevant ratings

ML5	3

The one SIEL issued covered goods with the rating ML10. There were no SIELs or OIELs issued covering goods with the rating ML16.

This information should be considered in light of the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) on 27 July 1999, Official Report, columns 307–08W.

In addition, Kenya is a permitted destination on certain Open General Export Licences covering the export of goods on the Military List; copies of all Open General Export Licences are routinely placed in the Library of the House.

Research Councils

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the (a) total budget and (b) budget per head of the United Kingdom population was for each of the six research councils in each year since 1994. [122131]

Ms Hewitt: Details of the grant in aid paid to the Research Councils, the population figures and the budget per head of the UK population are set out in the tables.

Synchrotron

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what detailed assessment was made of the cost associated with building the new synchrotron at (a) Daresbury and (b) Oxford. [122447]

Ms Hewitt: In May 1999 the OST commissioned ADD Consultants to consider the comparative advantages, benefits and costs of the site location and its effect on the New Synchrotron project. Their report (completed in June 1999 and made public in January 2000) considered both the Daresbury Laboratory in Cheshire and the Rutherford Appleton Laboratory in Oxfordshire. This report indicated some saving in running costs if the facility were located at the Rutherford Appleton Laboratory.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry commissioned a further survey into the same two sites in November 1999 and this was carried out by Allott and Lomax. Their report (completed and made public in January 2000) concluded that there were no differences in cost between constructing the facility at the Daresbury Laboratory and at the Rutherford Appleton Laboratory site, within their estimation errors.

The issue of cost was not a significant factor in choosing to locate at the Rutherford Appleton Laboratory.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the decision to place the synchrotron in Oxfordshire was based on a best value or similar review. [122452]

Ms Hewitt: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) on the 21 March 2000, Official Report, column 480W.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reason ADD was chosen as the consultant to report on the suitability of the sites for the new synchrotron. [122448]

Ms Hewitt: ADD Consultants were originally commissioned by CCLRC (the Council for the Central Laboratories of the Research Councils) to write a business case for the New Synchrotron in January 1999. Because of ADD's existing involvement in the project, and the time constraints, they were a natural choice to carry out the additional study on the suitability of the sites for the new synchrotron.

SMEs (East Devon)

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assistance he plans to give to small and medium-sized businesses in East Devon. [123075]

Mr. Caborn: The range of assistance available to new and existing small and medium-sized businesses in East Devon, and other parts of the UK, is included in this Department's "A Guide to Help for Small Business", a copy of which I am sending to the right hon. Member. In addition, the new Small Business Service will, from April 2001, provide an enhanced service to business in England. There is also new assistance under the £180 million Enterprise Fund which will provide risk capital to the UK's small companies with growth potential.

Wellcome Foundation

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the basis of his policy for co-operating with the Wellcome Foundation and its board of trustees in funding scientific research. [121759]

Ms Hewitt: The Office of Science and Technology is committed to working with all organisations that make a contribution to the science base and where there are clear benefits to be realised from working together. The Wellcome Trust is one of the largest biomedical research charities in the world. OST therefore co-operates with the Wellcome Trust on a number of funding initiatives aimed at ensuring the UK remains at the forefront of scientific research. In addition, the individual Research Councils work with the Trust on projects of mutual interest.

Such initiatives have been, and will continue to be, of great benefit to the Government, the Trust and the UK.

Shareholder Remedies

Ms Jenny Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to take action on shareholder remedies (a) within the wider review of company law and (b) as a separate issue. [122822]

Dr. Howells: The independent Company Law Review is carrying out a fundamental review of all aspects of core company law, including shareholder remedies. The Company Law Review Steering Group is due to present its final report to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in the spring of next year. The Government will then set out their response and the proposed way forward in the light of the Steering Group's recommendations.

Spin-out Companies

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many spin-off companies have been established in each year since 1994 by each university in the United Kingdom; how many such companies failed in each year since 1994, broken down by university; and what basic research and science underpinned each such company. [122162]

Ms Hewitt: To date, this information has not been routinely collected by Government.

There have however been several surveys, two conducted on behalf of the Innovation Unit in the Department of Trade and Industry and one on behalf of the Higher Education Funding Council for England. These were, respectively, the University-Industry co-operation surveys of 1995 and 1996 and the Industry-academic links in the UK report (December 98/70 Hefce).

Further measures are being introduced to monitor the spin-out activities of universities more routinely, including through the Higher Education Reach-Out to Business and the Community fund, University Challenge Fund and Science Enterprise Challenge initiatives.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on what basis he monitors the performance of spin-out companies; and what makes a company eligible to be classified as a university spin-off. [122163]

Ms Hewitt: The performance of spin-out companies created by universities are not monitored routinely by Government.

The Government have been using the definition of a university spin-out from the Industry-Academic links in the UK report by PREST, the Policy Research in Engineering and Science & Technology Unit in the University of Manchester (December 98/70 produced by the Higher Education Funding Council for England). The definition is encapsulated on page 35 in the sentence

> . . . spin-out companies from the HEI, which are established to exploit the commercialisation of results arising from a specific stream of research.

In addition, under the pilot data collection exercise which was part of the University Challenge Fund competition in 1998–99 the AUTM (Association of University Technology Managers in the USA) definition was used this states:

> Start-up (read spin-out) companies are companies that were dependent upon licensing the institution's technology for initiation.

The Government are currently refining their definition of a spin-out in order to improve future data collection initiatives.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Fur Farming Bill

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from members of the House of Lords on the proposals contained in the Fur Farming Bill. [122697]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 18 May 2000]: To date, we have received no representations from Members of the House of Lords.

Over-30-Months Scheme

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the average yearly price of Over-30-Months scheme compensation; and what plans he has to raise it. [120339]

Ms Quin [holding answer 2 May 2000]: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Compensation paid (£)	Number of animals	Average amount/animal (£)
1996–97	669,709,000	1,346,195	497.48
1997–98	287,800,000	847,520	339.58
1998–99	253,031,000	922,401	274.32
1999–2000	262,754,000	977,749	268.73

Following the removal of the weight limit on payments for all cattle entering the OTMS higher payments will apply from 5 June.

Pig Industry

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will introduce a scheme to compensate pig farmers in the United Kingdom for the disposal of specified material on the same basis as that which applies in the Netherlands. [121770]

Ms Quin: The Dutch authorities have confirmed that there is not a specific compensation scheme for the disposal of specified material in the Netherlands. Like the UK, however, the Netherlands is planning to introduce a restructuring scheme for its pig industry.

Sea Defences

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those coastal areas of the UK in respect of which decisions have been taken since 1995 to abandon sea defences; and if he will make a statement. [122329]

Mr. Morley: I am replying in respect of England only because policy responsibility for sea defences elsewhere in the United Kingdom is devolved.

The responsibility for taking decisions on the abandonment of individual sea defences rests with the relevant operating authority (primarily the Environment Agency and local authorities) or private owners of defences. Information on local authorities and private owners is not readily available. The Environment Agency advise that they have taken no such decisions in this period.

Following the preparation of Shoreline Management Plans, operating authorities are undertaking detailed investigations into the continuing justification and sustainability of some sea defences. This may involve decisions about the abandonment of defences, but more likely decisions to establish a new line of defence.

GM Crops

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will ensure, in relation to hearings to be held in respect of the proposed decision to add the genetically modified maize variety Chardon LL to the UK National List, that (a) original trial data are made available in a full and timely manner to those requesting such a hearing and (b) officials will appear at the hearings, give evidence and be available for cross-examination. [121442]

Ms Quin: The data on which proposed National List decisions are based are made available on request. The consolidated data on which the Chardon LL proposed decision was based have already been made available to a number of individuals and organisations.

The Seeds (National Lists of Varieties) Regulations 1982 (as amended) provide for written representations to be made to Ministers by persons affected by a proposed decision to add a plant variety to the National List and for oral evidence to be given by them to a person appointed by the Ministers. There is no provision for the giving of evidence to the appointed person by Ministry officials, and the appointed person's role is to marshall the views put rather than to make recommendations. Were there to be an appeal to the Plant Variety and Seeds Tribunal after this hearing, the legislation provides both for officials to give evidence and to be available for cross examination.

Bovine Tuberculosis

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the savings which would result if testing for tuberculosis in cattle by the veterinary profession were put out to general tender. [R] [122690]

Ms Quin: The Ministry is carrying out a pilot project in North West England to assess whether competitive tendering for the provision of TB testing and brucellosis work carried out by local veterinary inspectors would improve the value for money and the quality of the services provided. Contracts under the pilot project will be awarded shortly and will run for one year from 1 July. The service provided under contract in the pilot area will be compared with that provided under present arrangements before decisions are made on whether to extend competitive tendering for local veterinary inspection work. At this stage no estimate can be made of the savings which might result from the introduction of competitive tendering.

Open Government

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many applications for information he received under the Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information in the last parliamentary session; and how many were granted. [121863]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 18 May 2000]: I refer my right hon. Friend to the reply given by the Secretary of State for the Home Department on 18 May 2000, Official Report, column 190W.

British Potato Council

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the first statutory review of the British Potato Council. [123769]

Mr. Nick Brown: The first statutory review of the British Potato Council (BPC) has been carried out in accordance with the requirements of the Industrial Organisation and Development Act 1947. I have considered the report of the review and the outcome of the BPC poll, together with the Minister for Rural Affairs at the Scottish Executive and the National Assembly for Wales Secretary for Agriculture and Rural Development. We agreed that the Council carries out a necessary function that could not be so efficiently carried out by other means. We have therefore decided that the BPC should continue for a further term while taking forward the recommendations of the report, in particular about ways of improving the Council's service to levy payers.

Flood Relief

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on flood relief, and how this will be funded in future. [123390]

Mr. Morley: The Government's policy is to reduce the risks to people and the developed and natural environment from flooding and coastal erosion by encouraging the provision of technically, environmentally and economically sound and sustainable defence measures. The flood and coastal defence operating authorities (the internal drainage boards Environmental Agency, and local authorities) undertake these measures. In April 2000 the Government put in place a series of High Level Targets to help achieve a more certain delivery of its policies by the operating authorities. The Government have also set out a priority for the Environment Agency to work with other bodies, including local authorities and the emergency services, in achieving a seamless and integrated service of flood forecasting, warning and response.

The two main sources of funding for flood and coastal defence are (a) Ministry contributions towards approved capital schemes undertaken by the operating authorities and (b) that delivered to local authorities through the local government finance mechanisms. The latter is used to fund the levies that local authorities pay to the Environment Agency and internal drainage boards, as well as their own spend on flood and coastal defence. A review of the current funding mechanisms is currently being conducted.

Following the Comprehensive Spending Review, the Government increased the funding available from the Ministry by £23 million over three years from 1999–2000, to a total of £230 million. The Government have also increased flood defence Standard Spending Assessments beyond inflation. Future funding levels depend on decisions to be taken in the Spending Review later this year.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Mortgages

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate his Department has made of the average difference between bank and building society mortgage interest rates over the past 12 months. [123236]

Mr. Bayley: A review of interest rates provided in the Office for National Statistics' financial table 7.1L over the period January to December 1999 shows that a combined building society/bank rate is on average just under 0.28 per cent. higher than the weighted average of the main building societies interest rates. Building Societies continue to provide a comprehensive range of products in a very competitive market. Recent figures show that they continue to outlend the mortgage banks.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment his Department has made of the arrears that have accrued in mortgages taken out by income support and income-based jobseekers allowance recipients in the most recent year for which information is available. [123233]

Mr. Bayley: No information is collected by my Department about the accrual of arrears in mortgages taken out by income support and income based jobseekers allowance recipients. Benefit help for homeowners with housing costs is intended to provide reasonable protection to help secure the home. The mortgage lenders have agreed, under The Mortgage Code, to consider all cases of financial difficulty and mortgage arrears sympathetically and positively.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were in receipt of ISMI in each of the last five years for which figures are available. [123239]

Mr. Bayley: The information is in the table.

2. Figures are based on a 5 per cent. sample; as such they are subject to a degree of sampling error.

3. Figures are rounded to the nearest thousand.

4. Income-based Jobseeker's Allowance replaced Income Support for the unemployed from November 1996.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to revise the index for calculating the ISMI rate to make it more representative of the mortgage lending market. [123234]

Mr. Bayley: We have no plans to revise the index. The standard interest rate used to calculate ISMI entitlement is based on the weighted average of the main building society rates. The building societies continue to provide a broad range of products in a very competitive market. Recent figures produced by the Building Societies Association show that building societies continue to outlend the mortgage banks.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to make the ISMI mechanism more quickly responsive to changes in interest rates. [123235]

Mr. Bayley: There is no delay in the ISMI mechanism. As soon as the Department is informed by the Office for National Statistics of a change in interest rates, procedures are set in motion to amend regulations. Regulations are required to be laid 21 days before coming into force to allow for proper parliamentary scrutiny.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate his Department has made of the average time between changes in the ISMI rate being triggered and higher payments being made to those in receipt of ISMI, in the most recent year for which figures are available. [123237]

Mr. Bayley: It normally takes five to six weeks from receipt of the official notification from the Office for National Statistics to implementation of a change in interest rates. This allows for the Department to reprogramme its computer systems and for new regulations to be laid and made available for proper parliamentary scrutiny.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what proportion of those entitled to ISMI have had their homes repossessed within nine months of starting to receive (a) income support and (b) income-based jobseeker's allowance in each of the last five years for which figures are available; [123238]

(2) how many repossessions of homes of those in receipt of ISMI there were in each of the last five years for which figures are available. [123240]

Mr. Bayley: This Department does not keep any figures relating to home repossessions. The benefit system is designed to provide homeowners with reasonable protection and we encourage everyone, particularly those taking out new loans, to consider how they would meet their mortgage repayments if they lost their income. The Council of Mortgage Lenders and the Association of British Insurers have recently announced a new minimum standard for mortgage protection insurance. Most repossessions are caused by wider, more serious difficulties than any shortfall in benefit. Recent figures produced by the Lord Chancellors Department show that in England and Wales repossession activity is declining.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent representations his Department has received on the current ISMI mechanisms. [123244]

Mr. Bayley: We have received a number of letters and Parliamentary Questions about the ISMI scheme. In addition, the Department is in close contact with the Council of Mortgage Lenders and are active members of a lending industry/Government partnership group. The remit of this partnership group includes ISMI and at various times discussions have taken place as to its current design and how it will operate in the future.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on inclusion of reform of ISMI in the Urban White Paper. [123241]

Mr. Bayley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has had no discussions with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on inclusion of reform of ISMI in the Urban White Paper. Options for reform of ISMI are included in the recently published Housing Green Paper.

Incapacity Benefit

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security for each of the past five years for which figures are available, how many applications for Incapacity Benefit were refused and what proportion of total applications this represents; what proportion of applicants refused Incapacity Benefit appealed to the Appeals Service and how many were successful; and what proportion of applicants whose appeals were rejected by the Appeals Service appealed to the social security commissioners and how many were successful. [122152]

Mr. Bayley: Information on numbers of claims for Incapacity Benefit (IB), awards and disallowances are in table 1. The available information on appeals is in table 2. It should be noted that the time lags between stages of the process (e.g. between claim and disallowance, or between disallowance and the hearing of an appeal) means that there is no direct relationship between the numbers in the various categories in each. This in turn means that the figures cannot be used to derive proportions. However, it is estimated that around 22 per cent. of those referred are disallowed following a medical test, that of those disallowed around 30 per cent. appeal, and that around 3 per cent. of those who are not successful at tribunal appeal to the Social Security Commissioners. Claimants who are disallowed IB because they fail the contribution conditions may be awarded National Insurance credits ("credits only" cases): and disallowances following the All Work Test and appeals include IB recipients and credits only cases: it is not possible to disaggregate the figures.

Claims, awards and disallowances

	1995	1996	1997	1998	1999
Claims for IB	772,726	1,066,399	1,046,743	929,500	910,829
Disallowed due to failing the contribution conditions	267,910	438,476	446,583	395,665	400,471
IB spells commencing in the period	320,900	508,900	463,940	417,420	386,380
Disallowed following OOT test	880	3,268	4,346	4,948	6,505
Disallowed following AWT	54,080	189,571	208,545	219,007	196,928

Notes:

1. All figures are for calendar years except for the "spells commencing" which are for the period 1 December to 30 November each year. In 1995 all figures are from April 1995 when Incapacity Benefit replaced Sickness Benefit and Invalidity Benefit.
2. The sum of IB spells commencing and disallowances due to failing the contribution conditions does not equal the number of IB claims, as the figure for claims includes some that are subsequently withdrawn and accident declarations (which are made in case a claim to benefit becomes necessary at a later date as a result of an industrial accident).

Sources:

1. Claims received—100 per cent. clerical count.
2. IB spells commencing—5 per cent. sample of claimants.
3. Disallowance figures—100 per cent. of the computer system.

[2] Information on Commissioner's appeals is only available from autumn 1997 when the GAPS system was introduced.

Note:

The number of appeals in favour of the appellant plus the number of decisions upheld does not equal the total number of appeals cleared at hearing. Appeals cleared at hearing also include cases withdrawn or struck out at hearing.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will instruct the Benefits Agency to ensure that Disability Living Allowance is not withdrawn from a person to whom it had previously been awarded for life, without there first being a detailed personal letter explaining the reasons for the withdrawal being given to the beneficiary, and an immediate opportunity being made available to that person for a review of the decision which can consider further evidence from or on behalf of that person. [122684]

Mr. Bayley: As with any benefit, any person whose award of Disability Living Allowance (DLA) is changed, in any way and for whatever reason, is offered, and may demand, a reconsideration of that decision and a right of appeal. Any representations they make will be considered as part of these processes.

It has always been the intention that "life awards" of DLA should only run as long as a person is entitled to that rate of benefit, and the law has always allowed for awards to be altered when there are ground for doing so. People receiving the benefit have always been informed that changes in their circumstances needed to be reported to the Department, and that benefit entitlement could change, even where an award had been given for life.

Nonetheless, we recognise that the "life award" terminology in DLA caused problems; in particular, that the words used suggested that entitlement could continue even when the conditions for receiving the benefit were no longer met. We therefore took powers in the Welfare Reform and Pensions Act 1999 to remove references to "life awards". Accordingly, from 12 January this year the terminology was altered to replace "life award" with "indefinite award" to help clarify the situation. The rules that apply to altering awards, whether made for life, or for an indefinite period, have remained unchanged.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people who have been awarded Disability Living Allowance for life have had that benefit withdrawn during the past 12 months. [122683]

Mr. Bayley: The administration of Disability Living Allowance is a matter for Alexis Cleveland, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. She will write to the right hon. Member.

Letter from Alexis Cleveland to Mr. Dafydd Wigley, dated May 2000:

The Secretary of State has asked Alexis Cleveland to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about how many people who have been awarded disability living allowance (DLA) for life have had that benefit withdrawn during the past twelve months. As she is on annual leave I am replying on her behalf.

The number of people awarded DLA for life whose award was terminated in the twelve months ending November 1999 was 80,200. This is the most recent figure available and it represents termination of benefit due to death; residence and presence conditions no longer satisfied; voluntary cancellation and cancellation by the Department.

I hope this is helpful.

Pensions (Part-time Workers)

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the effect on the solvency of the UK's pension funds of the EC ruling of 16 May on part-time workers' access to pensions; and if he will make a statement. [122779]

Mr. Rooker: This is a complex ruling which needs careful consideration. It also has to be referred back to the House of Lords for their judgment.

Pensions

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer on 18 April 2000, Official Report, column 439W, on pensions, what the National Insurance Fund balance would be, and how far above the minimum level recommended by the Government Actuary, at the end of each of the years (a) 2000–01, (b) 2001–02, (c) 2002–03 and (d) 2003–04, if the basic pension and linked benefit rates remained at their present level in 2000–01 and were uprated in line with prices thereafter. [121195]

Mr. Rooker: Precise long-term forecasts of any excess to the Fund reserves would be misleading, given the sensitivity of the differences between forecasts of receipts and expenditure to the variables involved. The Government Actuary's report[1] shows a projected Fund balance of £16.6 billion at the end of the 2000–01 financial year, which is £8.8 billion in excess of the minimum recommended.

[1] Report by the Government Actuary on the drafts of the Social Security Benefits Uprating Order 2000 and the Social Security (Contributions) (Re-rating and National Insurance Funds Payments) Order 2000. Cm 4587, January 2000.

Taxes and Benefits

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide illustrative examples of cases where taxes and benefits interact to produce a marginal income deduction rate of (a) 50 per cent. and above, (b) 60 per cent. and above, (c) 70 per cent. and above, (d) 80 per cent. and above, (e) 90 per cent. and above and (f) 100 per cent. and above on the same basis as Figure 37 in the departmental report, Cm 4614, p.81. [120382]

Mr. Rooker: Marginal net income deduction rates in Figure 37 of the latest departmental report were calculated by micro simulation modelling, using a sample of households from the 1996–97 Family Resources Survey. The following examples are drawn from the survey results underpinning the latest estimates, for 1999–2000. They are shown by 10 per cent. bands. As in Figure 37, the examples are restricted to households where at least one person is working for 16 hours or more per week.

50 to 59 per cent. rate: None of the cases in the 1996–97 survey are modelled to have a marginal net income deduction rate of between 50 and 59 per cent.

60 to 69 per cent. rate: a single person with no children, on the Housing Benefit taper and with earnings below the income tax and National Insurance thresholds.

70 to 79 per cent. rate: an earner in a couple with two children and on the Family Credit (which has now been replaced by the Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC)) taper, with earnings below the income tax and National Insurance thresholds.

80 to 89 per cent. rate: a lone parent with two children, with earnings below the income tax and National Insurance thresholds, receiving the maximum level of Family Credit (which has now been replaced by the WFTC) and on the Council Tax Benefit and Housing Benefit taper.

90 to 99 per cent. rate: a main earner in a couple with two children and on the Family Credit and Housing Benefit tapers, with both partners working but only the main earner earning enough to pay tax, at 23 per cent. (which has now been reduced to 22 per cent.), and National Insurance contributions, at 10 per cent.

100 per cent. + rate: a sole earner in a couple with one child, on both the Housing Benefit and Council Tax benefit tapers, working more than 30 hours per week and paying income tax at 23 per cent. (now reduced to 22 per cent.) and National Insurance at 10 per cent., receiving Family Credit (now replaced by WFTC) less than the value of the 30 hour credit at £11.05, which is not taken into account in assessments of Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit entitlement.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Computer Viruses

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department at what precise time his Department became aware of the computer virus known as the Love Bug. [122588]

Mr. Straw: Staff supporting the Home Office's main computer networks were first made aware of this computer virus between 09:00 and 09:30 on 4 May 2000.

Joe Wilkins

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department has brought extradition proceedings against Joe Wilkins. [123047]

Mr. Charles Clarke: It is a long-standing policy in matters of this kind not to comment on whether an extradition request for a particular individual has been made.

Special Constables

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, for each of the last 10 years for which figures are available, the number of special constables in each police force in England and Wales. [122029]

The figures for the years 1989–1993 were recorded at 31 December of each year. Since 1995, the figures were recorded at 31 March.

The figures for the years 1989–1995 have been supplied by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary. Those for 1996–99 have been supplied by the Home Office Research Development and Statistics Directorate.

Higher recruitment standards have been applied by police forces in the last few years to reflect the fact that special constables are being trained and deployed on a wider variety of duties than heretofore. Therefore, while there are currently fewer special constables than in previous years, they are now better qualified, trained and equipped, and offer a better service to both the police and the public.

Kosovan Refugees

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for (a) an extension of stay and (b) asylum, have been received from Kosovan refugees in the United Kingdom in each of the last 12 months; and what proportion of each have been granted. [122732]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 18 May 2000]: The information currently available relates to the 4,346 Kosovans who were evacuated to the United Kingdom under the Humanitarian Evacuation Programme. Since March 2000, 190 principal applicants have sought an extension of exceptional leave to enter, 45 have applied for asylum and 70 have applied for both exceptional leave and asylum. These applications are currently under consideration.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will make decisions on applications for (a) extensions of leave to remain and (b) asylum, made by Kosovans who went to Scotland on the Humanitarian Evacuation programme and whose exceptional leave to remain expired on 9 May; and if he will make a statement. [123330]

Mrs. Roche: We have set in place special arrangements to identify and deal as quickly as possible with applications from Kosovans who came to the United Kingdom under the Humanitarian Evacuation programme, but we do not identify cases on the basis of where applicants have been living in the United Kingdom.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what financial and other assistance is to be given to those Kosovan families returning to Kosovo from Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [123332]

Mrs. Roche: The current voluntary return programme from the United Kingdom began on 26 July 1999 and will end on 25 June 2000. The Programme is open both to Kosovans who arrived under the United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR) Humanitarian Evacuation Programme and those who arrived independently. It is open to Kosovans in all parts of the United Kingdom.

For humanitarian and economic reasons, it was decided to give a relocation grant of 720 Deutchmark (DM) per person (approximately £250), payable on arrival in Kosovo, to all those who chose to go back under the return programme. That grant was increased to 1,300 DM per person (approximately £400) with effect from the flight on 5 May. Arrangements have also been made to transport larger possessions overland to Kosovo. This will enable Kosovans to take back, for example, household goods and building materials, which they have bought or been given, and which they cannot take on an aeroplane.

In order to benefit from the grant and the overland transport of goods, Kosovans must register for return by 10 June and leave the United Kingdom on one of the organised voluntary return flights by 25 June.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether, during the period prior to an appeal being assessed Kosovans residing in East Lothian and Renfrewshire will be allowed to remain in their current local authority rented accommodation; and if he will make a statement; [123331]

(2) what financial assistance will be made available to Kosovans who wish to appeal against a refusal of extension to exceptional leave to remain; and if he will make a statement. [123329]

Mrs. Roche: We have no plans to set up any special arrangements for support of such cases. Depending on the circumstances of each case, those who appeal against a refusal of further leave will be eligible for support and accommodation in accordance with existing arrangements.

Tobacco Smuggling

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the (a) longest prison sentence and (b) largest fine imposed on a person convicted of tobacco smuggling into the UK in the last 12 months. [123046]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I refer to the reply I gave my hon. Friend on 23 May 2000, Official Report, column 403W.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) public and (b) private sector accommodation providers have been contracted to provide accommodation for asylum seekers in (i) the North West region, (ii) Pendle, (iii) Burnley, (iv) Rossendale, (v) Blackburn with Darwen and (vi) Hyndburn; and how many units are to be provided in each location. [123032]

Mrs. Roche: The accommodation contracts which have been awarded do not require that property be provided in a specific geographical location. To date, a total of 1,189 bedspaces have been provided in the North West Region by four private sector providers. The bedspaces include 80 in Nelson (Pendle) and a further 88 in Burnley. There are no bedspaces in Blackburn and Darwin. Nor are there any recorded in Rossendale or Hyndburn.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in each of the last five years, how many people were recorded as being detained who had sought asylum at some stage, broken down by stage of application and immigration status; at which institutions these individuals were detained; what was the age range and nationality of those detained; and if he will make a statement. [123163]

Mrs. Roche: The information requested, on numbers of asylum applicants detained in each of the last five years, is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The available information, relating to a snapshot of asylum applicants detained solely under Immigration Act powers as at 30 December 1998 for port applicants and 4 January 1999 for in-country applicants, by stage of application and immigration status, and by nationality, is given in the tables.

British Board of Film Classification

Mrs. Gilroy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the British Board of Film Classification's Annual report for 1999 will be published; and if he will make a statement. [124077]

Mr. Straw: I have today placed in the Library copies of the Annual Report of the British Board of Film Classification for 1999, which gives details of the Board's financial accounts and activities for the year ended 31 December 1999.

On 16 May, the High Court dismissed the Board's application for Judicial Review in respect of appeals against their decision not to classify seven sexually explicit videos in the restricted (R)18 category—which are available only in licensed sex shops to those aged 18 and above. The Board had focused their application for Judicial Review on the consideration which they should give, when classifying videos in the R18 category, to the potential harm to children which may result from their exposure to this material. I am very disappointed with the outcome of this case and have instructed my officials to consider whether any additional steps can be taken to protect children from exposure to these sexually explicit videos. I intend to issue a consultation paper on the matter shortly.

Immigration Legislation

Mrs. Gilroy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to strengthen immigration legislation to tackle abuse of the United Kingdom's immigration control. [124078]

Mrs. Roche: The Government are firmly committed to ensuring that those who seek to migrate to the United Kingdom but have no grounds for doing so under the Immigration Rules, are prevented from coming here.

From 00:01 hours on Thursday 25 May, we will require nationals of Colombia and Ecuador to obtain a Direct Airside Transit Visa even when they intend to remain airside while in transit through the United Kingdom. We have taken this action following evidence of abuse of the Transit Without Visa concession by such nationals.

Criminal Proceedings (Prosecution Appeals)

Mrs. Gilroy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the terms of reference are for the Law Commission's review of the law governing prosecution appeals in criminal proceedings. [124079]

Mr. Straw: The Law Commission published a consultation document on the law of double jeopardy on 12 October 1999 following my request to them of 2 July 1999 as part of the Government's response to the Stephen Lawrence report. The consultation period ended on 31 January 2000 and the Commission is considering the responses received before making its final recommendations to the Government. As the terms of reference intended, the consultation document did refer to prosecution rights of appeal but not in any detail as to how these might be achieved.

I have, therefore, today formally asked the Law Commission to undertake a review of the law governing prosecution appeals against judge directed acquittals in criminal proceedings and other adverse rulings by a judge which may lead to the premature ending of the trial. The terms of reference for this review are:

"To consider

(a) whether any, and if so, what additional rights of appeal or other remedies should be available to the prosecution from adverse rulings of a judge in a trial on indictment which the prosecution may wish to overturn and which may have resulted, whether directly or indirectly, in premature termination of the trial;

(b) to what, if any, procedural restrictions such appeals would be subject and to make recommendations".

I should emphasise that the issue here is the question of a prosecution right of appeal against adverse rulings made by the judge, which leads to the ending of the trial before the jury has considered the evidence. The question whether, and in what circumstances, a jury's decision on the evidence to acquit can be challenged is the subject of the double jeopardy consideration by the Commission. Both these issues are entirely separate from the prosecution's right of appeal against an unduly lenient sentence after a jury has convicted a defendant.

Criminal Cases Review Commission

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the current backlog is of cases being dealt with by the Criminal Cases Review Commission; and what the expected timescale is for considering the application in respect of Mr. Nasir Abbas Choudhary made on 5 April. [123504]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand that, at the end of April, the Criminal Cases Review Commission had 462 cases under review, and 921 awaiting review. The Commission screens all eligible new applications, in order to identify and review those cases where this will apparently require a total of five working days or fewer. Subject to any special factors that would justify giving them priority, cases that require a more extensive review then await allocation to a caseworker, on the basis of date order of receipt. The Commission hopes to screen Mr. Choudhary's application as soon as possible.

Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many staff from his Department were seconded to private sector companies in (a) May 1997 to April 1998, (b) May 1998 to April 1999 and (c) May 1999 to April 2000; and if he will list in each case the companies to which staff were sent, the names and ranks of the staff involved and the duration of the secondment. [123423]

Mr. Straw: The information is as follows:

Number	Rank	Company	Duration
May 1997 to April 1998
1	Senior Civil Service	IBM	8 September 1997 to 7 August 1998
1	Grade 7	Price Waterhouse	3 September 1996 to 30 June 1998
May 1998 to April 1999
1	Senior Civil Service	Woolwich Building Society	1 July 1998 to 1 January 1999
1	Senior Civil Service	Systems Union Ltd.	1 April 1998 to 31 January 2000
May 1999 to April 2000
1	Senior Civil Service	National Westminster Bank Plc	18 January 1999 to 3 December 1999
1	Senior Civil Service	Capita RAS	1 October 1999 to 30 September 2001
1	Grade 6	British Telecom Plc	18 October 1999 to present

Other outward secondments of three months or more recorded centrally in the above periods were predominantly to local government, voluntary and charitable organisations and the European Union.

Mike Tyson

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assurances he sought from Mike Tyson that while in the United Kingdom he would refrain from public appearances other than his boxing match; what assurances he has received; and if he will make a statement. [123571]

Mr. Straw: No assurances were either sought from or given by Mr. Tyson, but it was made clear to him that the entry clearance was granted for a three-week visit strictly for the purposes of the boxing match.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what date his Department first learned of Mike Tyson's proposed visit to Scotland. [123567]

Mr. Straw: My Department became aware in March from newspaper reports that Mr. Tyson was intending to make a visit. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Baillieston (Mr. Wray) wrote to me on 25 April requesting a meeting to discuss the proposed bout in Scotland. I met with my hon. Friend and his delegation, which included my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding), Lord Brooks of Tremorfa and Stephen Davies, on 3 May.

Mr. Tyson's application for entry clearance was submitted to the British Consulate General in New York on Friday 12 May 2000. It was then passed to the Home Office who received it on the morning of Monday 15 May.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what account he took of the possibility of subsequent judicial review when making his decision on whether to admit Mike Tyson to the UK. [123566]

Mr. Straw: As with all such matters, in making my decision I was concerned to ensure that it was in accordance with the general law and the relevant Immigration Rule. It would be for the courts to decide what grounds existed for judicial review of that decision.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what consultations he has had on the impact on police resources of Mike Tyson's proposed visit to the United Kingdom; [123572]

(2) between which dates his Department carried out its assessment of the financial and commercial impact of a decision to refuse permission for Mike Tyson to enter the United Kingdom; [123569]

(3) which persons and organisations he consulted about the financial consequences of a decision to refuse permission for Mike Tyson to enter the United Kingdom; [123570]

(4) what estimate he made of (a) the financial cost to British business and (b) the number of companies which would have suffered financially, if he had refused Mike Tyson permission to enter the UK for his proposed boxing match. [123565]

Mr. Straw: In reaching my decision, I considered all relevant factors and weighed them against the statutory criteria in the Immigration Rules. In doing so, I recognised the potential economic benefits to the United Kingdom, as well as the policing implications. I also took account of the fact that there would be strength of feeling both for and against this entry into the United Kingdom. There is no statutory requirement for further consultation or assessment, and I was able to reach a decision on the basis of the information before us.

I would also refer the hon. Member to the observations of the Minister of State, Home Office, on 23 May 2000, Official Report, columns 191–98WH. As she told the House, both she and I sought information from the Deputy First Minister, Scottish Executive, as to the possible impact of any visit on the police in Strathclyde before the final decision was made.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has received about the proposed visit of Mike Tyson to Scotland; how many (a) supported and (b) opposed the visit; and if he will make a statement. [123568]

Mr. Straw: In support of Mr. Tyson's proposed visit to the United Kingdom, I received representations from Frank Warren on behalf of Sports Network Europe. On 18 May, I was sent a formal notification from the Presiding Officer of the Scottish Parliament of two parliamentary motions opposing the entry of Mike Tyson, but I was in any event well aware of the strong views felt on both sides on this matter, particularly in Scotland.

House of Commons (Metropolitan Police Officers)

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will review the variation of the contract of employment of Metropolitan Police Security Officers stationed at the House in relation to their compulsory retirement age; what consultations took place prior to the change; and if he will make a statement. [123274]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that the contractual age of retirement for all civilian staff remains 60, with any extension of service beyond that age being granted at his discretion. The criteria for extension are set out in the Civil Staff Personnel Manual.

In recent years, some extensions have been made, to help with recruitment difficulties. These have now been overcome and, in order to give staff the maximum opportunity to look for fresh employment after they reach 60, they have been given some six months' notice that no extensions will be expected to be granted from this October. The Security Officers' manager discussed this with their Trade Union representatives before they were notified.

Police Precept

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is (a) the average national police precept and (b) the Humberside police precept; and how many additional police officers could be employed if the difference between the Humberside and the national average police precept were employed for that purpose. [122798]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The average council tax precept (band D) for police authorities in England for 2000–01 is calculated at £69.29. The average for police authorities in Wales for 2000–01 is £79.84.

The council tax precept (band D) for Humberside police authority is £60.30.

The effect of increasing Humberside's precept to the average for English forces would be subject to the impact of Council Tax Benefit Subsidy Limitation and cannot, therefore, readily be translated into additional officers.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Union

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the European Union Centres for Study and Research which are funded by the European Commission; and if he will make a statement on their (a) purpose, (b) publications and (c) political neutrality, with special reference to contributions from the United Kingdom Government. [120849]

Mr. Vaz: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the office of the Commission in London.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many copies of "A New Idea for Europe: The Schuman Declaration 1950–2000" have been published by the European Union; for what purpose; and how many will be distributed in the UK. [121496]

Mr. Vaz: "A New Idea for Europe: The Schuman Declaration 1950–2000" was published by the Commission. I therefore refer the hon. Gentleman to the office of the Commission in London.

European Security

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs where responsibility lies for ensuring democratic oversight of the European Security and Defence Identity and ESDP. [121756]

Mr. Vaz: We are committed to parliamentary scrutiny of defence matters. In addition to the work of this House and that of the House of Lords on defence and security matters, Members of this Parliament sit in the NATO Parliamentary Assembly and the WEU Assembly. Any new defence arrangements within the EU will constitute part of the Common Foreign and Security Policy. The European Parliament is consulted about the main aspects and basic choices of the CFSP, all of whose decisions are submitted to the Scrutiny Committees of Parliament.

Chechnya

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contribution he made to the 106th Session of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on 12 and 13 May on war crimes and human rights violation in Chechnya; what response he has made to Recommendation 1456 (2000) of the Parliamentary Assembly; and if he will make a statement. [12329]

Mr. Vaz: Due to pressing parliamentary business, no UK Minister was able to attend the 106th session of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on 10 and 11 May; the UK was represented by our Ambassador, Mr. Andrew Carter. Mr. Carter was closely involved, on the basis of instructions, in the preparation of the influential statement to the meeting delivered by Portugal on behalf of the European Union and in the drafting of the final communiqué. The Chairman of the meeting, Mr. Brian Cowen, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Ireland, has made clear that the formal response to Recommendation 1456 (2000) of the Parliamentary Assembly is to be formulated by the Committee of Ministers before the Parliamentary Assembly next meets, from 26–30 June.

UN Earth Summit

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if it is his policy to support the bid by South Africa to host the UN Earth Summit 2002. [123432]

Mr. Hain: UK Ministers have warmly welcomed South Africa's bid to host the UN Earth Summit 2002. The main UK objective at this stage is to ensure that a venue is agreed as soon as possible, so that the real work of preparing the Summit can begin.

British Firms (Government Support)

Mr. Roy: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on measures to clarify the Government's support for British firms trading internationally. [123866]

Mr. Battle: I am pleased to announce, also on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade, that the Government's support for international trade will in future be delivered under a single brand name.

Trade Partners UK will be the new name for the Government's network of support for British companies trading in world markets. Trade partners UK will replace the various promotional brands that have been used in the past and will make services clearer, more effective and easier to access. The aim is to encourage more firms—particularly Small and Medium Enterprises—to develop an international dimension to their business. We shall continue to provide support for those that are already successful outside the UK and we shall seek out and help UK firms with the potential to develop new opportunities in overseas markets.

The new brand will make the full range and reach of services much clearer to customers through the launch on 31 May 2000 of a new internet based "gateway"—www.tradepartners.gov.uk. The gateway will provide access to services for people on the move, anywhere in the world. By the end of this year, all the basic information available on international markets and business sectors will be available electronically. These new interactive services will play a crucial part in the Government's plan to make the United Kingdom a world leader in the knowledge economy by 2002.

Trade Partners UK will also act as a quality standard to show that the services, activities and organisations with which it is associated are endorsed by the Government's international trade development and promotion effort.

British Trade International will continue to provide the co-ordination for the services which now fall under the Trade Partners UK brand, working in partnership with Government departments, Devolved Administrations and regional bodies. British Trade International will continue to act as a voice within government for exporters and companies investing overseas.

Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many staff from his Department were seconded to private sector companies in (a) May 1997 to April 1998, (b) May 1998 to April 1999 and (c) May 1999 to April 2000; and if he will list in each case the companies to which staff were sent, the names and ranks of the staff involved and the duration of the secondment. [123420]

Mr. Lock: Figures are available only for the period 1 April to 31 March each year and, for 1997–98 and 1998–99, are given in the table. The only secondments for more than three months were those arising under the terms of a Public Private Partnership with CSL Managed Services for accounting, IT and payroll services. Returns for 1999–2000 have not yet been commissioned but are likely to reflect a significant reduction in numbers now that the seconded staff have either returned to work for the Department or opted to transfer permanently to CSL.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Open Government

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many applications for information she received under the Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information in the last parliamentary session; and how many were granted. [121861]

Clare Short: I refer my right hon. Friend to the reply given by the Home Secretary on 18 May 2000, Official Report, columns 216–17W.

Forests Action Programme

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development who is writing the report on the measures needed to implement the Action Programme on Forests to be considered by G8 Foreign Ministers at their meeting prior to the next summit in Okinawa; when the report will be ready; and if she will place a copy in the Library. [123164]

Clare Short: A report on the implementation of the G8 Action Programme on Forests agreed by Foreign Ministers at Birmingham in May 1998 has been produced by forest experts from each G8 country. The report will be considered in the run-up to the Okinawa Summit. I expect it to be released either at the Summit or at the prior meeting of Foreign Ministers. I will place a copy in the Library as soon as it is published.

Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many staff from her Department were seconded to private sector companies in (a) May 1997 to April 1998, (b) May 1998 to April 1999 and (c) May 1999 to April 2000; and if she will list in each case the companies to which staff were sent, the names and ranks of the staff involved and the duration of the secondment. [123422]

Clare Short: During all of the periods referred to, there has been one such arrangement in place, i.e. the secondment of Ms Joan Laurance (sub-band A2—equivalent to the former Home Civil Service Grade 7) who has been seconded to the consultancy firm Development In Practice. The secondment began in January 1997 and is expected to terminate in September 2000.

Development Council

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what was the outcome of the Development Council held in Brussels on 18 May; and if she will make a statement. [123440]

Clare Short: In his opening statement at the Council, Development Commissioner Nielson made clear that the past record of EC development efforts was poor and that major improvement was needed if the strategic goal of EC development policy should in future be to combat poverty. He was committed to increasing the proportion of EC aid going to the poorest countries and to the poor in Middle Income Countries, although he said that this was constrained by political priorities and the budget process. Mr. Nielson thought that EC aid should focus on a limited number of areas where it could add most value, and that compatibility with internationally agreed strategies was vital. He said that a focal point would be set up in DG Development to analyse coherence between EC development policy and other EC policies affecting developing countries. Mr. Nielson thought that the planned reform of EC aid management would increase the sense of responsibility within the Commission and improve the quality of programming.

I welcomed the focus on poverty, impact and effectiveness in EC aid. I said that ensuring coherent support for development across EC policy was vital and that it had improved since Seattle. I added that closer integration between development policy and the Common Foreign and Security Policy was needed, and that in a globalising world the EU could no longer be concerned only with the near abroad. I emphasised that reform needed to address issues such as the pressure which drove proposals for unjustified levels of EC funding for the Western Balkans. I said that a strategic and regularly updated Action Plan was now needed to implement the reform process.

Subsequent annual reports, if they showed significant improvements in line with this plan, would give member states the confidence to reduce their control of individual EC projects. The Presidency concluded that discussion would continue, leading to the adoption by the next Development Council of a joint statement on EC development policy from the Council and the Commission, with the European Parliament involved in the process.

At dinner, I led the discussion on Sierra Leone. I said that the international community needed to be more willing to take risks to provide security, which was a prerequisite for development. I added that the UN had the moral authority to promote conflict resolution, but lacked the necessary tools to do so effectively. France and Italy praised the UK's action in bolstering the UNAMSIL operation. There was general agreement that the UN's credibility was at stake in Sierra Leone, that more support should be given to UN peace-keeping forces, that the whole approach to peace-keeping needed reviewing urgently and that Commission funds for the Disarmament, Demobilisation and Reintegration programme should be released more quickly in future. Discussion turned to Guinea Bissau, which the Presidency (Portugal) said now merited EU financial support. Finally, France described recent events and the constitutional reform debate in Côte d'Ivoire. It was agreed that the decision on whether or not to suspend EC aid would depend on the forthcoming Heads of Mission report.

The Council adopted conclusions which recommended further improvements to Operational Co-ordination between the Commission and member states in developing countries. I stressed the importance of wider co-ordination around Poverty Reduction Strategy Papers led by the partner countries. The Council then adopted three items without discussion. The UK supported the resolution on Structural Adjustment (budget and sector support for developing countries), which makes poverty reduction its ultimate objective and incorporates many examples of best practice. The UK also supported the procedural conclusions on integrating the environment and sustainable development into EC development policy, and in particular the link with poverty reduction and reinforcement of the importance of policy coherence. We are now keen to help devise a comprehensive strategy to implement these conclusions. The UK also supported the conclusions on HIV/AIDS, Malaria and Tuberculosis, which call on the Commission to examine what else the EC could do to confront major poverty diseases.

The Council followed up last year's evaluation of humanitarian aid by adopting a resolution which seeks to guide the Commission without micromanaging them. The proposal that the EC Humanitarian Office should add to its funding role by developing an emergency response capacity was not adopted; the UK view is that the case for this is not proven. This was followed by a discussion of conflict and crisis situations introduced by the Presidency, during which I reinforced my message on Sierra Leone. It was concluded that discussions on more rapid and effective instruments for conflict management should continue under the French Presidency.

At lunch, Italy opened the discussion on Ethiopia and Eritrea. I, supported by most member states, observed that the moral low ground was alternating between the two countries and that we needed to act firmly now to help resolve the conflict. Belgium then argued for more assistance for Burundi. I said that we should back Nelson Mandela's efforts to facilitate the implementation of the Arusha Accords, including by holding a pledging conference, but added that it would be premature to consider budgetary assistance for Burundi at present. This line met with broad agreement. Denmark then underlined the importance of election monitoring in Zimbabwe. I noted that the land question was currently being used as a smokescreen for terror tactics against the opposition. The Council agreed that the UNDP exercise on land reform should not offer money which was additional to the offers of finance which had been on the table since 1998. I supported the call from Germany and the Netherlands for the Commission to speed up implementation of the European Development Fund contribution to the HIPC trust fund. Ireland introduced the issue of HIV/AIDS, which France said would be a priority for its Presidency. I noted that the cost of anti-retroviral drugs would remain prohibitive, even after the announcement by a major pharmaceutical company of a price reduction for developing countries. The Commission said that this issue would be addressed at the EU-US Summit in Lisbon.

Under other business, the Presidency said that the outstanding differences between the Council and the European Parliament on the proposed environmental integration and tropical forest regulations would go to conciliation within the next few weeks. The Commission presented an information note on the Third UN Conference on Least Developed Countries in May 2001. Denmark presented a note on development aspects of the Sixth Conference of the Parties of the UN Convention on Climate Change in November.

HEALTH

Folic Acid

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will issue the consultation document on the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy in relation to folic acid and the prevention of disease. [120985]

Yvette Cooper: A joint consultation document will be issued shortly by the UK Health Departments and the Food Standards Agency.

Skin Cancer

Ms Kingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions she has had with manufacturers of sun protection products, as part of the campaign to prevent skin cancer, on the prices charged for these products. [121520]

Yvette Cooper: The pricing of sunscreens is a matter for manufacturers to decide and the Government have no direct influence in the price setting process for these items, which are a commercial product. We would encourage manufacturers and retailers to ensure that sunscreens are affordable for all. In May 1998, my hon. Friend the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Competition and Consumer Affairs (Mr. Griffiths) wrote to the Perfumery and Toiletries Association pointing out that sunscreens should not be regarded as a fashion product. We recommend the use of sunscreens as a back-up measure to other sun protection measures such as wearing protective clothing and staying in the shade in the midday sun.

Breast Cancer

Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate (1) how many additional patients per month could benefit from taxanes for the treatment of breast cancer in the NHS; [122470]

(2) how many additional lives would be saved per month through use of taxanes to treat all breast cancer patients in the NHS who could benefit from it. [122471]

Yvette Cooper: About 35,000 women are diagnosed with breast cancer each year and of these between 6,000 and 9,000 will progress to advanced cancer. The National Institute of Clinical Excellence has been asked to review the evidence for the clinical and cost effectiveness of the two taxane drugs (Taxol and Taxotere) in advanced breast cancer, and it would be wrong to pre-empt its advice.

Vaccination

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to monitor safety of childhood vaccinations; and if he will make a statement. [122158]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 15 May 2000]: The Post-Licensing Division of the Medicines Control Agency (MCA) is responsible for monitoring the safety of all marketed medicines, including vaccines, licensed in the United Kingdom. Prior to licensing, all vaccines are thoroughly tested for safety, efficacy and quality. A manufacturer must demonstrate that the vaccine is safe and effective in preventing disease and that it is manufactured to appropriate standards before a Product Licence is given.

Suspected adverse reactions to vaccines, and other medicines, can be reported through the yellow card (YC) scheme by doctors, dentists, coroners, and pharmacists. In addition, vaccine manufacturers must submit details of all reports of suspected adverse drug reactions that are of a serious nature to the MCA. Reports received through the YC scheme and from companies are entered onto a specialised computer system called ADROIT (Adverse Drug Reactions On-line Information Tracking). This system allows rapid processing and detailed analysis of reports. Information collected through this system provides additional information on recognised reactions and can act as an early warning system for the identification of previously unrecognised reactions.

The YC scheme is well established and has been shown to be effective in identifying previously unrecognised adverse reactions. It is the key system for nation-wide surveillance in all age groups and can provide signals for very rare adverse events. The number and pattern of reports are regularly reviewed, and appropriate action initiated if there is indication of a problem.

Information from the YC scheme, together with information from other sources including published papers, large controlled trials, epidemiological studies, record linkage studies and screening of general practitioners and hospital databases provides comprehensive monitoring of the safety of childhood vaccines.

The question of vaccine safety is one that we take very seriously and is of the utmost importance. The benefits and risks of vaccination are always carefully considered and kept under constant review. Serious adverse reactions to vaccines are very rare. Reported suspected adverse reactions are carefully monitored both by the Committee on Safety of Medicines and the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation, independent expert groups which advise the UK health departments. Information on safety issues is considered in detail by the MCA and the Department and by its independent expert advisers on a regular basis.

The National Institute for Biological Standards and Control tests each batch of vaccine for potency, safety and purity before it is issued for use. Only batches that reach the required standard are released for use. No vaccine is issued in the UK unless it passes the highest standards for quality. As a result, the childhood immunisation programme remains the safest way for parents to protect their children against disease.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice parents are given about the side-effects of the Meningitis C vaccine; whether the vaccine carries a risk of brain-damage or death; and whether all risks are made clear before parental consent is requested. [122913]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 19 May 2000]: A leaflet for parents—"Meningitis C. Reduce the risk. Your guide to the new meningitis C vaccine"—provides information on the possible side effects of the meningococcal Group C conjugate vaccine. The consent form for the meningococcal Group C immunisation tells parents to "Make sure you have read and understood the leaflet". It goes on to advise "Before you fill in the rest of the form, please make sure you have read this leaflet carefully" and then explicitly draws attention to "the possible side effects of the immunisation (read page 6)". Brain damage and death are not recognised risks.

About 26 million copies of the parents' leaflet have been printed and it has been mailed to general practitioners' surgeries, pharmacies and schools for every parent to receive and also made widely available though high street pharmacies and post offices. Copies of the leaflet and the consent form are available in the Library.

Breast Implants

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress the Government have made in the introduction of compulsory registration of the details of each breast implant and removal operation on a National Breast Implant Registry. [122553]

Yvette Cooper: Registration of each implant and explant operation on the National Breast Implant Registry cannot be compulsory as the entry of information on the registry requires consent of the patient.

However a number of actions are being taken to increase compliance with registration. These include promoting awareness of the National Breast Implant Registry; guidance to be issued by the Royal College of Surgeons on clinical practice for breast surgery, and the Care Standards Bill.

Human Papilloma Virus

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the members of the expert advisory group which will oversee the commissioning and running of the pilot sites for human papilloma virus testing. [122786]

Yvette Cooper: The membership of the expert advisory group on the pilot for human papilloma virus testing has not yet been agreed. Prospective members will be approached shortly and will include representatives from colposcopy, cyto-pathology, virology, primary care, epidemiology and consumer groups. When the membership is finalised, details will be posted on the United Kingdom National Screening Committee's website at http://www.nsc.nhs.uk/

Beta Interferon

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects the National Institute for Clinical Excellence to publish its report on the use of beta interferon. [122930]

Mr. Denham: The National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE) has been asked to provide authoritative guidance on a range of health topics, of which the appraisal of the drug beta interferon was one. The timetabling of this work is a matter for NICE, although I understand that NICE is intending to disseminate its guidance to the National Health Service during August.

Race Equality

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to establish NHS race equality units outside London. [123087]

Ms Stuart: We have no plans to establish National Health Service race equality units outside London.

Accommodation (South-East)

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what schemes he plans to introduce to increase accommodation provision for public health care staff in the south-east of England. [123062]

Ms Stuart: A national housing co-ordinator for the National Health Service has been appointed from 1 April 2000 with responsibilities for addressing the provision of adequate and affordable residential accommodation for nursing and other key National Health Service personnel.

Any shortfalls are currently being identified in the south-east region of the National Health Service as well as other areas of the country to target improvement strategies.

Residential and Nursing Homes

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the number of employees providing nursing care in residential and nursing homes who have recognised nursing qualifications. [123079]

Mr. Hutton: The table provides details of the number of nursing staff employed in private nursing homes, hospitals and clinics.

Number of whole-time equivalent nursing staff in private nursing homes, hospitals and clinics

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department is taking to ensure high quality of care in residential and nursing homes in the United Kingdom. [123080]

Mr. Hutton: We are reforming the regulatory arrangements for residential care and nursing homes. The Care Standards Bill, which covers England and Wales, will establish a National Care Standards Commission for England to regulate all care homes to national minimum standards to ensure consistency and improve the quality of care and protection for vulnerable people. In Wales, the National Assembly will take on the same regulatory functions as the Commission.

In Scotland there will be a Scottish Care Commission regulating services on a broadly similar basis to that in England.

The specific arrangements for Northern Ireland will be a matter for the Northern Ireland Assembly to decide in due course.

GM Food

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals he is evaluating for introducing product liability for GM food. [123389]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 23 May 2000]: Manufactured food, which includes all genetically modified food which has been approved to date, is already covered by the product liability provisions of Part 1 of the Consumer Protection Act 1987, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Correspondence

Mr. Terry Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will reply to the letters from the hon. Member for Worsley of 17 November 1999 and 4 April 2000, regarding his constituent Lucy Darwell. [123401]

Yvette Cooper: I replied to my hon. Friend on 22 May.

Human Rights Act 1998

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice he has given the National Health Service on the implications for the NHS of the coming into force of the Human Rights Act 1998. [123255]

Ms Stuart: We shall shortly be issuing guidance alerting the National Health Service and Social Services to the coming into force of the Human Rights Act on 2 October 2000.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Plutonium Exports

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what were the (a) origin of the reactor, (b) isotopic composition, (c) point of departure, (d) mode of transport and (e) final end-use of the United Kingdom plutonium exported to the United States of America between 1970 and 1988 in (i) the form of fuel elements and (ii) other forms. [119256]

Mrs. Liddell: Whenever the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority or BNFL export United Kingdom plutonium under civil arrangements they keep certain records. These records include the total amount of plutonium exported and the United Kingdom owner of the plutonium. They do not include details of the particular reactor in which the plutonium was produced. This reflects the fact that spent fuel from different UK civil reactors and belonging to different owners may be reprocessed at the same time and that the plutonium arising from reprocessing ceases to have a separate reactor-specific identity. Plutonium is attributed to an owner based on an estimate of the fissile content of the irradiated fuel originally supplied, usually on an annual basis. The specific plutonium atoms allocated to an owner are not necessarily the same atoms that the owner originally supplied.

All exports of United Kingdom plutonium to the United States under civil arrangements have been subject to relevant bilateral and international arrangements to ensure that the material exported is used exclusively for peaceful, non-explosive purposes. The precise end use to which such exported plutonium has been put is however, a matter for the United States.

Information relating to the isotopic composition, point of departure and the mode of transport used for each export is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Export of United Kingdom plutonium to the United States under non-civil arrangements are a matter for the Ministry of Defence.

BNFL

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will place in the Library a copy of the memorandum sent by Rupert Wilcox-Baker of British Nuclear Fuels to Claire Lambert in his Department's Nuclear Industry Directorate, dated 8 March 1996, concerning information about a parliamentary question asked by the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent in respect of plutonium exports to the United States. [120059]

Mrs. Liddell: I have placed a copy of the relevant letter in the Libraries of the House.

Industrial Diseases (Claims)

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many claims for (a) chronic bronchitis and emphysema and (b) vibration white finger have been settled, in each area in (i) January, (ii) February, (iii) March and (iv) April; and when he expects all present claims to be settled. [122817]

Mrs. Liddell: In the four months from January the Department had made payments in full or part settlement of claims totalling some £6.7 million to 1,771 respiratory disease claimants and some £30.3 million to 3,940 VWF claimants—broken down as follows:

	England		Scotland		Wales
Month	Respiratory diseases	VWF	Respiratory diseases	VWF	Respiratory diseases	VWF
January	397	863	44	79	83	152
February	277	672	21	49	98	77
March	282	1,062	9	98	109	163
April	365	520	25	95	61	110
Total	1,321	3,117	99	321	351	502

With regard to VWF, the Department remains on track to have tested all claims registered to date by summer next year, with interim settlement offers following shortly afterwards. The majority of claimants will receive final settlement offers by summer the following year.

As for respiratory disease, given the number of claimants—over 104,000 to date—it may take two to three years before all claims are complete. We introduced in March last year a national programme of spirometry, the first state of the Medical Assessment Process, which has seen nearly 50,000 claimants tested, with a further 11,000 invited to make appointments. With nearly 69,000 live claims this means in just over 12 months we have contacted 90 per cent. of claimants.

By the end of June we expect that 2,000 claimants will have gone through the second stage of the MAP and by September that the number of second stage medical assessments will be up to 4,000 a month. In order to sustain these levels we will of course require similar numbers of completed form packs from solicitors.

National Grid Company

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what permanent derogations have been granted to the National Grid Company; and at what locations. [123434]

Mrs. Liddell: Ofgem has issued derogations to the National Grid Company and other system users relating to security standards and the technical rules for connection to the system. Derogations are not permanent as they can be amended or revoked at any time.

International Organisation of Legal Metrology

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recommendations of the Organisation Internationale de Metrologie Legale in the last five years have (a) been and (b) not been implemented. [123450]

Dr. Howells: In the last five years the International Organisation of Legal Metrology (OIML) has published 31 Recommendations. Of these, 17 deal with measuring instruments which fall within my responsibilities. OIML Recommendations are used as the basis for legislation wherever practicable. The situation on implementation is set out in the table.

Number	Title	Implementation
R31	Diaphragm gas meters	None. Council Directive 71/318/EEC as amended has not been brought into line with R31. The Directive has been implemented by SI 1988/296
R49	Water meters intended for the metering of cold water	Implementation at the planning stage
R50 -1 and -2	Continuous totalizing automatic weighing instruments (Belt weighers). Part 1: Metrological and Technical requirements—Tests; Part 2: Test report format	Draft legislation in preparation
R51 -1	Automatic catchweighing instruments. Part 1: Metrological and technical requirements—Tests	Draft Regulations sent out for comments on 28 April 2000. (These only cover catchweighers and not checkweighers and weight-graders, on which there is no UK legislation)
R60	Metrological regulation for load cells	No separate UK legislation. These are components of non-automatic weighing instruments and automatic weighing instruments
R61 -1	Automatic gravimetric filling instruments. Part 1: Metrological and technical requirements - Tests	Implemented by SI 2000/388
R79	Labelling requirements for prepackaged products (including prohibiting misleading packaging practices)	None. Council Directives 75/106/EEC and 76/211/EEC as amended have not been brought into line with R79. The Directives have been implemented by SI 1986/2049 as amended
R81	Dynamic measuring devices and systems for cryogenic liquids (including tables of density for liquid argon, helium, hydrogen, nitrogen and oxygen)	No UK legislation
R85	Automatic level gauges for measuring the level of liquid in fixed storage tanks	No UK legislation
R106 -1	Automatic rail-weighbridges. Part 1: Metrological and technical requirements—Tests	Draft legislation in preparation
R107 -1	Discontinuous totalizing automatic weighing instruments (totalizing hopper weighers). Part 1: Metrological and technical requirements—Tests	Implemented by SI 1996/797
R117/R118	R117 Measuring systems for liquids other than water. R118 Testing procedures and test report format for pattern evaluation of fuel dispensers for motor vehicles	Implemented by SI 1995/1014 as amended by 1998/2218
R119	Pipe provers for testing measuring systems for liquids other than water	No UK legislation
R120	Standard capacity measures for testing measuring systems for liquids other than water	Not yet considered
R125	Measuring systems for the mass of liquids in tanks	No UK legislation
R129	Multi-dimensional measuring instruments	No UK legislation

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much money was spent in each of the last five years (a) subscribing to and (b) supporting the UK's committee representatives on the Organisation Internationale de Metrologie Legale. [123451]

Dr. Howells: The UK pays an annual subscription to the Organisation Internationale de Metrologie Legale (OIML). In the last five years the subscriptions paid have been as follows:

Year	£
1995	35,646
1996	40,293
1997	36,118
1998	33,004
1999	30,371

Support for UK participation in the committees of OIML comes from a number of Government departments and other organisations (including industry associations). It is not therefore possible to quantify the cost of this support.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the policy of the Government towards the work of the Organisation Internationale de Metrologie Legale. [123452]

Dr. Howells: The United Kingdom is one of more than 100 countries participating in the work of the Organisation Internationale de Metrologie Legale (OIML). The Government support the work of this important organisation, which contributes to the removal of barriers to trade by publishing technical recommendations in the form of draft model laws and through its system of OIML certificates. These help manufacturers of measuring instruments to obtain approval for their products in OIML member countries. The UK participates in those areas of OIML's work where we have a specific interest.

Recruitment Industry

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received in response to his proposals relating to regulation of Temp to Perm in the private recruitment industry as contained in his Department's draft regulation of 16 March; what assessment his Department has made of (a) the potential effect of these proposals on the permanent recruitment market and (b) the extent to which the proposals may create a disincentive to recruitment firms to train and develop their temporary workers; and if he will make a statement. [123399]

Mr. Alan Johnson: We have received representations from agencies, workers, unions and employers. There has been general support for the principle that hirers should have the option of a hiring extension of negotiable length, followed by free transfer, as an alternative to a "temp to perm" fee and also that there should be a limit on the period agencies may continue to demand a transfer fee after a hirer has ceased to engage a worker. Some respondents have endorsed our suggested four week limit but others have advocated shorter and longer periods.

Employers wishing to recruit permanent staff will generally continue to do so from the outset, because they will wish to attract applicants who are looking for permanent work. This is confirmed by our analysis of independent research showing the level of market segmentation between the permanent and temporary sectors.

We do not believe that a disincentive for bureaux to train and develop temporary workers will be created. Hirers will continue to seek skilled staff, and bureaux will continue to be able to recoup their training costs, in the event of a temporary worker transferring to permanent employment, either through an extension of the hiring period or the charging of a "temp to perm" fee.

Business Links

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many businesses with more than (a) one employee and (b) 10 employees used the Business Link Service in each region in (i) the most recent available year and (ii) 1997–98. [123535]

Ms Hewitt: As part of the Management Information requirement, Business Links provide SBS with total usage data which is broken down to usage by number of employees.

The data requirement is to count all businesses using Business Link services for non-trivial activity. The table shows that activity for periods 1997–98 and 1999–2000. A business which receives advice twice within a quarter is only counted once, but a business which receives assistance in two separate quarters will be counted in each quarter. It is not possible, because of the risk of double counting, to give precise total usage of businesses being assisted each year.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which Business Links Partnerships have developed centres of enterprise, and which business areas are covered by each centre. [123544]

Mr. Alan Johnson: There are currently 22 centres of expertise within the Business Links Partnerships funded specifically for that purpose. The Business Links Partnerships and the 22 centres of expertise are set out in the following table. A number of these projects are not sector specific and are designed to support all businesses.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many businesses in each region have received expert advice on the use of information and communications technologies from Local Support Centres associated with Business Links. [123539]

Ms Hewitt: As part of the Management Information requirement, Business Links provide SBS with usage data for the Information Society Initiative Centres (formally known as Local Support Centres).

We do not collect national records of the nature of every assistance given, in order to minimise the management requirement of Business Links. However, we do ask them to omit trivial activity. The table shows activity for the period 1999–2000. The figures given are the numbers of businesses assisted in each quarter. A business which receives advice twice within a quarter is only counted once, but a business which receives assistance in two separate quarters will be counted in each quarter. It is not possible, because of the risk of double counting, to give a precise total number of businesses being assisted each year.

Skills Training

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the members of the group developing a best practice model for large businesses to work with suppliers and customers to improve the skills of their workforce. [123564]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The group working on this Competitiveness White Paper commitment were: Mike Kinski, then at Stagecoach; Howard Bentley from Sainsburys; Jerry Cope from Post Office Counters; Stephen Dunn from Scottish Power; Barrie Oxtoby, then at Rover; and Les Shearn from British Aerospace.

Learning through Business Networks—the final output from this work—was published in September 1999.

"Fit for the Future" Campaign

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many partner organisations and champions have been recruited to the "Fit For The Future" campaign. [123552]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Currently there are 52 organisations involved as partners within the campaign and 103 individuals have been identified as best practice champions.

National Campaign for Enterprise

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress of the National Campaign for Enterprise. [123546]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The DTI is supporting the business-led Enterprise Insight, the formal name for the National Campaign for Enterprise, which aims to create a more entrepreneurial culture throughout the UK. So far we have committed funding towards the costs of setting up the Campaign office and organising an 'ambassador' programme.

Enterprise Insight was launched by the Prime Minister on 11 May. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry attended, taking part in discussion groups with entrepreneurs, business leaders and young people.

Two young people's forums have already been held in Hull and Wales and further regional activities are currently being co-ordinated by the Enterprise Insight team.

200 entrepreneurs and business people have signed up to the Campaign so far. These 'ambassadors' will participate in a range of activities to raise awareness and understanding of the role and value of enterprise in the community.

"Creating a Great Place to Work"

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the booklet, "Creating a Great Place to Work", has been distributed to business. [123563]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The leaflet has been distributed to a large number of businesses, business support organisations and business representative organisations.

Management Training and Development

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the Departments which are involved and the nature of their involvement in developing a national strategy for the delivery of management training and development. [123553]

Mr. Alan Johnson: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Secretary of State for Education and Employment have jointly sponsored the formation of the Council for Excellence in Management and Leadership to undertake the development of a national strategy for Management and Leadership Development. The Council was officially launched on 4 April 2000.

The aim of the Council is:

"To ensure that the UK is able to develop the managers and leaders of the future to match the best in the world. To sustain the UK's competitive performance, this must be achieved in both the public and private sectors".

The Council proposes to pursue this aim by:

(a) identifying key issues for management and leadership in England in consultation with the Management Councils established in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, and to make proposals to address them;

(b) identifying key stakeholders and challenging them to take action on the basis of the investigations undertaken by the Council and its members;

(c) articulating a vision for management development, in particular by developing a management development strategy for the UK, which incorporates leadership issues and specifically addresses the needs of SMEs;

(d) reviewing the quality, relevance and support for management and leadership education and training;

(e)monitoring progress on issues identified by the Council as in need of action; and

(f) reporting annually to Government and to stakeholders on the progress of those responsible for taking action.

People Skills Scoreboard

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made in extending the People Skills Scoreboard to a wider range of sectors. [123554]

Mr. Alan Johnson: In addition to the People Skills Scoreboard for the engineering sector (published by the Engineering and Marine Training Authority), Scoreboards are being developed, in partnership with National Training Organisations, in a range of manufacturing and service sectors, such as Clothing, Textiles and Footwear, Information Technology, and Computer Services, Multimedia and Steel.

The objective is to publish and disseminate the Scoreboards to raise business awareness about the importance and value of training.

Late Payment of Commercial Debts

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate how many businesses have benefited from the provisions of the Late Payment of Commercial Debts (Interest) Act 1998. [123562]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Small firms responding to a survey in late 1999 by the Credit Management Research Centre at Leeds University Business School were asked if they had used the Late Payment of Commercial Debts (Interest) Act 1998 since its introduction.

5 per cent. of small firms who responded stated that they had used the legislation, up from 3 per cent. in the previous six months. 11 per cent. stated that they were planning to use it.

We are also monitoring the effect on the Act on payment times in the UK. Recent research published in the Grant Thornton European Business Survey confirms that the average payment period for sales invoices in the UK now stands at 45 days, against an EU average of 54 days, identifying a downward trend in UK payment times in recent years.

Small and Medium-sized Enterprises (Internet)

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many small and medium-sized enterprises have gained the ability to buy and sell over the Internet with the help of Local Support Centres associated with Business Links in each year since 1997 (a) in each region and (b) as a percentage of all businesses. [123538]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Usage figures for Information Society Initiative (ISI) Centres associated with Business Links are published quarterly as part of Business Link

Management Information, copies of which are placed in the Library of the House. Figures are not available prior to 1998. Since 1 January 1998 ISI Centres associated with Business Links in England have provided support to thirty seven thousand (37,016) businesses.

The International Benchmarking Study (DTI/Pub 4108/3k/4/99/NP URN 99/797) provides data on uptake of information and communication technologies among small and medium sized companies. However, such uptake cannot be attributed to any single provider of advice.

Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the impact of the Enterprise Fund on (a) the availability of venture capital for very early stage high technology firms and (b) the delivery of the small firms loan guarantee scheme. [123548]

Mr. Alan Johnson: One of the key elements of the Enterprise Fund is the UK High Technology Fund which is being established to address an acknowledged weakness of the venture capital market in this area. On 3 April David Irwin announced that the fund manager, Wesport Private Equity, had been successful in raising £57 million from the private sector, alongside £20 million of Government money, for the UK High Technology Fund. The Fund has been set a final closing target of £125 million, of which £105 million will be from the private sector. Wesport Private Equity continues to raise money from the private sector towards this closing target.

The Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme has been running since 1981 and is periodically evaluated by independent consultants. A report of the most recent study, which looked at all aspects of the scheme including its delivery, was published in March 1999. The recommendations of this report are currently being considered.

Enterprise Fund

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the impact of the Enterprise Fund on (a) (i) local and (ii) regional provision of equity on smaller amounts to growing businesses and (b) finance for a wider range of new products and services. [123550]

Mr. Alan Johnson: One of the key elements of the Enterprise Fund is the support available from Regional Venture Capital Funds, which will specialise in the provision of small scale equity to businesses with growth potential. Bidding guidance for potential sponsors of new regional funds was issued on 22 December 1999 and 21 notifications of intention to bid have subsequently been received. Should all of these come forward, all of the English regions will have access to at least one new, viable fund.

The Enterprise Fund was established to address gaps in the markets providing finance to SMEs. New programmes will be developed under the Fund in response to market needs.

Business Starts

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the growth in the number of business start-ups since the launch of the Public Service Agreement. [123533]

Mr. Alan Johnson: Since the Public Service Agreement was launched in December 1998 it is estimated that there have been 549,000 business start-ups in England and Wales.

Competitiveness Objectives

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list his (a) national and (b) regional competitiveness objectives. [123545]

Ms Hewitt: My Department's aim is to increase competitiveness and scientific excellence in order to generate higher levels of sustainable growth and productivity in a modern economy. To achieve that, we have set ourselves four over-arching national objectives: to promote enterprise, innovation and increased productivity; to make the most of the UK's science, engineering and technology; to create strong and competitive markets; and to develop a fair and effective legal and regulatory framework. Specific targets in pursuit of these objectives are set out in the DTI Public Service Agreement, which is in the Library of the House.

At regional level, our objective is to raise the economic performance of all regions, working with other Government Departments and Regional Development Agencies. My Department pursues its policies in ways which recognise regional differences. Regional competitiveness strategies have been developed by the Regional Development Agencies, and the Department works closely with them to ensure that its regional policies, including Regional Selective Assistance, the Assisted Areas map, EU Structural Funds and new initiatives such as the enterprise grant scheme contribute towards achieving the objectives set out in these strategies.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many staff from his Department were seconded to private sector companies in (a) May 1997 to April 1998, (b) May 1998 to April 1999 and (c) May 1999 to April 2000; and if he will list in each case the companies to which staff were sent, the names and ranks of the staff involved and the duration of the secondment. [123457]

Dr. Howells: From the information that is held centrally within the Department, the details we have on outward secondments are as follows:

British Trade International and the Invest in Britain Bureau

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the relationship between British Trade International and the Invest in Britain Bureau. [124030]

Mr. Caborn: I am pleased to announce, also on behalf of the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle), that the Invest in Britain Bureau will move alongside Trade Partners UK (the new brand for the Government's trade services) under the British Trade International umbrella, with Sir David Wright as the single Group Chief Executive of British Trade International. The Board of British Trade International will remain under the chairmanship of DTI and FCO Ministers and its responsibilities will be enlarged to cover inward investment. This will lead to more coherent presentation—and, over time, management—of the Government's international trade and investment activities at home and overseas. It builds on an issue which was identified in the Cabinet Secretary's 1999 review of export promotion.

The Invest in Britain Bureau will retain a distinct identity within the enlarged organisation and will continue to have its own Chief Executive. We plan to review the IBB brand, building on work which has already been undertaken following the 1998 Competitiveness White Paper. The name of the umbrella organisation will also be reviewed in the light of these changes.

This announcement heralds important advantages for business. The new, combined organisation will focus on the single goal of developing business competitiveness in the UK, as it interfaces with the global marketplace. Working under one umbrella the two operations will focus on investment into the UK from overseas, on opportunities for business growth from investments abroad and on the broad spectrum of trade development and support at national, regional and local levels.

The new arrangements will strengthen and better co-ordinate the relationship between investment and trade activities in central Government, devolved Administrations and Regional Development Agencies, each of which will continue to be represented on the Board of British Trade International. The enlarged responsibilities of British Trade International will further strengthen the close relationship between trade and investment work in the network of commercial offices in overseas posts, focusing them on economic advantage for the UK, whether through new opportunities for international trade or for investment in this country by overseas firms or partnerships.

Petrol Undertakings Review

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what the reasons are for the delay in the completion of the Review of the Petrol Undertakings; when the review will be completed; and if he will publish the results of the review; [122942]

(2) what discussions he, his officials and the Office of Fair Trading have held with (a) the major oil suppliers, (b) the United Kingdom Oil Producers Association and (c) the Institute of Petroleum, to discuss the Review of the Petrol Undertakings since January 2000; and what the outcome of those meetings was. [122943]

Dr. Howells: DTI Ministers and officials have not held discussions with the parties mentioned regarding the Office of Fair Trading's review of the petrol undertakings. During the course of the review the Office of Fair Trading have had discussions with, or invited views from, all sides of the industry. This has included major oil companies and retailers associations. Industry views have helped to inform the Office of Fair Trading's review.

The completion of the review has been delayed because of consultations with the industry and because the Office of Fair Trading has had to allocate resources between several areas of high priority including the investigation of fuel prices in the Highlands and Islands.

The Office of Fair Trading expect to advise ministers shortly on whether the undertakings should be retained, removed or amended. Policy advice from the Director General of Fair Trading to Ministers is not published. However, Ministers will announce their decision on the matter in due course.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will identify on what basis, and in what numbers, those receiving working families tax credit (a) are and (b) are not, entitled to passported benefits; and what advice is given to those on working families tax credit on the category to which they belong. [119322]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 18 April 2000]: Working Families Tax Credit can be used as a "general passport" to various benefits so that those benefits are made available to everyone receiving Working Families Tax Credit. Other benefits, for example, help with NHS charges, are targeted on families receiving Working Families Tax Credit who have net incomes of £11,370 per year or less. At the end of March around 900,000 families were passported this way.

Lending Rates

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the average (a) interest rates and (b) mortgage interest rates in each year since 1992. [123286]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The table lists the average 2-week repo rate, 10 year UK gilt rate, and the average mortgage interest rate in each year to May since 1992.

The figures show that by aiming to secure low inflation and sound public finances, the macroeconomic policy framework has helped keep interest rates historically low while meeting the Government's objectives of achieving high and sustainable levels of growth and employment.

Taxation (I-E Formula)

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the tax yield has been from financial instruments or products whose taxation is subject to the I-E formula in each of the last eight financial years. [123394]

Dawn Primarolo: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list (a) the financial (i) instruments and (ii) products whose taxation is subject to the I-E formula, (b) the relevant composite rates of tax applied to each such instrument and product and (c) the rates of tax used in each of the last eight financial years in respect of each such instrument and product. [123395]

Dawn Primarolo: There are no statutory restrictions on the type of financial instruments that an insurer may invest in to provide funds to meet payments due to policy holders. The funds that are subject to the I-E treatment are those held to meet payments due to policy holders in respect of policies of life insurance, life annuity contracts and capital redemption policies other than those relating to pension business, overseas life assurance business, individual savings account business and life reinsurance business. The rates of tax payable on the income and profits from those investments broadly reflect the tax that policy holders might have paid had they held the underlying investments directly.

The tax paid by the insurer under I-E is treated as satisfying the basic rate tax liability of the policy holder. Policy holders will have no further tax to pay when they obtain the proceeds of their policies unless the policy is not a qualifying policy and they are themselves liable to tax at the higher rate. Qualifying policies are broadly those with regular premiums and a substantial death benefit that last for at least 10 years.

The rate of tax payable by the company on the underlying investments, so far as they are building up for the benefit of policy holders, for each of the last eight years is shown in the table:

MEP Pensions

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost to his Department of funding the pensions of members of the European Parliament in each of the last three years; to how many beneficiaries these payments are made; and what estimate he has made of the future annual liability for making such pension payments. [119585]

Mr. Andrew Smith [pursuant to his reply, 3 May 2000, c. 147W]: I regret that my earlier answer was incomplete.

MEPs receive two pensions: one from the EU and a national pension. Expenditure on the former is met from the European Parliament section of the EC budget, as my earlier answer noted.

Regarding the latter, under the European Assembly (Pay and Pensions) Act 1979, the basic costs of the European Parliament (United Kingdom Representatives) Pension Scheme are met from the Consolidated Fund. Pension increases are funded from the Civil Superannuation Vote. Details of the costs are published annually in the Supplementary Statements to the Consolidated Fund and National Loans Fund Accounts.

In each of the last three financial years, the basic costs were as follows:

	Basic pension incl. Widows and dependents	Lump sums
1997–98	202	0
1998–99	219	135
1999–2000[1]	403	616

[1] 1999 was an election year to the European Parliament, many MEPs who stepped down were of retirement age or above. Resettlement grants totalling £1,364K were also funded from the Consolidated Fund.

Note:
As at 31 March 2000, there were 54 beneficiaries in receipt of pensions under the scheme. No estimate has been made of future annual liabilities.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many staff from his Department were seconded to private sector companies in (a) May 1997 to April 1998, (b) May 1998 to April 1999 and (c) May 1999 to April 2000; and if he will list in each case the companies to which staff were sent, the names and ranks of the staff involved and the duration of the secondment. [123417]

Mr. Rooker: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Secondments and attachments are part of the Interchange Initiative, which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. All sectors of the economy are involved: Voluntary, Education, Health, Public and Private. Interchange is a key component of the reform agenda. The Modernising Government White Paper committed us to increasing interchange, in particular by bringing in more people on secondment and sending more of our people out.

Economic Inactivity (Males)

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many men aged 16 to 24 were economically inactive, according to the Labour Force Survey, in each year since 1992, broken down by (a) students and (b) others. [117557]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Pullinger to Mr. David Willetts, dated 24 May 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent question about men aged 16–24 who are economically inactive. I am replying in the Director's absence.

The attached table shows non-seasonally adjusted estimates from the Labour Force Survey (LFS) which is the main source of labour market data on individuals. It gives the percentage of economically inactive men aged 16–24 by whether or not they are full-time students in the spring (March-May) quarter of each year since 1992.

People aged 16 or over are classed as economically inactive by the LFS if they are not in employment and do not satisfy the criteria for International Labour Organisation (ILO) unemployment. This includes those who want a job but who have not been seeking work in the last 4 weeks, those who are seeking work but are not available to start and those who do not want a job (for example, students not working or seeking work).

The LFS classifies people as full-time students if they are at school, on a sandwich course or full time at university, polytechnic or college.

Penalty Clauses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the contracts entered into with private sector companies for the provision of goods or services since May 1997 where penalty clauses were triggered for non-performance; and if he will make a statement. [122023]

Mr. Rooker: Where appropriate DSS contracts are drawn up to incentivise suppliers to provide acceptable or better levels of service.

Details of all such contracts could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 24 May. [123070]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. member to the reply I gave today to my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw), Official Report, column 960.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Jay Abatan

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Solicitor-General if he will call for a report from the Crown Prosecution Service on its actions following the attack on Jay Abatan in Brighton in January 1999. [122482]

The Solicitor-General [holding answer 16 May 2000]: The death of Jay Abatan in Brighton on 29 January 1999 is a tragedy. To his family, his widow and two young children, the criminal justice system appears to have let them down.

I informed the hon. Member in a written answer on 16 May 2000, Official Report, columns 80–81W, that I was making further inquiries about the criminal proceedings brought against those who were allegedly involved in the incident that resulted in Jay Abatan's death.

I have now met with the Chief Crown Prosecutor for Sussex, the Branch Crown Prosecutor responsible for the prosecution team, and prosecuting counsel who had the conduct of the case throughout. I am satisfied that everything that could have been done by them to secure a successful conclusion to the criminal proceedings was done.

I know that the hon. Member attended parts of the trial, which lasted six days. It concluded on 9 May 2000 with the acquittal of two defendants.

The history of the proceedings is this: two defendants were jointly charged on 1 February 1999 with manslaughter, affray and causing actual bodily harm.

During the course of preparing the case for committal proceedings the Crown Prosecution Service took the unusual steps of obtaining reluctant witness summonses against two men in an attempt to clarify the sequence of events leading up to the assault on Jay Abatan. In the event they added nothing to the prosecution case and so were not used in evidence.

The charges related to an incident which occurred in the early hours of Sunday 24 January 1999 when a dispute arose over a taxi outside a nightclub in Brighton. The dispute involved two groups of men. No witness actually saw Jay Abatan being punched. However, as a result of being struck he fell to the ground, sustained a fracture to his skull and died in hospital on 29 January 1999 without regaining consciousness. His death was the basis of the manslaughter charge against the two men.

Prior to committal a conference was held with prosecuting counsel, the Crown Prosecution Service lawyer with conduct of the case and the police to discuss the evidence against both defendants. It was clear at the end of that conference that there was no evidence of joint enterprise and if both defendants were to be pursued for manslaughter then there was no prospect of a successful prosecution against either of them. Of the circumstantial evidence available the stronger evidence was against the first defendant, who on the evidence available was the closer of the two men to Jay Abatan at the crucial time and who had allegedly made a comment in the taxi after the incident was over: "I only hit him once". The second defendant was further away and had distanced himself from the argument at the time it was taking place in a comment to an independent witness. The decision was therefore made that the manslaughter case against the second defendant would be discontinued, unless the outstanding DNA evidence provided a link between him and Jay Abatan.

On 24 June, the day of the committal proceedings, the results of the DNA evidence were obtained. The results added nothing to the prosecution case against the second defendant. Consequently, in accordance with the decision reached in conference, the Crown Prosecution Service withdrew the manslaughter charge against the second defendant. It pursued the manslaughter charges against the first defendant. However, the magistrate refused to commit the first defendant for manslaughter because of what he held was insufficient evidence.

Notwithstanding this decision the prosecution, after taking counsel's advice, decided to pursue the charge of manslaughter at trial in the Crown Court. A draft indictment, which included the manslaughter charge, was therefore lodged at Lewes Crown Court on 22 July 1999.

The prosecution wanted to continue with the manslaughter charge against the first defendant and made every effort to ensure that it remained on the indictment. The leader of the South Eastern Circuit, Mr. Michael Lawson QC, was instructed by the Crown Prosecution Service to appear and resist the defence application that the manslaughter count be struck from the indictment.

However, on 30 September 1999, following legal argument, the resident judge at Lewes Crown Court granted the defence application to have the manslaughter count struck out. In the light of this ruling there was nothing further the Crown could do to pursue the manslaughter allegation.

The trial of the defendants on the two remaining counts, affray and causing actual bodily harm to Michael Abatan (Jay's brother), commenced on 2 May 2000. During the course of the proceedings the defence applied to the judge that there should be no reference or mention of the fact that Jay Abatan had died in the incident. The Crown resisted this on the basis that the jury would raise questions as to why Jay Abatan was not giving evidence. However, the judge ruled that as the fact of his death could prejudice the jury and the fairness of the trial no reference should be made to it at trial. The judge also ruled that some other evidence obtained by the prosecution was inadmissible. On 9 May 2000 the jury returned a verdict of not guilty on both counts against each defendant.

I think this case did contain some unusual features. One of these was the proactive course of action adopted by the Crown Prosecution Service in trying to get the count of manslaughter reinstated. As I have said the manslaughter charge against the second defendant was withdrawn because there was no evidence of a joint enterprise and no evidence that this second defendant had thrown the punch that led to Jay Abatan's death.

Another feature, perhaps less unusual given the rules of evidence that apply in criminal trials, was the decision of the trial judge not to let the jury know that Jay Abatan had died in the course of the alleged affray and assault on his brother, Michael. Counsel for the Crown had argued that the jury should be told of his death because unless they were they would want to know why they were not hearing from Jay. In the event, I understand that the jury did ask to see the hospital notes but as the judge had already ruled that the fact of Jay's death could prejudice the jury and the fairness of the trial they were not told about that aspect of the case.

The group containing the two defendants were all white. The other group were of white, black and other ethnic backgrounds. On the face of the statements available to the prosecution, many of them made on the day of the incident, nothing was said to indicate that Jay Abatan died as the result of a racist attack. Indeed one witness, who is not white, stated to the contrary. "I do not believe that this incident was a racially motivated attack". This did not mean that the Crown Prosecution Service treated the incident any less seriously. At all stages of the inquiry they were alert to the possibility that this was a racist attack but this has simply not been borne out by the evidence.

I understand that the Chief Crown Prosecutor for Sussex will be happy to meet the hon. Member or his constituent to discuss the case in greater detail. As I am sure the hon. Member will appreciate, it would not have been appropriate for the Crown Prosecution Service to discuss the case with a prosecution witness, such as Michael Abatan, when the proceedings were still ongoing since the defence could have claimed that his evidence was tainted as a result.

The police have not closed the file and the appeal for witnesses and further evidence is continuing. An appeal is scheduled to be made on the Crimewatch UK programme this evening.

CABINET OFFICE

Electronic Communications Bill

Ms Rosie Winterton: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what use will be made of the powers in the Electronic Communications Bill to remove statutory barriers to the electronic delivery of Government services. [124031]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Bill contains in clause 8 a power to amend legislation to authorise or facilitate electronic communications or storage. The use of this power will support the Government's target of making all its services available electronically by 2005. Cabinet Office Central IT Unit will maintain on its website a register of all orders made under the Bill and include a report on the use of the powers under the Bill as part of its six-monthly reports towards meeting the Government's targets for electronic service delivery.

In its response (HC 168) to the Trade and Industry Committee's report (HC 862) on the Bill, the Government accepted the recommendation that Departments should publish their priorities for using secondary legislation to update statutory requirements currently expressed in the law by the use of such words as 'writing' or 'signature', and timetables for implementation. Some Departments have not identified any such statutory requirements that require updating. Others may use primary legislation to update them. While some Departments have identified many items of legislation to be updated by the Electronic Communications Bill, departmental priorities for the use of the powers in the Bill, or other powers, for this purpose are given in the table:

Department	Legislation	Comments
Department of Trade and Industry	Companies Act 1985	Will allow: companies to communicate electronically with shareholders (e.g. distributing annual reports); appointment of proxies by electronic means electronic incorporation; electronic filing of certain documents/forms. A consultative document on a draft order to amend the law has already been issued.
Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions	Vehicle Excise and Registration Act 1994, section 22	To allow a statutory off-road declaration to be made electronically. As the process involves signatures, a clause 8 order will not be made until after clause 7 (electronic signatures and related certificates) has come into force.

Minority Group Representation

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what is being done to increase the representation of women, members of ethnic minority groups and disabled people on the boards of public bodies. [124032]

Mr. Stringer: I have today placed in the Libraries of the House "Quangos: Opening Up Public Appointments 2000–03".

This publication details the Government's plan of action together with individual departmental plans for increasing the participation of under-representation groups in public life.

"Quangos: Opening Up Public Appointments 2000–03" is the third in an annual series of reports setting out the Government's commitments to the equal representation of women and men in public appointments, a pro-rata representation of members of ethnic minority groups, and the increased representation of disabled people in public life.

Copies are being sent to all hon. and right hon. Members as well as being made available on the Internet.

Rural Affairs

Mr. Breed: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will list the (a) research and (b) initiatives related to rural issues being undertaken by her Department. [123398]

Marjorie Mowlam: My role as Chair of the Cabinet Committees for rural affairs involves co-ordinating the work of other Departments, but I have no direct responsibility for rural policy. For this reason, it is for DETR, MAFF and others as appropriate to commission research or undertake projects on specific rural issues.

Mr. Breed: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many staff employed by her Department specialise in rural issues; and what percentage this represents of the total number of staff in her Department. [123396]

Marjorie Mowlam: No staff in the Cabinet Office work exclusively on rural affairs. Some staff in the Cabinet Secretariat support me in my role as Chair of the Cabinet Committee on rural affairs, but they have other responsibilities as well. Officials elsewhere, principally in MAFF and DETR, support their Ministers and me on specific rural issues.

Senior Civil Servants (Salaries)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what the average percentage increase in salaries of members of the senior civil service was for 1999–2000; and to what extent the pay awards were staged. [123415]

Mr. Stringer: The average individual award for 1999–2000 was 4.51 per cent. The awards were not staged.

Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many staff from her Department were seconded to private sector companies in (a) May 1997 to April 1998, (b) May 1998 to April 1999 and (c) May 1999 to April 2000; and if she will list in each case the companies to which staff were sent, the names and ranks of the staff involved and the duration of the secondment. [123430]

Mr. Stringer: There was one secondee out of the Cabinet Office between May 1997 to April 1998. The secondment was with Coopers and Lybrand and lasted more than a year.

There were no secondees from the Cabinet Office to the private sector for the period 1 April 1998 to 31 March 2000.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

GE Virus Pesticide

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when and in what form the release of a GE virus at University Farm, Wytham, Oxfordshire (grid ref SP47170884) will take place; and what information he has received regarding the biosafety implications of this type of pesticide. [122513]

Mr. Meacher: Larvae of the Cabbage looper (Trichoplusia ni) infected with an insect-specific genetically modified baculovirus that lacks the ecdysteroid glucosyltransferase (egt) gene (responsible for promoting moulting in insects), will be released into netted enclosures this year at grid reference SP 4717 0884 near Wytham in Oxfordshire.

Baculoviruses are a family of viruses restricted in host range to insects and a number of other arthropods. They are not infectious to man, other vertebrates, plants, non-arthropod invertebrates or other micro-organisms and are routinely used as a naturally occurring insecticide.

The Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment has considered the full risk assessment for the release of this genetically modified baculovirus and advised that the release will pose no risk to human health or the environment. The full application and risk assessment is available on the GMO Deliberate Release Public Register held in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Region's offices at Ashdown House, 123 Victoria Street, London, SW1.

Task Forces

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many task forces have been set up by his Department dealing with transport since May 1997; if he will list the membership of all such task forces with their qualifications and place of residence; and if he will list the dates on which they are expected to report and their terms of reference. [122593]

Mr. Hill: Since May 1997 my Department has set up three task forces dealing specifically with transport issues, the Cleaner Vehicles Task Force, the Shipping Task Force and the Task Force for London Transport. The information requested has been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Air Traffic

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what communication he has received from the Commission on proposals to create a European common aviation area, an aviation safety agency, and amendments to regulation 95/93 concerning airport slot allocation, and proposals for strengthening the powers of Eurocontrol air traffic services; and when each of their numbered programme initiatives are due for consideration at (a) UKREP and (b) the Transport Council. [122680]

Mr. Mullin: The initiatives are due for consideration at (a) UKREP and (b) the Transport Council. The European Commission was granted a mandate in 1996 to negotiate a European Common Aviation Area with 10 Central and Eastern European countries. The negotiation process is now largely completed and the Commission hopes that it will be able to present a final Agreement for signature at a Transport Council later this year.

With regard to communication on the establishment of a European aviation safety authority, I refer my hon. Friend to my answer given on 16 May 2000, Official Report, column 83W. At the Transport Council on 28 March 2000, the Council agreed that further analysis should be undertaken of the best legal form for the EASA, with the aim of taking a decision at its June meeting.

There has been no recent communication on amendments to regulation 95/93 concerning airport slot allocation.

The Commission's Communication entitled "The creation of a single European sky", to which I also referred in my answer of 16 May 2000, did not include proposals for strengthening the legal powers of Eurocontrol air traffic services. Rather it envisaged measures to strengthen the provision of air traffic control services in Europe. To that extent, it is fully in line with the Government's proposals for a Public Private Partnership for NATS, which will enhance aviation safety through securing the investment needed for NATS' modernisation programme and the injection of key management skills to deliver that programme to time and budget.

In June 1998 the Transport Council, under UK Presidency, agreed a mandate for the Commission to negotiate Community accession to Eurocontrol. EC membership of Eurocontrol would not strengthen the legal powers of Eurocontrol but would provide the impetus for both the reform of the Eurocontrol organisation, and to compel States to make collective commitments and to implement decisions on measures to improve the European Air Traffic Management System. The terms of Community accession to Eurocontrol are now effectively agreed, but the Commission cannot bring forward a proposal for the Council to authorise Community signature of the Protocol until the UK and Spain reach agreement on the inclusion of Gibraltar within the territorial scope of the Protocol.

Partnership Investment Programme

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent discussions he has had with the European Commission on gap funding; and if he will make a statement. [122819]

Ms Beverley Hughes: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer of 21 March 2000, Official Report, columns 471–72W. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and the Regions met Commissioner Monti on 2 March to discuss the problems we face in partnership working with the private sector in regeneration, since the Commission's decision that the Partnership Investment Programme breached the state aid rules. These discussions continue at official level.

DVLA

Mr. Darvill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) how many successful claims for compensation for actual financial loss were submitted to the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency as a direct consequence of the Agency's maladministration during (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999; [122827]

(2) how much compensation was paid to claimants by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency arising from claims for actual financial loss incurred as a consequence of the Agency's maladministration in (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999. [122828]

Mr. Hill: The information requested is as follows. It covers ex-gratia payments made by the Agency where customers have incurred actual financial loss as a result of delays or errors:

Year	Number of cases	Amount paid (£)
1997	262	7,663.73
1998	262	8,529.95
1999	367	[1]21,423.73

[1] The amount excludes 143 cases, totalling some £5,521.38 where compensation has been paid for missing identity documents associated with Photocard Licences. DVLA are in negotiation with the Royal Mail to seek reimbursement of some of the costs incurred.

Roads (Greater London)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the mileage of (a) red routes and (b) cycle lanes in the Greater London area. [122906]

Mr. Hill: The length of the red route network is 315 miles. There are at present some 865 miles of cycle lanes in the Greater London area comprising 27 miles on the red route network and 838 miles on the London Cycle Network.

Departmental Properties

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if his Department or the Highways Agency are the registered owners of the property known as No. 3, Upton Lovell, Warminster, Wiltshire; on what date the property was purchased; and for what reasons. [122929]

Mr. Hill: I have asked the Acting Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Peter Nutt, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Nutt to Mr. David Faber, dated 24 May 2000:

The Transport Minister, Keith Hill has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about Landau Cottage, Upton Lovell, Warminster.

The Highways Agency owns this property. It was acquired on 16 November 1990 because the former owners served a blight notice requiring us to purchase it. The notice was accepted because the preferred route of the A36 Codford to Heytesbury Improvement scheme affected the property.

Bus Stop (Bridge Street)

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will call for a report from London Transport on when the stop for southbound buses on the east side of Bridge Street will be reinstated. [123065]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 22 May 2000]: I understand from London Transport that the stop cannot be reinstated until the completion of road and pavement resurfacing work associated with the Portcullis House and Jubilee Line developments. The work is being managed, on behalf of the Parliamentary Works Directorate, by consultants who estimate that it will be completed by the end of September.

Genetically Modified Organisms

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the risks involved in using genes from the cauliflower mosaic virus in the development and application of genetically modified crop varieties. [122999]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment (ACRE) have considered this issue in detail. A full copy of their advice has been placed in the House Library.

ACRE conclude that the cauliflower mosaic virus, when used in the development and application of genetically modified crop varieties, represents an extremely low risk to human health and the environment.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will instruct SCIMAC to revise separation distances between GM and non-GM crops growing experimentally in the United Kingdom following the disclosure of new information on cross-pollination of oil seed rape plants in Canada. [123268]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 23 May 2000]: We are investigating this and will report soon.

HFCs

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the contribution which replacing HFCs in refrigeration and air conditioning with non-global warming alternative technologies could make in helping the UK reach its Kyoto targets. [122855]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 23 May 2000]: The recently published draft climate change programme estimates that emissions of HFCs from refrigeration and air conditioning in 2010 will be the equivalent of around 1.6 million tonnes carbon (0.9 per cent. of total UK emissions).

Our new HFC policy sends a clear signal to industry and users that they should look closely at all the alternatives and select those that are more environmentally acceptable where they do exist. Safety, technical feasibility and cost effectiveness also need to be taken into account before investment decisions are taken. At the same time we recognise that HFCs are necessary to replace ozone-depleting substances in some applications, and that HFC emissions reduction strategies should not undermine commitments to phase out ozone-depleting substances under the Montreal Protocol.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what his policy is with regard to encouraging the use of non-global warming alternatives to HFCs in refrigeration and air conditioning systems which are commercially available. [122857]

Mr. Meacher: The Government policy on the use of alternative refrigerants to HFCs is encompassed in our new longer-term policy on HFCs set out in the recently published draft climate change programme. It states that but recognises that they are necessary to replace ozone-depleting substances in some applications, and that the HFC emission reduction strategies should not undermine commitments to phase out ozone-depleting substances under the Montreal Protocol. HFCs are used in a wide range of applications, and they will continue to be used where they are needed. At the same time our new policy sends a clear signal to industry and users that they should look closely at all the alternatives and to select those that are more environmentally acceptable where they do exist. Safety, technical feasibility and cost effectiveness also need to be taken into account before investment decisions are taken.

HFCs are not a sustainable technology in the long-term

St. John's Wood Station

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will call for a report from London Underground on how long St John's Wood underground station has been without two functioning escalators; what the cost is of the replacement of the two escalators; what additional cost has been incurred as a result of delays in the installation of the second escalator; how many dates have been announced for the completion of the work; for what reason London Underground supplied him with inaccurate information about the completion date for installation of the second escalator; and what action has been taken in respect of the London Underground employees responsible for this situation. [123456]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 23 May 2000]: These are operational matters for London Underground, who have informed me that the escalator replacement project at St. John's Wood station started on 11 September 1998 and involves complete replacement of both machines. During the works, there has been one 'up' escalator and a staircase.

The total cost of the replacement of the two escalators is £4,688 million, including the relevant publicity, policing and standby engineers etc. for the cricket matches. There have been extra costs of £150,000 due to the overrun of the project.

Completion of the second escalator was originally announced for 18 May but has been put back to 21 June 2000. I understand the delay in completion of the project has been due to water entering the mechanism causing a build up of sediment on the steelwork; this meant that repairs had to be made to corroded steelwork and new drainage installed. London Underground's escalator replacement contractors were unable to work on the escalators while this work was taking place (19 January to 17 February 2000).

Dioxin

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent research the Government have commissioned on dioxin levels in the environment. [123489]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 23 May 2000]: The UK Government have sponsored substantial research programmes to assess and monitor the levels of dioxins in the environment. Dioxin levels in air have been monitored as part of the DETR Hazardous Air Pollutants Programme since 1991. Work is under way to measure levels in sewage sludge and a new UK soil survey is due to begin shortly. The Food Standards Agency, and formerly MAFF, regularly monitor dioxin levels in a wide range of foodstuffs which are also useful indicators of environmental concentrations. Results from all monitoring programmes are available on the internet.

Incinerators

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent guidance the Government have given on the disposal of ash produced in incinerators. [123487]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 23 May 2000]: Guidance on technical issues such as this is the responsibility of the Environment Agency.

The disposal of ash from incineration processes is controlled under the Waste Management Licensing Regulations 1994. Guidance on the regulations is contained in DETR circular C11/94 and Waste Management Papers 4 and 4a. Some incinerator ash will be classified as special waste. In these cases guidance is contained in the Environment Agency Guidance Note, "Special Wastes: A Technical Guidance Note on their definition and classification" (The Stationery Office, ISBN 0–11–310158–9).

Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many staff from his Department were seconded to private sector companies in (a) May 1997 to April 1998, (b) May 1998 to April 1999 and (c) May 1999 to April 2000; and if he will list in each case the companies to which staff were sent, the names and ranks of the staff involved and the duration of the secondment. [123426]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Secondments and attachments are part of the Interchange Initiative which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. All sectors of the economy are involved: Voluntary, Education, Health, Public and Private. Interchange is a key component of the reform agenda. The Modernising Government White Paper committed us to increasing interchange, in particular by bringing in more people on secondment and sending more of our people out.

From May 1997 to April 1998

The following numbers of staff were seconded to private sector companies:

One Grade 5 officer to Tarmac Ltd. for a period of one year five months

One Grade 3 officer to SBC Warburg for two years

One Grade 6 (on temporary promotion) to Capita RAS for one year seven months

From May 1998 to April 1999

No new secondees—continuation of the above secondments only

From May 1999 to April 2000

No new secondees to private sector organisations.

Rent Act Order 1999

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has (a) to appeal to the House of Lords in relation to the judgment of the Court of Appeal on the Rent Act Order 1999 and (b) to introduce primary legislation relating to the matters in the Order. [122856]

Mr. Mullin: We are awaiting the outcome of our petition to another place for leave to appeal the Court of Appeal's decision to quash the Rent Acts (Maximum Fair Rent) Order. If leave is granted we will seek an expedited hearing; if it is refused we will urgently consider all the options open to us.

Waste Strategy

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to review the policies in the United Kingdom Management Plan for Exports and Imports of Waste. [124080]

Mr. Meacher: Existing policies on exports and imports of waste are set out in the United Kingdom Management Plan for Exports and Imports of Waste, which came into effect on 1 June 1996. These reflect the long-standing UK commitment to self-sufficiency in waste disposal and the well-established proximity principle, namely that waste should be disposed of in, or as close as possible to, the country of origin.

Since the Plan has been in force, there have been a number of changes at national and international level which have altered the arrangements for transfrontier shipments of waste. My Department will be issuing tomorrow for public consultation a revised draft of the United Kingdom Management Plan for Exports and Imports of Waste, copies of which will be placed in the Libraries of the House.

The main proposals for changes to existing UK policies are:

to permit shipments between Northern Ireland and Ireland for local disposal, provided they are in accordance with waste management plans being drawn up by the Northern Ireland District Councils; to permit exports and imports for trial runs provided that strict criteria are met; and further limited restrictions on imports of waste for disposal.

Furthermore, the Plan reiterates the UK's commitment to the self-sufficiency principle. The UK will allow wastes to be imported for disposal in the UK from developed countries only in extremely limited circumstances. Imports from developing countries are not quite so tightly restricted, but the expectation is still that such countries will as quickly as is feasible put in place the appropriate facilities to dispose of their own waste, as far as is compatible with environmentally sound and efficient management.

This Plan is separate from, but consistent with, the various domestic strategies in the UK, including the England and Wales Waste Strategy which will be launched tomorrow.

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will publish the waste strategy; and if he will make a statement. [124081]

Mr. Meacher: The Government and the National Assembly for Wales will publish "Waste Strategy 2000—a Waste Strategy for England and Wales" tomorrow, and copies will be placed in the Libraries of the House. The strategy has two aims: to reduce the amount of waste we produce; and to get more value from that which we do produce—in particular through a substantial increase in household recycling.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Public Sector Budget

Mr. Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the main provisions for the capital budget for the public sector in Northern Ireland, broken down by (a) sponsoring department and (b) main public service function, included in the total of (i) £570 million allowed in 1998–99 and (ii) £575 million allowed in 1999–2000; and if he will publish information under the same headings for the (A) actual and (B) expected expenditure for the same years. [121454]

Mr. Ingram: The information requested is shown in the tables.

It should however be noted that the capital budgets quoted in the question are indicative figures compiled by Her Majesty's Treasury for the purpose of presenting the outcome of the 1998 UK Comprehensive Spending Review (CSR) in the CSR White Paper, published in July 1998. These do not reflect the actual capital allocations decided upon by my predecessor in the Northern Ireland Comprehensive Spending Review, which did not conclude until the following December. The relevant capital budgets are reflected in the 1999 Northern Ireland Departmental Report (Cm 4217), published in March 1999 and are set out in the format requested.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) between Saturday 12 February and the week ended Saturday 13 May how many violent incidents involving paramilitary groups took place in Northern Ireland, indicating how many involved (a) Loyalists and (b) Republican groups; [122686]

Open Government

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for information he received under the Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information in the last parliamentary session; and how many were granted. [121859]

Mr. Mandelson: I refer my right hon. Friend to the answer given by the Secretary of State for the Home Department on 18 May 2000, Official Report, columns 216–17W.

Police Bill

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to which (a) individuals and (b) political parties he has (i) shown and (ii) given draft copies of the proposed Police Bill for Northern Ireland, indicating what undertakings he has given relating to incorporating (A) the name of the RUC in the name of the new police service and (B) part or all of the present insignia of the RUC or the George Cross in the insignia of the new service. [122799]

Mr. Ingram: The drafting of the Police (Northern Ireland) Bill has required consultation and discussion with a wide range of individuals, bodies and parties, as did the consultation process when Patten was published.

The Government's position on the name and insignia has been made clear. On the name this was done in the Secretary of State's statement to Parliament on 19 January 2000, Official Report, column 848, and in response to an oral question from my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) on 17 May 2000, Official Report, column 319. On the badge, the Secretary of State said in the House on 19 January 2000, Official Report, column 848, that the badge would incorporate the new name in autumn 2001 and on 6 April 2000, Official Report, column 1221, he told the House that he was not convinced the badge need be entirely free of association with both traditions. The published Bill contains enabling provisions on both issues.

WALES

Pig Farming

8. Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent representations he has received on state aid for pig farmers in Wales. [122184]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I have received no representations on state aid for pig farmers, who proportionately play a very minor part in the Welsh livestock industry.

Waiting Lists

9. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has had with the First Secretary on the impact of funding on the change in NHS waiting list times in Wales for those waiting over six months since 1 May 1997. [122185]

Mr. Hanson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I regularly meet the First Secretary and the Assembly Health Secretary to discuss health issues in Wales. Discussions often include funding of the NHS in Wales and the issue of waiting lists/waiting times.

10. Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the First Secretary and the Welsh Health Secretary with regard to the number of people currently waiting over 18 months for an operation. [122186]

Mr. Hanson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I regularly meet the First Secretary and the Assembly Health Secretary to discuss health issues in Wales. Our discussions do, of course, include the subject of waiting lists and times.

19. Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has had with the First Secretary about the number of patients waiting over 18 months for an operation on the NHS. [122195]

Mr. Hanson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I regularly meet and discuss health issues with both the First Secretary and the Assembly Health Secretary. Our discussions often include the subject of waiting times and lists.

A483 Upgrade

11. Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what progress he has made in securing agreement to an upgrading of the A483 north-south Wales road in the mid-Wales and North Shropshire area. [122187]

Mr. Paul Murphy: As the hon. Member is aware, the improvement of Welsh trunk roads is a matter for bilateral discussion between the National Assembly for Wales and the lead Whitehall department in cases such as this where decisions affect communities on the English-Welsh border. I have, however, raised this issue with the First Secretary and written to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions.

Manufacturing Industry

12. Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry about the effect of the value of the pound and the euro on manufacturing industry in Wales. [122188]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I am in frequent contact with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The Government understand the concerns of businesses, and particularly manufacturers, trading within Europe, about the weakness of the euro. But it is determined to take a long-term view. Short-term fixes would be the biggest threat of all to industry, with the illusion of temporary relief followed by the threat of long-term damage.

Policing

13. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he plans to hold with (a) the Home Secretary and (b) the First Secretary on policing in Wales. [122189]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I meet both the Home Secretary and the First Secretary regularly to discuss a range of issues, including policing in Wales.

New Deal for the Over-50s

14. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on implementation of the New Deal for the Over-50s in Wales. [122190]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The New Deal 50-plus pathfinder in north-east Wales has been in operation since October 1999 and was launched by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Wales. The all-Wales roll-out of the New Deal 50-plus was launched on 3 April this year at Merthyr College by the Prime Minister.

Farming

15. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the First Secretary about the state of farming in Wales. [122191]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I meet the First Secretary on a regular weekly basis and we discuss a wide range of issues, including the state of farming in Wales. The Government have clearly shown their commitment to the farming industry by the Action Plan announced at the Prime Minister's Summit on 30 March and the package of aid worth £28 million to Wales.

The National Assembly for Wales meanwhile is taking forward a number of measures to support rural development and diversification in agriculture.

Learning and Skills Bill

16. Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the National Assembly on the impact of the Learning and Skills Bill [Lords] on skill levels in Wales. [122192]

Mr. Hanson: I regularly meet Tom Middlehurst, Assembly Secretary responsible, to discuss a range of issues including the impact of the Learning and Skills Bill, which will establish a new Council for Education and Training for Wales. The CETW will focus education and training more purposefully and effectively to enable young people and adults in Wales to develop the skills they need in the labour market.

Health Funding

17. Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has had with the First Secretary about health funding in Wales. [122193]

Mr. Hanson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I meet regularly to discuss health funding issues with the First Secretary and the Assembly Health Secretary. We have both been interested to hear how the Assembly plans to allocate the additional funding for Wales that was announced in the March budget.

24. Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has had with the First Secretary about health funding in Wales. [122200]

Mr. Hanson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I regularly meet the First Secretary and the Assembly Health Secretary to discuss health issues in Wales. Health funding, of course, forms part of our agenda but it is for the Assembly to decide how health funding is allocated in Wales.

Airbus (A3XX Project)

18. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the First Secretary with regard to the employment implications of the A3XX project coming to Airbus UK in Broughton. [122194]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I meet the First Secretary weekly, and we frequently discuss Broughton. I was pleased to hear that the first orders have been received for the A3XX, and welcome the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence that the United Kingdom will be placing an order for 25 A400M aircraft.

Sterling

20. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the impact of the present level of the pound against the euro on the Welsh economy; and what discussions he has had with the First Secretary. [122196]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I am in regular contact with the First Secretary and we frequently discuss the key issues facing the Welsh economy. The Government understand the concerns of businesses about the weakness of the euro, but is determined to take a long-term view.

Short-term fixes would be the biggest threat of all to industry, with the illusion of temporary relief followed by the treat of long-term damage.

23. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the impact of the value of sterling on Welsh manufacturing employment. [122199]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Government understand the concerns of businesses, and particularly manufacturers trading within Europe, about the weakness of the euro. Nevertheless, recent manufacturing export volumes have been robust across the UK as a whole, growing by 9 per cent. overall and by 6 per cent. to European markets.

Strategic Trunk Roads

21. Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on discussions he has had with the First Secretary about strategic trunk roads. [122197]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Management of the Welsh trunk road network, including improvements to cross-border links with England, are matters which have been devolved to the National Assembly and are for the First Secretary to consider.

I have, however, discussed with the First Secretary the A483 at Pant and Llanymynech, particularly the concerns of the hon. Member about road safety.

New Deal for Young People

22. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the First Secretary on the implementation of the new deal for young people in Wales. [122198]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I meet the First Secretary to discuss Welsh employment issues, and my hon. Friend, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales holds quarterly liaison meetings with the Assembly Secretary for Post-16 Education and Training. The New Deal is a Central Government initiative with programmes delivered mainly through the Employment Service, so my hon. Friend and I are also in regular contact with ministerial colleagues on the subject. I am pleased to note that 27,131 young people in Wales have joined the New Deal programme since it was launched in the West Wales Pathfinder in January 1998, and that there has been a corresponding 61 per cent. fall in the number of 18 to 24-year-olds unemployed and claiming Jobseeker's Allowance for six months or more.

Rail Services

25. Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has had with companies providing rail services in Wales. [122201]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I shall be meeting representatives from the rail industry today to discuss services in Wales. In addition, I discuss rail transport with the First Secretary as part of our weekly meetings, as does my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales, in his quarterly liaison meetings with the Assembly Secretary responsible for transport.

26. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has had with representatives of the rail industry in Wales. [122202]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I shall be meeting representatives from the rail industry to discuss services in Wales. In addition, I discuss rail transport with the First Secretary as part of our weekly meetings, as does my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales, in his quarterly liaison meetings with the Assembly Secretary responsible for transport.

European Structural Funds

27. Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on behalf of the National Assembly for Wales concerning provision in the comprehensive spending review of additional funds to match spending under European Structure Fund programmes; and if he will make a statement. [122203]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I meet the Chancellor regularly and discuss a range of issues.

The importance of the assistance that objective 1 status will deliver to Wales is a key issue which I have discussed with Treasury colleagues. They understand the significance of what this will mean for Wales. That is why the implications for the Welsh Block arising from objective 1 funding are an important feature of the Government's spending review, which is now under way.

Penalty Clauses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the contracts entered into with private sector companies for the provision of goods or services since May 1997 where penalty clauses were triggered for non-performance; and if he will make a statement. [122014]

Mr. Paul Murphy: There is no record of any penalty clause having been triggered for non-performance in either the Wales Office, since 1 July 1999, or the Welsh Office prior to that date.

Soft Drugs

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has had with the First Secretary and the United Kingdom Anti-Drugs Co-ordinator about the prevalence of soft drugs in Wales. [122176]

Mr. Hanson: I meet the Assembly Secretaries on a regular basis to discuss a range of issues including the misuse of drugs in Wales.

The Assembly Secretary for Health and Social Services will be launching the refocused Welsh substance misuse strategy on 25 May 2000. This refocused strategy has been developed in the light of the UK Anti-Drugs strategy launched in April 1998.

Police Funding

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with chief constables about funding of police forces in Wales. [122175]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I met Welsh chief constables on 17 March. We discussed a wide range of issues including developments in modern policing, and manning and funding levels.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Seed Purity

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he plans to introduce to deal with third-party contamination of GM-free seed. [123388]

Mr. Nick Brown: As I made clear to the House in my statement of 18 May 2000, Official Report, column 473–80, the Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment (ACRE) and the Food Standards Agency (FSA) have advised the Government that the possibility that some conventional rapeseed stocks sold to farmers for sowing in 1999 and 2000 may have contained low levels of genetically modified rapeseed presents no risk to human health or the environment. I am placing the advice from ACRE and the FSA in the Library of the House. The Government have also sought the advice of the Advisory Committee on Animal Feedingstuffs (ACAF) and that advice will also be made public when it is received.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions and I have received, and are now considering, legal advice on the complex legal issues raised by this incident including whether any offence has been committed.

My officials are in discussion with the National Farmers Union on the practical and legal implications of the incident for farmers whose crops may have been affected.

My officials have been in contact with the Canadian authorities to obtain more detailed information about the circumstances surrounding this incident. One of my officials is travelling to Canada to follow this up and will report back to me and to the EU Standing Committee on Seeds on 30 May.

I and my officials have been in contact with the Commission and other EU member states affected with a view to taking a common approach to the issues raised by this incident. I have agreed with the French Minister of Agriculture that we should explore urgently the possibility of joint discussions between ourselves, the other member states concerned and the seed company Advanta. I will be following this up when I meet my colleagues at the informal meeting of EU Agriculture Ministers on 29–30 May.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of State announced on 17 May 2000, Official Report, column 173W the new measures the Government are taking to ensure seed purity.

Genetically Modified Seed

Mr. Breed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what was the length of the consultation period prior to the addition of Chardon LL maize to the national seed list; and what considerations he took into account in determining the length of the period; [122778]

(2) what steps his Department took to publicise the consultation on the addition of Chardon LL maize to the national seed list; [122777]

(3) what assessment he has made of the adequacy of (a) the publicity given to the consultation and (b) the length of the consultation period on the addition of genetically modified seed types to the national seed list. [122775]

Ms Quin: The Seeds (National Lists of Varieties) Regulations 1982 (as amended) require Ministers to publish in the Plant Varieties and Seeds Gazette, a notice indicating their proposed decision, and the arrangements and timing (not being less than 14 days) for making written representations or applying to be heard by a person appointed by them. The Gazette was published on 3 April and gave until 21 April—a period of 18 days—for such submissions to be made. This was subsequently extended administratively to 25 April to allow for delays in making submissions because of the Easter break. These arrangements reflected the normal practice for dealing with National List proposed decisions.

Given the wide interest in, and the publicity surrounding, the proposed decision, in addition to publication of the statutory notice in the Plant Varieties and Seeds Gazette, Ministers also issued a press notice announcing their decision. Some 4,000 letters were also sent out to those individuals and organisations who had been corresponding with MAFF about GM National List matters, advising them individually of the proposed decision and the procedures for making written representations or requesting a hearing. Information about the proposed decision, including the tests and trials data on which the decision was based, and the arrangements for making representations and requesting a hearing, were also placed on the MAFF internet website.

EU Agriculture Council

Mr. Casale: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Agriculture Council held in Brussels on 16 to 17 May; and if he will make a statement. [122768]

Mr. Nick Brown: 1. I represented the United Kingdom at the Agriculture Council in Brussels on 16 May.

2. The Council held a brief discussion of the Commission's proposal setting certain CAP prices and amounts for the 2000–01 marketing year, without reaching a conclusion. The Council will consider it further at its June meeting.

3. The Council discussed EU enlargement on the basis of a report from Commissioner Fischler on current preparations of the agriculture chapter. All Ministers stressed the importance they attached to making enlargement a success, recognising the key role of agriculture, including its veterinary, phytosanitary and food safety elements, in ensuring this. I welcomed the Commission's measured and methodical approach aimed at securing the opening of negotiations with the "Luxembourg Six" countries next month. Along with several other Ministers, I emphasised that a successful enlargement would require action not only by the applicant countries in aligning their legislation and administrative capacity with EU requirements, but also by the present EU in further adapting the CAP as provided for in the Agenda 2000 agreement of March 1999.

4. Under Other Business I supported the Swedish Minister's call for a discussion at next month's meeting on evidence gathered by Compassion in World Farming of unsatisfactory implementation of the welfare of animals in transport Directive, an issue I have previously raised myself in correspondence with the responsible Commissioner, David Byrne.

Hounds (Feed)

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will review the controls on the materials that hunts may feed their animals, with particular reference to specified risk material. [123137]

Ms Quin [holding answer 22 May 2000]: Specified risk material (SRM) may not be fed to animals. EU-wide specified risk material controls are currently being considered in the Standing Veterinary Committee of the Commission. Any redefinition of SRM is unlikely to result in an exemption to enable SRM to be fed to hounds.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish the advice his Department offers to hunts on the dead stock that can be fed to packs of hounds. [123168]

Ms Quin [holding answer 22 May 2000]: In Great Britain the rules governing the feeding of animal by-products (which includes dead stock) to packs of hounds are laid down in the Animal By-Products Order 1999. The Order permits only certain categories of material to be fed to recognised packs of hounds in registered premises.

Rural Development Plan

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what details he has received of the rural development plans of other EU member states, with particular reference to their level of funding. [122961]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The European Commission has so far produced only a summary of the Rural Development Plan for Finland, which makes full use of their EU allocation.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the projected increase in expenditure on the England rural development plan takes into account official estimates of inflation over the period involved. [122966]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 22 May 2000]: No. The projected increase in expenditure derives from modulation receipts which will be matched pound for pound, subject to the Spending Review.

Farm Summit

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the individuals who (a) were invited to and (b) attended the Downing street farm summit on 30 March. [122969]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The Prime Minister invited a number of representatives of key stakeholders in the food chain to attend the summit on 30 March. All organisations invited to the farm summit attended. A list of names is provided.

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 22 May 2000]: All 62 points are contained in the "Action Plan for Farming" launched at the Downing street farm summit on 30 March. Copies of the Action Plan have been placed in the House Library.

Apple Growers

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the decision by the French Government to compensate apple growers for the effect of consumer boycotts in Britain. [122993]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 22 May 2000]: I am aware that the French Government are providing aid for the horticulture sector but their Press Releases indicate that it is for restructuring, not compensation for the effects of any consumer boycott of French apples. My officials are seeking further information. There are strict rules governing the granting of state aids by member states. It is the responsibility of the European Commission to assess whether state aids comply with these rules. However if there is evidence that the French are paying an illegal state aid we will raise this with the Commission.

EU Rural Development Policy

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what benefits he has identified from the creation of an integrated European Union rural development policy. [122960]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The Rural Development Regulation enables member states for the first time systematically, coherently and comprehensively to plan expenditure on rural measures which aim to meet environmental, social and economic objectives for the countryside.

CAP

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, in preparing a strategy for further CAP negotiations, he has made specific provision for the possibility that Britain will retain its own currency for the foreseeable future. [122972]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 22 May 2000]: In developing agricultural strategy, no assumptions have been made as to whether or not the UK is likely to join the eurozone, or to remain outside.

Hill Farmers

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his oral statement of 11 May 2000, Official Report, column 1028, if his statement that the England rural development plan would enable support for hill farmers to be continued meant that support for hill farmers would continue at its current level. [122964]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 22 May 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 5 May 2000, Official Report, column 249W.

BSE

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the BSE Inquiry's report will be completed. [123393]

Ms Quin [holding answer 23 May 2000]: The BSE Inquiry requested a six month extension beyond the deadline of 31 March 2000 to complete their task. The Government have agreed this extension. The Report will be published shortly after its receipt by Ministers.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Sure Start

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what has been the annual cost to date of establishing the Sure Start Scheme; and what estimate he has made of the number of Sure Start places in each year since its establishment and in 2000–01. [122531]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 17 May 2000]: The 60 trailblazers cover approximately 50,000 children aged under four in disadvantaged areas. 57 of these programmes have now been approved and most are delivering services. The total spend in the financial year 1999–2000 was £4,877,000.

By March 2002, we intend to establish 250 programmes covering up to 200,000 children, around 8 per cent. of children aged under four at one time, and around 20 per cent. of the age group living in poverty in England. We expect most of these programmes to either start operations or start planning by March 2001.

Post-graduate Certificate in Education Courses

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many physics graduates entered PGCE courses for secondary teaching in each of the last five years. [123036]

Ms Estelle Morris: The number of new entrants to postgraduate initial teacher training (ITT) courses for secondary teaching in Physics is not collected centrally. The numbers of new entrants to postgraduate ITT courses in England for secondary teaching in Science for the last five years are given in the following table.

Intake to postgraduate initial teacher training (ITT) in England

Year	Intake
1995–96	2,530
1996–97	2,564
1997–98	2,438

Universities and other HE Institutions, School Centred ITT and Open University

At 25 September 1999, with Golden Hello incentives, the number of Physics applications for postgraduate ITT was up by 40 per cent. on the previous year. The number of new entrants on postgraduate ITT Science courses in England for 1999–2000 was up by 4 per cent. on the previous year, effectively meeting the overall target for the year. It is too early to predict recruitment to PGCE courses in 2000–01.

The following table, taken from the Higher Education Statistics Agency's Student Record Survey shows the percentage of those commencing PGCE ITT in England, funded by the Teacher Training Agency (TTA), who were graduates in Physics in the years 1995–96 to 1998–99. These are the subjects of first degree and not necessarily the subjects or phase in which the student is undertaking teacher training. Information for the current year is not yet available. There is a significant proportion of students for whom the first degree subject is unknown. The subjects of first degree do not include combined courses, or closely related courses such as engineering.

Percentage of those commencing TTA funded PGCE ITT in England with first degrees in Physics, 1995–96 to 1998–99

Early-years Education

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment who has responsibility for the strategic overview of Government policy for the maintenance of pre-school learning provision. [123104]

Ms Hodge: The Secretary of State has overall responsibility for the Government's early education policy. The statutory duty to secure free early education places for all four-year-olds rests with local education authorities. Together with their Early Years Development and Childcare Partnerships, they have responsibility for planning and monitoring the sufficient supply of high quality early education places in their area.

Skills Task Force

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list (a) the membership and qualifications, (b) the activities and (c) the reports of the Skills Task Force since its inception. [123459]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 23 May 2000]: The 19 members of the National Skills Task Force were appointed by the Secretary of State for Education and Employment to serve in a personal capacity. Their names and positions within their respective organisations are listed. The Department does not hold information on members' qualifications.

The Task Force was remitted by the Secretary of State to assist him in developing a National Skills Agenda. Meeting monthly since its launch in April 1998, the group has considered a range of themes concerned with skill demand and supply, and recorded its conclusions and recommendations in its reports. It has overseen an extensive programme of original research which provides the evidence base for its conclusions. The Task Force has undertaken over 40 formal consultation events, some with a particular sectoral or geographical focus, and has held a series of bilateral meetings with the main agencies involved in education and training.

To date, the Task Force has issued three interim policy reports, covering: a preliminary analysis of skill shortages and gaps, vocational skills for young people, key skills, collection and use of skills and labour market information, upskilling adults and learning in the workplace. Other publications so far are the final report from its IT, Communications and Electronics skills strategy group, a recruitment guide for small businesses, and 19 research papers on various topics. All are available in the Library.

Equal Opportunities Legislation

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the Equal Pay Act 1970 in reducing disparities in pay between males and females in the last five years. [123465]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 23 May 2000]: We welcome the continuing narrowing trend in the gender pay gap, not least the full percentage point reduction from 20 per cent. to 19 per cent. in 1999. It is not possible to determine the precise extent to which the reduction in the last five years can be directly attributed to the Equal Pay Act but it is clear that a sensible statutory framework is an essential component. So too are our wider efforts to ensure improvements in education and skill levels and to help women stay in, or return to, the labour market after having children.

Online Learning

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what studies he has carried out of the problem of measurement assessment and evaluation of learning conducted on-line. [123161]

Mr. Wills: The Department has commissioned the British Educational Communications and Technology agency to evaluate the impact of ICT on children's achievements in school. The project, "ImpaCT2", is focusing on the effect of ICT in attainment in literacy and numeracy and the core subjects of the National Curriculum at Key Stage 2, and a wider subject range at Key Stages 3 and 4. Findings from the interim report will be made available soon. The final report is due to be submitted to the Department in early 2002.

The Qualifications and Curriculum Authority has commissioned research on the use of ICT in coursework and portfolio evidence. A report on this research project is due to be submitted soon.

Correspondence

Mr. Terry Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he will reply to the letters from the hon. Member for Worsley dated 14 September 1999, 4 November 1999 and 4 April 2000, regarding a constituent's inquiry about student grants and higher education fees. [123400]

Mr. Wills: A reply to my hon. Friend's letters was issued on 17 May 2000.

Sixth Forms

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many secondary schools have sixth forms with (a) 0 to 50, (b) 51 to 100, (c) 101 to 150, (d) 151 to 200 and (e) 201 to 250 pupils. [123502]

Ms Estelle Morris: The latest provisional national estimates for England are shown in the table. For January 2000, provisional figures show that there were 3,550 maintained secondary schools in England, of which 1,834 (or 52 per cent.) had a sixth form.

Number of maintained secondary schools by size of sixth form in England, January 2000 [1]

Size of sixth form	Number of schools
Up to 50	115
51 to 100	319
101 to 150	409
151 to 200	398
201 to 250	295
251 and over	298
Total	1,834

Final figures will be published in the Annual Statistical Volume "Statistics of Education: Schools in England (2000 edition)" in September.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

EU Culture Council

Mr. Casale: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what was the outcome of the Culture Council held in Brussels on 16 May; and if he will make a statement. [122767]

Mr. Alan Howarth: I represented the United Kingdom at the EU Culture Council on 16 May. The Council held a useful exchange of views on the objectives and proposed approach to the MEDIA PLUS programme, the aim of which will be to strengthen the competitiveness of the European audiovisual industry. The Council and the member states adopted Conclusions on principles and guidelines for the Community's audiovisual policy in the digital age. The Council also adopted a Resolution on the conservation and enhancement of the European cinema heritage.

The Portuguese Presidency presented a report on cultural diversity in the new international environment and on a recent seminar on digital radio, as well as Presidency conclusions on the value of cultural statistics. The French and Portuguese delegations informed the Council of their nominees to serve on the selection panel for the European Capital of Culture 2005.

In the margins of the meeting I had useful discussions with the new French Minister of Culture, in advance of the forthcoming French Presidency of the EU, and with Commissioner Reding.

Antiques (Illicit Trade)

Mr. Pond: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what arrangements he is making to ensure that the Government are able to draw on expert advice in considering options for countering the illicit trade in antiquities. [123930]

Mr. Alan Howarth: I am convening a panel of experts, drawn from the legal, archaeological and museum worlds, and from the art and antiques trade, whose terms of reference will be:

To consider the nature and extent of the illicit international trade in art and antiquities, and the extent to which the UK is involved in this;

To consider how most effectively, through both non-legislative and legislative means, the UK can play its part in preventing and prohibiting the illicit trade, and to advise the Government accordingly.

To report to the Minister for the Arts by 30 November 2000.

I am most grateful to the following experts who have agreed to be members of the advisory panel:

Professor Norman Palmer: Professor of Commercial Law, University College, London (chairman).

Dr. Peter Addyman: Chairman of the Standing Conference on Portable Antiquities; Director of the York Archaeological Trust.

Dr. Robert Anderson; Director of the British Museum.

Anthony Browne: Chairman of the British Art Market Federation.

James Ede: Chairman designate of the Antiquities Dealers' Association; Director of Charles Ede Ltd., antiquities dealers.

Joanna van der Lande: former Chair of the Antiquities Dealers' Association; associate director of Bonhams Ltd., and head of the antiquities department.

Professor Lord Renfrew of Kaimsthorn: Director of the McDonald Institute for Archaeological Research, University of Cambridge.

Anna Somers Cocks: Editor, The Art Newspaper.

The panel will be supported by a working group of officials drawn from all those departments which share responsibility for measures to combat illicit trade.

English Heritage

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the occasions in each of the last five years on which English Heritage gave grants to (a) members of the board of English Heritage and (b) organisations with which board members had connections. [122635]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Since 1996–97 this information has been made available each year in English Heritage's Annual Report. The information requested for years prior to 1996–97 is not readily collatable in the timescale required.

Occasions in each of the last four years on which English Heritage gave grants to its Commissioners or organisations with which Commissioners had connections is as follows:

1996–97

conservation grant of £25,000 in respect of a Grade II listed building owned by Lady Gass conservation grant of £7,000 in respect of an estate in which Lord Cavendish of Furness had an interest conservation grant of £15,000 in respect of an estate in which Lord Cavendish of Furness had an interest conservation grant of £24,000 in respect of an estate of which the right hon. Lord Faringdon is a Trustee and his son a beneficiary conservation grant of £8,000 to a Trust of which Philip Davis is a Trustee.

1997–98

1998–99

DEFENCE

Naval Vessels

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he plans to withdraw HMS Fearless and HMS Intrepid from service. [121700]

Mr. Spellar: On current plans, HMS Fearless and HMS Intrepid are due to be withdrawn from service in 2003 and 2001, respectively. However, these dates are linked to the acceptance of the replacement vessels, the Landing Platform Dock (Replacement)s (LPD(R)s), named HMS Albion and HMS Bulwark. In the light of delays to the LPD(R)s, the dates for withdrawal for Fearless and Intrepid are under review.

Correspondence

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East of 21 April requesting a meeting. [122572]

Dr. Moonie: My noble Friend the Minister for Defence Procurement, Baroness Symons, wrote on 20 May, and has offered to meet the hon. Member.

Websites

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 3 May 2000, Official Report, column 117W, on websites, if he will list the major service events which satisfy all the conditions (a) for which a related website exists, (b) which were sponsored by one or more companies and (c) on whose website the sponsoring company receives publicity, either by having its logo on the site, or otherwise; and if he will in each case (i) list the sponsoring companies, (ii) estimate the market value of such publicity on the website and (iii) state if this estimate was taken into account in negotiating the sponsorship deal. [122743]

Dr. Moonie: My Department's principal websites—those of the central MOD and the three Services—are not sponsored by commercial companies. Where a major Service event has had external sponsorship and a related web page exists on a Ministry of Defence or Service website, the sponsor company's logo has on occasion been featured on that web page as an acknowledgment. In a few cases logos have been hyperlinked to the company's own website. The market value of the logo placements is assessed as negligible in comparison with the value of the overall sponsorship for the separate events, and taking into consideration the estimated number of visitors to the relevant pages and current market rates for website advertising on pages of this type.

The following table summarises the logo placements for sponsored major Service events on the Department's major websites. Detailed information on the other departmental websites maintained by individual Defence Agencies and units and on other sites maintained by non-departmental public bodies is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Major Service event	Sponsor of event	Website(s) on which sponsor logo(s) featured
Army v Navy Rugby match	Willis Caroon	Royal Navy—www.royal-navy.mod.uk Army—www.army.mod.uk
Royal Artillery display team	Main sponsors Kawasaki Motors(UK) Wurth UK	Army—www.army.mod.uk
Royal Military Tattoo	Amey plc BAe Systems Daily Telegraph NAAFI/Warrior THUS/Demon Internet	Royal Military Tatoo 2000—www.rmt2000.mod.uk
Service Offshore Regatta	EDS	Royal Navy—www.royal-navy.mod.uk

In addition, the Army has participated in the national Rugby League Silk Cut Challenge Cup. The company name appears in the competition's logo which features on the relevant section of the main Army website—www.army.mod.uk/sport/events.

Of those events listed, only the RMT 2000 website features active hyperlinks from a sponsor company's logo to the company's own website.

ABSV

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the requirement of armoured battlegroup support vehicles will be for transportation by air; what aircraft he plans for transportation of the ABSV; and if he will make a statement. [122977]

Dr. Moonie: The full requirements for the Armoured Battle Group Support Vehicle (ABSV) have not been finalised. However, it is likely that the requirements will include comparable deployability to that of the Warrior Infantry Fighting Vehicle. This equates to its being air-portable by both C-17 and A-400M.

Production Bases Abroad

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his policy is on giving assistance to British companies seeking to locate production bases outside the UK. [122976]

Dr. Moonie: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has the lead responsibility for providing advice and assistance to British companies seeking to locate production bases outside the UK. Such assistance is provided through the British Trade International organisation, run jointly by the Department of Trade and Industry and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

UK civil firms that have decided to invest abroad can obtain assistance by using the "Offset-Investment Brokering Scheme" which is run jointly by British Trade International and the Defence Export Services Organisation. This service connects Defence firms which possess indirect offset commitments, with investors, for their mutual benefit.

Where a UK defence equipment manufacturer is successful in winning export business which requires, under industrial participation arrangements, the establishment of local production facilities, the Defence Export Services Organisation will provide additional support and guidance if required.

Procurement (Fraud)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate his Department has made of the yearly cost to its budget of fraud in relation to procurement contracts. [122756]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 19 May 2000]: The Department regards the whole of its procurement budget as being at risk from fraud. The cost of detected fraud is, however, difficult to quantify. The process followed is to assume, once an investigation of a potential fraud begins, that the whole contract value is at risk. Values are then revised as the case progresses to completion. On this basis, the Department's estimates of the value of procurement fraud over the last five years are as follows:

1995–96	2,700
1996–97	No value
1997–98	1,000
1998–99	14,343
1999–2000	[1]1,796,326

[1] Includes one case estimated at £916,000, one estimated at £500,000 and one estimated at £260,000

Note:
The three cases recorded against 1999–2000 are at an early stage of investigation

Opinion Research

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much his Department spent on opinion research in the financial year 1999–2000. [123246]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 22 May 2000]: Expenditure on external opinion research carried out in 1999–2000 was £600,272. Some small local studies may not be included as details are not held centrally.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list opinion research projects undertaken on behalf of his Department in the financial year 1999–2000, itemising (a) focus group research, (b) quantative surveys, and (c) other market research surveys, in each case stating when and where the results were published. [123232]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The following table gives information on external opinion research in 1999–2000. Research is carried out to explore public attitudes to Defence and the Armed Forces and the findings are used to assist planning on issues like recruitment to the Armed Forces. Research results are available in accordance with the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Prisoners of War

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will make an announcement on the question of a gratuity for former far east prisoners of war. [123529]

Dr. Moonie: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 3 May 2000, Official Report, column 143, to the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Bell). This matter is still being carefully considered in consultation with colleagues and no conclusions have yet been reached.

Families Associations Representatives

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his letter D/Min(AF)/JS PQ2803J/99 of 18 December 1999, if he will list the (a) names, (b) date of commencement in position, (c) formal employer and line manager, (d) responsibilities of and (e) salary of the Families Association representatives based at (i) HMNB Portsmouth, (ii) HMNB Devonport, (iii) Faslane/Clyde, (iv) HMS Collingwood, (v) HMS Raleigh, (vi) BRNC Dartmouth, (vii) RMTC Lympstone, (viii) HMS Excellent and (ix) RNAS Culdrose; and if he will make a statement. [123243]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 23 May 2000]: The tables attached with my letter D/Min(AF)/JSPQ2803J/99/P provided data received from the relevant Establishments and Units about welfare and other facilities for which provision was made at the units concerned. I understand, however, that In relation to the list of Families Association Representatives, although the Association of Royal Naval and Royal Marine Families very much hopes in due course to establish local representatives in the bases listed, it has not yet done so. That is because the Association only came into being last year and has only just recruited its first local representative, who is based in Helston, Cornwall. The Association is an independent body, although it does receive some financial assistance from my Department and provision of some accommodation and facilities. The recruitment of local representatives, management arrangements and responsibilities are all matters for the Association.

Sunday Times (Injunction)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he was consulted about the issue of an injunction against The Sunday Times and others preventing publication of information obtained from the person known as Martin Ingram. [122759]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 23 May 2000]: My right hon. and noble Friend the previous Secretary of State for Defence was first consulted about this matter on 11 August 1999. The current Secretary of State was consulted on 24 November.

Service Personnel (Divorce)

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the divorce rates for serving military personnel in (a) the Army, (b) the Royal Navy and (c) the Royal Air Force for the last 12 month period for which figures are available. [120408]

Mr. Spellar [pursuant to his reply, 8 May 2000, c. 263–64W]: I have to advise that due to an administrative error the figure for married strength for the Royal Air Force at 1 April (1998–99) was incorrectly given as 22,417—this was, however, correctly given as the figure for the Royal Navy. The correct figure for the Royal Air Force should have read 34,808.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles operated by his Department were manufactured (i) in the UK, (ii) in the EU and (iii) elsewhere. [122260]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 17 May 2000]: The position at 1 April 2000 was as follows:

	Cars	Commercial	Total
UK	179	361	540
EU	317	79	396
Elsewhere	118	42	160
Total	614	482	1,096

Regional Airports

Mr. Plaskitt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he proposes to begin the consultation on proposed changes to planning regulations in relation to small regional airports. [122784]

Mr. Mullin: The Department has no plans to change planning regulations for small regional airports. If my hon. Friend wishes to write to me with more details of his concerns in this area, I will provide a substantive reply.

Local Authority Housing

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the funds required to clear the current backlog of repairs to and modernisation programmes of local authority housing stock; and how much this figure represents per dwelling. [123013]

Mr. Mullin: We estimate, on the basis of sample data collected in the 1996 English House Condition Survey, that the backlog of renovation work on the council housing stock amounts to around £10 billion with a further £9 billion being required for improvement/modernisation work. This equates to an average of between £5,500 and £6,000 a dwelling. The renovation backlog will have been tackled in around a quarter of a million homes by March 2002 as a result of the extra resources we have made available for housing investment.

Joannou and Paraskevaides Group

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations his Department has received from the Joannou and Paraskevaides Construction Group in the last three years. [123139]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The Department is not aware of any representations received from the Joannou and Paraskevaides Construction Group in the last three years.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what construction contracts his Department has awarded to the Joannou and Paraskevaides Group in the last three years. [123143]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 22 May 2000]: None.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what planning appeals his Department has received involving the Joannou and Paraskevaides Construction Group in the last three years. [123141]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 22 May 2000]: I am not aware of any planning appeals received from the Joannou and Paraskevaides Construction Group in the last three years.

Methyl Tertiary Butyl Ether

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what studies he has carried out to ascertain the possible contamination by methyl tertiary butyl ether from the discharge of unburned fuel from water craft on inland waters in England and Wales. [123444]

Mr. Mullin: I am not aware of any studies currently under way on this issue. Although the Environment Agency considers that the main risk from MTBE is to groundwater and has commissioned research on this, it has also carried out limited monitoring for MTBE in surface waters. Many water craft are powered by diesel fuel which does not contain MTBE.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the (a) terms of reference of and (b) people carrying out, the study on the incidence of methyl tertiary butyl ether in groundwater in England and Wales; and when he expects the study to be completed. [123442]

Mr. Mullin: The Environment Agency has commissioned a study to investigate known fuel oxygenate occurrence in groundwater in England and Wales, gathering evidence from (a) Environment Agency regional and area records (b) water companies, and (c) additional bodies and sources of information; to review and evaluate the presence and behaviour of oxygenates in groundwater; to inform the EA's strategic regulatory thinking, the risk assessment process and monitoring strategy, and to recommend any future research directions. The study, which is being carried out by the environmental consultancy firm Komex Clarke Bond, is expected to be available in the summer.

Fire Safety

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 12 May 2000, Official Report, column 485W, on housing, what plans he has to include guidance to local authorities and fire authorities on the standard of fire safety provision for houses in multiple occupation, in the guidance documents that accompany the draft legislation; and whether that guidance will include reference to the installation of residential automatic fire sprinkler systems. [123532]

Mr. Mullin: As we indicated in the Housing Green Paper we are developing a housing health and safety rating system to replace the existing housing fitness standard. Within this we envisage risk-based guidance on fire safety precautions for certain high risk houses in multiple occupation. The guidance will include advice on when residential sprinklers might be appropriate.

Waste Disposal

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list in order of the quantity of waste dealt with the main waste disposal facilities in the east of England. [123383]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 23 May 2000]: The list of main waste disposal facilities in the east of England, in order of quantity of waste dealt with, is given in the table. For the purpose of this response, a main waste disposal facility is taken to mean their taking in excess of 90,000 tonnes of waste per year. The figures relate to 1998–99 (or the nearest available year).

Housing Associations

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the mechanisms for ensuring the accountability of housing associations for their decisions; and if he will make a statement. [123771]

Mr. Mullin: Housing associations (now known as registered social landlords) are regulated by the Housing Corporation, an Executive NDPB of my Department, through published performance standards covering governance, finance, lettings, tenant involvement, development and management. Registered social landlords are expected to meet these standards. Where they do not, the Housing Corporation has regulatory powers to enforce compliance.

In the course of this year, the Housing Corporation is reviewing governance arrangements in the registered social landlord sector. It will be issuing revised performance standards, following consultation, in April 2001.

My Department has also contributed to the work of the Committee on Standards in Public Life in producing its reports on Local Public Spending Bodies.

Leasehold Reform

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he plans to publish the White Paper on leasehold reform; and if it will contain the draft Bill. [123660]

Mr. Mullin: As was announced in the Gracious Speech given on 17 November 1999, Official Report, columns 4–7, we intend to publish a draft Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Bill for consultation during this session.

Incineration

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which sites in the UK are under consideration for building new incinerators. [123713]

Ms Beverley Hughes: My Department does not keep a central record of sites under consideration for new incinerators. However, it is the responsibility of individual local planning authorities to consider planning applications for incinerators and they will keep their own records.

Timber

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the Government's procurement policy will include a commitment to buying timber and timber products from certified legal and sustainable sources. [123165]

Mr. Mullin: The Government's model policy statement for greening Government operations includes a commitment to purchase sustainably produced timber and timber products by, for example, requiring suppliers to provide documentary evidence that the timber has been lawfully obtained from forests and plantations which are managed to sustain their biodiversity, productivity and vitality, and to prevent harm to other ecosystems and any indigenous or forest-dependent people.

Rural Services (SSAs)

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will increase the level of Standard Spending Assessments of local authorities in respect of costs specific to provision of services in rural areas. [123915]

Ms Armstrong: Standard Spending Assessments already include elements that recognise that there are additional costs in providing services in rural areas. In the White Paper, "Modern Local Government—In Touch With The People", we said that we did not expect to make fresh changes to the method of calculation of Standard Spending Assessment while we conduct a review of the system of grant distribution.

Statistics

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what statistics relating to the responsibilities of his Department are collated by parliamentary constituency, indicating the dates covered in each case. [123843]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Department's statistics are not compiled routinely by parliamentary constituency.

Abnormal Loads

Mr. St. Aubyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what plans he has to commission a third party to undertake independent verification of the abnormal indivisible loads notification system, with particular reference to evaluating the robustness of the software to analyse the strength of bridge structures; [123022]

(2) what dates for (a) internal and (b) external implementation for the abnormal indivisible loads notification system were specified when the system was put out to tender; and what is his latest estimate of each of the dates; [123023]

(3) on what date software was due for final delivery under Highways Agency tender no. 3–276 (Abnormal Indivisible Loads Notification System Trial); and if the software was delivered by that date. [123024]

Mr. Hill: I have asked the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Peter Nutt to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Nutt to Mr. Nick St. Aubyn, dated 25 May 2000:

I refer to the recent questions you asked The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions regarding progress of the Abnormal Indivisible Loads Notification System which is being developed for the Highways Agency under tender number 3/276. The Secretary of State has asked me to provide you with a detailed reply since it concerns an operational matter for the Highways Agency.

The contractor (W. S. Atkins) has yet to appoint the independent checker to evaluate the structural software associated with the system. However this remains a contractual requirement and will be undertaken prior to the completion of the trial. This element of the system is subject to the Highways Agency's Technical Approval procedures. Consequently, the appointment of the independent checker will be subject to the agreement of the Highways Agency as the Technical Approval Authority.

It was envisaged that the internal trial of the Abnormal Indivisible Loads computer system would be carried out (in Highways Agency Maintenance Area 2) following a six month development period, and once the system had been checked and validated to the satisfaction of the Highways Agency's Designated Officer. The contract was awarded on 11 October 1999 and is scheduled to run for a period of twelve months. However, amendments to the contract programme agreed by the Highways Agency have resulted in the validation testing being delayed from 10 April 2000 until 10 July 2000 with a start revised date for the internal trial of the 1 August 2000. Final delivery of software was originally due 12 months after contract award, following the development and trial phases. It is now programmed for 11 January 2001.

A programme for external application (in other Highways Agency Maintenance Areas) of the automated abnormal load system has yet to be finalised. This will depend on the outcome of the trial and agreement between other interests responsible for dealing with abnormal loads including DETR, local highway authorities and other bridge owners.

I hope this provides you with the information you require. However, should you wish to discuss the project further, our Designated Officer for the contract, Martin Lynch, would be pleased to hear from you. He can be contacted on Tel: 0117 987 8560.

Hydrofluorocarbons

Mr. St. Aubyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) which (a) countries and (b) sections of the European Commission his Department consulted before announcing the change in its hydrofluorocarbons policy, referred to in DETR Climate Change Programme-HFC Policy Change; [123025]

(2) which countries have indicated their agreement with the change in his policy on hydrofluorocarbons, announced in DETR Climate Change Programme-HFC Policy Change; and which countries have recently announced similar changes in policy; [123026]

(3) which (a) engineering bodies, (b) industry bodies and (c) manufacturers in the United Kingdom air conditioning and refrigeration industry his Department consulted before announcing the change in its hydrofluorocarbons policy, referred to in DETR Climate Change Programme-HFC Policy Change. [123027]

Mr. Meacher: My Department did not hold any formal consultation before the Government's new HFC policy was announced in the draft climate change programme, which was published for consultation on 9 March 2000. However, officials have been involved in meetings that have taken place at international and European level between technical experts, industry representatives, officials from other countries and officials from the environment and enterprise sections of the European Commission on the use and projected trends in emissions of hydrofluorocarbons.

In addition my Department commissioned a report in 1998 from March Consulting Group to provide updated annual UK emissions data for HFCs, PFCs and SF, in each user sector. This also covered projects to 2020 and assessed the costs and benefits of options to reduce future emissions. In compiling their report, March Consulting Group consulted many companies within the UK air conditioning and refrigeration industry, and industry was given the opportunity to comment on the report.

My Department has not formally consulted other countries about the new HFC policy. However, several countries such as France, Italy, Germany and Finland indicated initial broad support at official level. Other countries will be considering their policies on HFCs as part of their development of programmes to deliver their Kyoto targets, but few have yet made clear statements on their position. The Danish Government have recently announced their new HFC policy, which would ban the use of HFCs in many applications.

Laptops

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many laptop computers used by Ministers, officials and special advisers in his Department have been (a) lost and (b) stolen since May 1997. [123735]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Since May 1997 seven laptop computers have been stolen and one has been lost in transit.

London Bodies (Transfers)

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about the programme for transferring existing organisations or parts of organisations to the Greater London Authority, London Transport Users' Committee, Transport for London and the London Development Agency. [124187]

Mr. Hill: The transfers of existing bodies takes place on four main dates. As I announced in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) on 1 April 2000, Official Report, columns 420–21W, the London Ecology Committee, London Planning Advisory Committee and London Research Centre were abolished, and their staff, assets and liabilities were temporarily transferred to the Secretary of State.

On 8 May these staff, assets and liabilities (other than those relating to a small number of London Research Centre staff who will transfer later to Transport for London) transferred to the Greater London Authority (GLA), along with a small number of planning staff from the Government Office for London, and the GLA Transition Team and staff newly recruited for the GLA.

Transfers to Transport for London (TfL) and the London Development Agency (LDA), and to the London Transport Users Committee (LTUC), will take place on 3 July. On that date the following will transfer to TfL:

London Regional Transport, excluding London Underground Ltd. and some residual parts of LRT;

the Traffic Control Systems Unit;

the staff, assets and liabilities of the Traffic Director for London;

the Docklands Light Railway;

the part of the Highways Agency dealing with London roads; certain roads from London boroughs and the City of London;

certain roads in Docklands from the Commission for the New Towns;

the Public Carriage Office;

a small number of staff from the Government Office for London, and from the centre of the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions.

On the same date the following will transfer to the LDA:

the London region staff of English Partnerships, and associated assets and liabilities; some staff from the Government Office for London, together with staff newly recruited for the LDA.

On the same date the staff, assets and liabilities of the London Regional Passengers Committee will transfer to LTUC, which will report to the Assembly of the GLA.

Most of the above transfers will be achieved through transfer schemes prepared under powers in section 409 of the GLA Act. In preparing their transfer schemes, predecessor bodies are identifying which of their property, rights and liabilities, such as buildings, contracts, staff or other assets, will transfer to the GLA's functional bodies and which will remain with the predecessor body itself or be transferred elsewhere. Among other things, they will need to consider whether existing contracts can transfer in their existing form or whether changes will be needed to meet the needs of the functional bodies.

In addition, those predecessor bodies, such as the Highways Agency, which are designated as Public Records bodies under the Public Records Act 1958 will need to review those records which are intended to transfer to the functional bodies to see whether particular records are worthy of preservation in the national archive. Predecessor bodies will also need to identify whether all of their existing records are appropriate for transfer to the functional bodies, on the basis that all relevant records should transfer, unless they identify any papers, such as advice to Ministers of the present and previous administrations, which would be inappropriate for transfer. We expect that each predecessor body will identify very few, if any, papers which are unsuitable for transfer. In conducting this exercise they will need to ensure that they take full account of existing and proposed freedom of information legislation and the openness regime under which the GLA and functional bodies will operate.

Budgets for the GLA, TfL and LDA are as set out on 17 February 2000, Official Report, column 637W.

To permit the GlA, TfL and LDA to start functioning immediately on their respective start dates, orders to facilitate the transition have been made under powers in sections 405 and 406 of the GLA Act. These enable the new organisations to make arrangements for their financial operations and, where necessary, to prepare standing orders for their initial meetings. In addition temporary appointments of certain statutory office holders in the GLA, TfL and LDA have been made by the Secretary of State using powers in section 407 of the GLA Act.

To remove any doubts about the application of the Transfer of Undertaking (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 to transfers of staff to the new organisations, an order has been made applying the 1981 Regulations to all transfers of staff by means of transfer schemes or orders under the GLA Act powers. A further order added the new organisations to the list of bodies eligible to be members of the Local Government Pension Scheme.

Oceans

Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what outcome he expects from the forthcoming UN Informal Consultative Process on the Oceans to be held in New York on 30 May to 2 June. [124190]

Mr. Prescott: The establishment of a UN Informal Consultative Process is a new and promising development. For a long time, I have been calling for a single global focus for integrating action on the oceans. At the 1999 meeting of the Commission on Sustainable Development, I particularly highlighted the need for better preparation of the annual UN General Assembly debate on Oceans and the Law of the Sea and better implementation by all states of the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea and Chapter 17, Oceans and All Seas, of Agenda 21. I believe that the new Informal Consultative Process will address both these points.

The UK has played a leading role in getting the new Process established and we are looking forward to participating in a productive meeting. Although all aspects of the oceans and seas are closely interrelated and need to be considered as a whole, discussion should focus on one or two main areas, to get agreement on the progress to be made. In this inaugural meeting, the issues of tackling illegal, unregulated and unreported fisheries and the economic and social implications of marine pollution have emerged as issues of particular concern. These are important issues and we want to ensure that the new process makes a real difference to progress in tackling them. In particular, there needs to be early entry into force of the UN fish stock agreement and full implementation of that agreement, the FAO Code of Conduct for Responsible Fisheries, and the Global Programme of Action against land-based marine pollution. The new Process should promote concerted action for this purpose by all the different international bodies involved.

Standard Spending Assessments

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the age-related demographic factors used in setting SSAs. [123296]

Ms Beverley Hughes: A wide range of indicators is used in working out Standard Spending Assessments. The following age-related demographic factors were used in calculations for the 2000–01 settlement:

PRIME MINISTER

Honours (Removal)

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Prime Minister on how many occasions honours have been removed from those who received them, and for what reasons, in the last ten years. [122904]

The Prime Minister: In the last ten years, there have been 13 cases of forfeiture of honours for which the Prime Minister is responsible. The reasons leading to these forfeitures are:

(i) corruption (mis-use of their position): five cases;

(ii) company fraud: three cases;

(iii) sexual offences against children: three cases; and

(iv) theft: two cases.

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Prime Minister if a conviction for perjury constitutes grounds for recommending the removal of a life peerage. [122905]

The Prime Minister: This would require legislation to be passed by both Houses of Parliament. Once a Peer has been created, neither the Sovereign, the Prime Minister nor the House of Lords alone can cause his or her title to be forfeited.

Debt Relief

Mr. Reed: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he had with the Japanese Prime Minister about debt relief at their recent meeting. [123105]

The Prime Minister: Prime Minister Mori and I met on 3 May. We covered issues in preparation for the G8 Summit in Okinawa in July, and agreed on the importance of discussing debt issues at the Summit. We are both concerned to see that the debt relief measures agreed at the Cologne Summit last year are implemented.

Rural Economies

Mr. Breed: To ask the Prime Minister if he will place the responses received by his Department to the Performance and Innovation Unit's report, "Rural Economies", in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [123397]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 24 May 2000]: The Performance and Innovation Unit's report, "Rural Economies", asked for comments on the report to be sent to the Rural White Paper Team at the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions by 11 February 2000. Copies of the responses received will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses in due course (except for those which respondents request remain confidential).

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Ethiopia

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he and the Ministers in his Department last had a meeting with the Ethiopian Ambassador to the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [123528]

Mr. Hain: I last met the Ethiopian Ambassador when he accompanied the Ethiopian Foreign Minister, Atto Seyoum Mesfin, who called on me on 9 December 1999. I saw him again on 23 May when I strongly criticised Ethiopia's renewal of fighting against Eritrea.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Anthony D. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has received the report from the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs on the prospects for free and fair elections in Zimbabwe; and if he will make a statement. [124185]

Mr. Hain: I understand that a distinguished, international delegation organised by the National Democratic Institute visited Zimbabwe from 15 to 22 May. After over 30 meetings with representatives of government, political parties and civil society the delegation called for "heightened observation" of the elections by the international community. Their findings reflect an atmosphere of anxiety and fear, a news bias in favour of the ruling party, and that the Registrar General has so far failed to establish an open and transparent electoral process. We hope that the delegation's observations are closely heeded in Zimbabwe.

Burma

Mr. Anthony D. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what changes have been made to EU sanctions in place against Burma. [124186]

Mr. Vaz: On 26 April the Council of the European Union adopted a Common Position (2000/346/CFSP) which enhanced EU sanctions against Burma by strengthening the existing visa ban, imposing a freeze on the funds of those individuals subject to the visa ban and imposing a ban on the supply of equipment which might be used for internal repression or terrorism.

Following from this Common Position, the Council adopted Regulation 1081/2000 on 22 May. The Regulation prohibits the sale, supply, export or shipment of goods listed in an Annexe to the Regulation, directly or indirectly, whether or not originating in the Community, to any person or body in Burma or to any person or body for the purpose of any business carried on in, or operated from, the territory of Burma.

The Regulation also provides that all funds belonging to individual listed in an annexe to the Regulation shall be frozen and that no funds shall be made available, directly or indirectly, to or for the benefit of those persons.

The Regulation applies within the territory of the Community including its air space and on board any aircraft or any vessel under the jurisdiction of a member state and, to any person elsewhere who is a national of a member state and any body which is incorporated or constituted under the law of a member state.

The Regulation entered into force on 24 May and is directly applicable in the UK. Legislation to provide for enforcement, including penalties, will shortly be in effect.

Laptops

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many laptop computers used by Ministers, officials and special advisers in his Department have been (a) lost and (b) stolen since May 1997. [123736]

Mr. Battle: There are three instances of FCO laptops going missing. In two cases, overseas, these are recorded as losses. But every loss may, in fact, be a theft. The third instance was theft, again overseas.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Sporting Opportunities

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what action the Government are taking to increase the level of sporting opportunity in areas of high deprivation and social exclusion. [123524]

Kate Hoey: Our recently published sports strategy—A Sporting Future for All—and the report of Policy Action Team 10, recognise the unique contribution which sport can make to tackling social exclusion. As a result, we will be working with other agencies to develop creative and innovative ways of using sport to re-engage people and equip them with the skills and confidence to re-join the main stream of society. We have also asked all funding bodies in sport to ensure that the promotion of social inclusion is a key part of all their work, and have called for a concerted effort to recruit, train and support more women, people with disabilities and people from ethnic minority groups as coaches, officials and sports administrators. All agencies receiving public funding will be required to demonstrate that they have adopted pro-active solutions to any inequities which exist.

Sport England's Lottery Strategy, which was published in May last year, sets out its commitment to target funding at social inclusion and deprived areas. This means that at least two-thirds of its Lottery funds are invested in community facilities or activities, of which at least 50 per cent. will go to areas of greatest need; young people, recreationally deprived groups and people with disabilities are a priority; and equality of access for all. Specific programmes include the Priority Areas Initiative which targets deprived areas and allows a higher rate of funding and Sport Action Zones, the first 12 of which were announced in January, which aim to provide comprehensive sports development infrastructures aimed at increasing opportunities for participation in some of the most recreationally deprived areas of the country. Sport England will also be using its powers of solicitation to invite applications for funding from schools in Sport Action Zones, Education Action Zones and Excellence in Cities areas.

Millennium Experience (Financial Support)

Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if the Millennium Commission has any further plans to provide financial support to the Millennium Experience at Greenwich; and if he will make a statement. [124339]

Mr. Chris Smith: On 22 May the Millennium Commission considered an application for additional grant totalling £38.6 million from the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC). While the Commission had serious reservations about providing further grant, they concluded that it would be foolish to withdraw support when the best of the year for visitor attractions is yet to come. They also felt that the value of the Dome as the centrepiece of the nation's millennium celebrations should be recognised and continued. The potential costs to the public sector arising from immediate closure, along with the economic impact on employment and tourism were other factors taken into account.

In light of this, the Commission announced that a further grant of £29 million, subject to stringent conditions, would be made available to NMEC. The Commission's decision was taken after an independent review of the NMEC's financial systems and business plans. The conditions are that there should be:

strengthening and restructuring of NMEC's management and governance;

a revised business plan showing substantial additional cost savings and enhanced marketing plans; and an enhanced financial team at NMEC, to be joined by a dedicated member of the Millennium Commission's own financial staff.

All the Millennium Commissioners expressed confidence in NMEC's Chief Executive, P-Y Gerbeau, and are appreciative of the changes he has made to the operation and running of the Millennium Experience.

Despite lower than predicted visitor numbers, the Dome is the most popular and highly rated paid visitor attraction in the UK, with a wide range of educational benefits. NMEC is also running a National Programme of events and activities across the UK. In addition, the largest derelict site in southern England has been regenerated and the foundations have been laid for a lasting legacy providing jobs and homes for thousands of people.

In line with the commitment made by the previous administration that any additional Lottery funds required to support the Dome should not be at the expense of the Millennium Commission's wider programme of work, the Government confirmed that Lottery money would, if necessary, be made available to the Commission to ensure that it's wider programme does not suffer.

Lottery Grants (Coalfields)

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how he intends to help coalfield areas to benefit further from the National Lottery. [124188]

Mr. Chris Smith: I am committed to ensuring that Lottery funding is distributed fairly and equitably both geographically and across all groups of society. On 5 June my Department will be publishing a report which examines the impact of the National Lottery on coalfield areas. Copies of the report will be available in the Library of the House. My Department and distributors will follow up the recommendations in that report in order to help coalfield and other areas of low take-up to benefit.

Opinion Research

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what was his Department's budget for opinion research in the financial year 1999–2000. [123850]

Mr. Chris Smith: None. My Department has no budget set aside for this purpose.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will place copies of the results of all market and opinion research carried out by his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies since May 1997, in the Library. [123805]

Mr. Chris Smith: Given the extensive number of sources and documents, many unpublished, this material could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Statistics

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what statistics relating to the responsibilities of his Department are collated by parliamentary constituency, indicating the dates covered in each case. [123842]

Mr. Chris Smith: Since 1993 my Department has maintained a database of National Lottery awards, from which a breakdown by parliamentary constituency is available on the DCMS website (http:/www.culture.gov.uk).

Art Loans

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many indemnity undertakings were given by departments under section 16 of the National Heritage Act 1980 for the six month period ended 31 March; and what was the value of (a) any contingent liabilities in respect of such undertakings given at any time under that section which remain outstanding as at 31 March, (b) non-statutory Government indemnities in respect of loans handled by the Government Art Collection which remain outstanding as at 31 March and (c) non-statutory undertakings to Her Majesty in respect of loans from the Royal Collection which remain outstanding at 31 March. [124189]

Mr. Chris Smith: The provision for the Government Indemnity Scheme is made by the National Heritage Act 1980. The scheme facilitates public access to loans of works of art and other objects for public display made to museums, galleries and other such institutions by private owners and non-national institutions. It does this by indemnifying lenders against loss or damage to their loan. Loans covered by the scheme must be for public benefit. The scheme also covers loans of such objects for study purposes within borrowing institutions where this would contribute materially to the public's understanding or appreciation of the loan. Examples of this are enhancing interpretation or explanation to the public of objects or bringing into the public domain, the conclusions of any study.

In the six month period ended 31 March 2000, the following undertakings to indemnify were given under section 16 by the relevant Departments for objects on loan to national and non-national institutions:

Department	Number
Department for Culture, Media and Sport	626
Scottish Executive Education Department	102
The National Assembly for Wales	59
Department of Education for Northern Ireland	11

The value of contingent liabilities in respect of undertakings given at any time under section 16 and which remained outstanding as at 31 March 2000 is:

Department	£
Department for Culture, Media and Sport	1,829,371,639
Scottish Executive Education Department	795,068,302
The National Assembly for Wales	54,029,174
Department of Education for Northern Ireland	4,727,317

The value of non-statutory Government indemnities to cover loans handled by the Government Art Collection and which remained outstanding as at 31 March 2000 is:

Value: £5,475,000.

The value of non-statutory Undertakings given to Her Majesty in respect of loans from the Royal Collection and which remained outstanding as at 31 March 2000 is:

Value: £227,307,975.

TREASURY

Computers within Reach

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what technical specifications he has set for the computers he plans to be leased to people on income support. [123380]

Mr. Wills: I have been asked to reply.

The specification set under the Computers within Reach initiative for low-income learners and families is for a desktop computer with a minimum of a Pentium 1 processor, preferably a 133 MHz processor or faster, or Apple equivalent. The specification also includes a minimum of 32 Megabytes of RAM, 1 Gigabyte hard disk drive, 20-speed CD-ROM drive, V90 56k modem, an operating system and web browser software. The specification is set at a relatively high level given the intended duration of the initiative until 2002.

Monetary Policy Committee

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he plans to change the remit of the Bank of England's Monetary Policy Committee. [124311]

Mr. Gordon Brown: In accordance with Section 12 of the Bank of England Act 1998, I have today written to the Governor restating the MPC's remit and how it will be held accountable for meeting the remit.

My letter has been laid before Parliament and a copy has been sent to the Chairman of the Treasury Committee. Copies are also being deposited in the Libraries of both Houses.

National Insurance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many married women actively revoked their decision to pay the reduced rate of National Insurance contributions in each year from 1977 to the present; [120999]

(2) what decision he has reached about undertaking a further information campaign to advise married women paying the reduced rate of National Insurance contributions about their options; [120998]

(3) if he will estimate, for the latest year for which data are available, the number of married women currently paying the reduced rate of National Insurance contributions who would pay less in National Insurance contributions if they were to pay the full rate of National Insurance contributions; and if he will provide corresponding estimates for 1990; [121199]

(4) if he will place in the Library a copy of the current version of Form CF383 relating to the certificate of election for married women to pay reduced rate National Insurance contributions, together with a copy of the corresponding form issued in 1978; [122122]

(5) if he will place in the Library a copy of the mailing which was sent in 1989 to all women still paying reduced rate National Insurance contributions alerting them to the impending reform to the structure of NICs; and if he will estimate the number of such letters which were issued. [123882]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 5 May 2000]: The number of women who actively revoked their election to pay the reduced rate of National Insurance contributions is not available. A series of the number of women paying at the reduced rate is available in Table 11 of "Contributions and Qualifying Years for Retirement Pension 1995/96-Volume 2", a copy of which is in the Library of the House. However, the year on year reductions in the numbers paying at the reduced rate will be due only in part to those actively revoking their election.

A copy of the 1989 mailshot has been placed in the Library. The mailshot was issued to around 300,000 married women. The coverage went wider than those whose election might have resulted in them paying more NICs at that time.

A copy of a 1978 CF383 and a current version of CF383 have been placed in the Library.

I can confirm that a further publicity exercise will be undertaken later this year. It will be aimed at all women who hold a valid election to pay National Insurance contributions at the reduced rate.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Pike: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received about working families tax credit; what plans he has to make changes in the working families tax credit system; and if he will make a statement. [123280]

Dawn Primarolo: In the Budget, the Government announced their intention to build on the success of WFTC by introducing an integrated child credit and an employment tax credit from 2003.

The integrated child credit will bring together the support for children in WFTC and IS/JSA and the new Children's Tax Credit to create one payment to the main carer. This will create a seamless and transparent system of support for children which will further help to deliver the Government's commitment to end child poverty within a generation.

The adult credit element of WFTC will, along with the Disabled Person's Tax Credit and the Employment Credit component of the New Deal 50 plus, form the foundation of a new employment tax credit which will extend the principle of WFTC to people without children. Paid through the wage packet the employment tax credit will form a single visible instrument, underpinned by the national minimum wage, to make work pay.

The budget paper, "Tackling Poverty and Making Work Pay—Tax Credits for the 21st Century", sets out this next stage of reform in more detail.

We have received a number of representations regarding the development of the new credits and we will continue to discuss the proposed reforms with interested parties.

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 19 May 2000, Official Report, column 294W, on poverty, if the figure of £2.7 billion extra financial support for children from the working families tax credit given in chart 5.2 of the March 2000 Economic and Fiscal Strategy report includes expenditure on the disabled person's tax credit. [123855]

Dawn Primarolo: The figure for the extra financial support delivered through the Working Families Tax Credit includes the additional expenditure on the Disabled person's Tax Credit for families with children.

VAT (Listed Buildings)

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the annual cost of (a) a 10 per cent., (b) an 8 per cent. and (c) a 5 per cent. rate of VAT on restoration work for listed buildings. [123723]

Dawn Primarolo: Customs and Excise do not have estimates of the costs of reducing the VAT rate on restoration work for listed buildings because reliable estimates of amounts of VAT which have been paid in the past on such work are not available.

EU Environmental Taxes

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which environmental taxes he approves under EU proposals for Common EU environmental taxes. [123792]

Dawn Primarolo: Any EU proposal on tax is considered by Treasury Ministers, and follows the normal process set out in my reply to the right hon. Member of 9 May 2000, Official Report, column 334W.

Child Poverty

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 19 May 2000, Official Report, column 294W, on poverty, (a) when 1.2 million children will be lifted above the 60 per cent. of median household income threshold and (b) if this figure is net of those children in households whose income moves below this threshold. [123853]

Dawn Primarolo: On (a), the estimate that 1.2 million children will be lifted above 60 per cent. of median income looks at the effect of all personal tax and benefit changes announced in the past four Budgets; all of these measures will have taken effect by April 2001. On (b), the estimates given in Box 5.1 of the Economic and Fiscal Strategy Report are net of any children in households whose incomes move below the income thresholds.

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 19 May 2000, Official Report, column 294W, on poverty, if the figure of 1.2 million children to be lifted above 60 per cent. of median earnings includes tapering for (a) housing benefit and (b) council tax benefit. [123854]

Dawn Primarolo: The definition of income used in this figure is consistent with that in "Households Below Average Income" and includes Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit. The estimate of 1.2 million children therefore includes the effect of the Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit tapers.

Opinion Research

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library copies of the results of all market and opinion research carried out by his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies since May 1997. [123808]

Mr. Timms: I regret that this information is not held centrally and can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Landfill Tax

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much has been paid from the landfill tax to each of the top 20 recipients among independent environmental trusts; and if he will name them. [123753]

Mr. Timms: Information about which environmental bodies have received contributions under the Landfill Tax Environmental Bodies Credit Scheme and how much they have received is a matter for the Regulator for the scheme, ENTRUST. I have therefore asked them to provide such data as they hold and I will place a copy of their response in the Library.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to make changes to the way landfill tax credits are paid to environmental trusts. [123754]

Mr. Timms: My right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment will shortly publish the Waste Strategy 2000. This will set out the Government's plans to encourage greater support for sustainable waste management activities through the Landfill Tax Environmental Bodies Credit Scheme.

State Pension

Dr. George Turner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he estimates would be the cost to the Treasury of tax relief for the basic state pension if such relief were (a) restricted to the 10 per cent. tax rate, (b) restricted to the 22 per cent. tax rate and (c) unrestricted. [120547]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information is not available.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Statute Law Database

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what progress has been made with the Statute Law Database; and if he will make a statement. [123598]

Mr. Lock: Subject to a few exceptions, the Statute Law Database currently holds electronic versions of all public general statutes that were in force on 1 February 1991 as well as all statutes and printed statutory instruments, both general and local, enacted since that date. The Statutory Publications Office is editing statutes on the database, grouped together according to subject matter, bringing them fully up to date by the application of amendments made by subsequent legislation. During the course of the year 2000, successive groups of statutes will become available to end users in a fully updated form. The inquiry facility is currently available to selected Government users.

Mrs. Fitzsimons: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when he intends to publish the Review of Civil Justice in Northern Ireland. [124191]

Mr. Lock: The final report of the Civil Justice Reform Group will be published on 16 June with a consultation period until the end of September. Copies will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Mr. Lock: The total number of cases committed for sentence to the Crown court by magistrates courts for the last five years are:

Mr. Lock: No statistics relating to the responsibilities of the Lord Chancellor's Department are collated by parliamentary constituency.

HEALTH

Meat Hygiene Service

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if an Office of Veterinary Services contract has been awarded by the Meat Hygiene Service in respect of the new meat plant at Merthyr Tydfil; and if he will make a statement. [121218]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 10 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that the Meat Hygiene Service (MHS) has yet to put out to tender the contract for the provision of Official Veterinary Service (OVS) duties to the new abattoir currently being built at Merthyr Tydfil. This plant has yet to be licensed by the Food Standards Agency and has not commenced operations.

The contract for the provision of OVS duties to the licensed cutting plant that is currently operating from the same site was awarded to the Abbey Veterinary Centre at Abergavenny.

The MHS makes extensive use of contract OVSs which it obtains by means of best practice competitive tendering procedures.

Private Health Care

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in what ways he intends the provisions of the Care Standards Bill [Lords] will affect the regulation of private hospitals. [123130]

Mr. Hutton: Our plans for the regulation of private hospitals and other independent health care establishments were published in "The Way Forward" in December last year, following a wide-ranging consultation exercise. A further paper, "Developing The Way Forward", was published in March this year. This outlines how we envisage regulation of independent health care by the proposed National Care Standards Commission, to be established by the Care Standards Bill, will work in practice. These documents have been placed in the Library and are available on the Department's website at:

"The Way Forward"—www.doh.gov.uk/regulate2.htm

"Developing The Way Forward"—www.doh.gov.uk/regulate4.htm

The regulation of the private and voluntary health care sector in Wales, including private hospitals, will be the responsibility of the proposed new care regulatory arm of the National Assembly.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what policies his Department has to protect the interests of consumers of private health care; and if he will make a statement. [123635]

Ms Stuart: Independent sector health care establishments are currently regulated under the Registered Homes Act 1984. Our proposals for the future regulation of private hospitals and other independent health care establishments were published in "The Way Forward" in December last year, following a wide-ranging consultation exercise. A further paper, "Developing The Way Forward", was published in March this year. This outlines how we envisage regulation of independent health care by the proposed National Care Standards Commission, to be established by the Care Standards Bill, will work in practice. Ensuring safeguards and quality assurance for patients will be addressed. These documents have been placed in the Library and are available on the Department of Health website at:

Social Services Inspectorate

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the reports he has received from the Social Services Inspectorate about the implementation of Circular HSC1999/162: LAC (99) 28; how many of them indicate that the Circular is being implemented properly and fully at local level; and if he will make a statement. [123081]

Mr. Hutton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) on 20 April 2000, Official Report, column 624W.

Disabled People (Care at Home)

Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people with (a) physical and (b) mental disabilities are cared for at home by their families. [123291]

Mr. Hutton: The requested information on the number of people cared for at home by families is not available.

However, the General Household Survey (GHS) indicates that there are around 5.7 million people who are carers in Great Britain. The table shows the percentage of people who are acting as carers by the type of disability of the dependant. The number of carers who are looking after people by disability of dependant can not be estimated accurately because of small sample sizes.

Dioxins

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent research the Government have commissioned to assess dioxin levels in meat and dairy products (a) produced in and (b) imported into the United Kingdom. [123490]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 3 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that it has a continuing programme of surveys on dioxins in food consumed in the United Kingdom, including meat and dairy products. The results show the levels of dioxins and polychlorinated biphenyls in food are continuing to fall. The average dietary intake of these chemicals in the UK is below the Tolerable Daily Intake recommended by the UK Committee on Toxicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment. Details of all surveys are available on the Agency's website at www.foodstandards.gov.uk.

Ambulances

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate has been made of the effect on the cost of ambulances of the recent EU Directive relating to ambulances; and which European producers make ambulances consistent with the Directive. [123326]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 23 May 2000]: No estimate of the potential costs to National Health Service Ambulance Service trusts has been made of introducing the standards recommended by the Comité Européen de Normalisation (CEN) and adopted by the British Standards Institute (BSI). The NHS Purchasing and Supply Agency is working with the ambulance services and manufacturers to determine the costs. Currently no European manufacturers make ambulance vehicles to the new CEN/BSI standards.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement setting out the implications of the EU Directive on ambulances; what the object of the Directive was; and what was the policy of Her Majesty's Government on it. [123325]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 23 May 2000]: Following a period of consultation with manufacturers and users, two new European standards for ambulance vehicles and their equipment were recommended by the Comité Européen de Normalisation (CEN) in August and September last year. Membership of CEN is wider than European Union member states and their recommendations have force only through the Public Procurement Legislative Programme. The object of this programme is to reduce technical barriers to trade throughout the European Free Trade Area.

The British Standards Institute adopted the CEN recommendations as national standards in January 2000. New ambulance vehicles and their equipment will be expected to conform to these standards in the future. We recognise that good purchasing practice by the ambulance services requires the inclusion of agreed standards in specifications where these exist.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many ambulances in the United Kingdom are consistent with the requirements of the EU Directive. [123327]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 23 May 2000]: The new British Standards for ambulance vehicles and equipment were adopted in January this year and apply only to new vehicles specified and purchased after that date. The National Health Service Purchasing and Supply Agency is currently working with NHS Ambulance Services trusts and vehicle manufacturers to identify those elements of the standards with which they are currently able to conform and the time scale for full compliance with the standards.

Teenage Pregnancy

Mrs. Heal: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress he has made on setting up an independent national advisory group on teenage pregnancy. [124314]

Yvette Cooper: I am pleased to announce that the Independent Advisory Group on Teenage Pregnancy has now been established, and that the first meeting of the Group will take place today. It will be chaired by Winifred Tumim, who is currently Chair of the National Council of Voluntary organisations.

The Group's role will be to provide advice to Government and to monitor the overall success of our strategy to cut teenage pregnancy rates and reduce the risk of long term social exclusion for teenage parents and their children.

Children's Homes

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which institutions housing young offenders come within the definition of a children's home in section 1 of the Care Standards Bill [Lords]; what discussions he has had with the Home Office and the Youth Justice Board regarding the definition of a children's home; and if he will make a statement. [123599]

Mr. Hutton: Clause 1 of the Care Standards Bill defines what is a children's home for the purposes of the Bill. In relation to institutions housing young offenders, the current definition of a children's home will not be altered. For that reason, we have had no discussions with the Home Office or the Youth Justice Board regarding the definition of a children's home, as institutions housing young offenders do not come within the definition of a children's home.

Wheelchairs

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list how many (a) electronically powered indoor/outdoor wheelchairs and (b) wheelchair vouchers were issued by each health authority in (i) 1997, (ii) 1998 and (iii) 1999; and what was the cost to each health authority. [123505]

Mr. Hutton: Table 1 shows the totals for numbers of electrically powered indoor/outdoor wheelchairs issued to users and numbers of people issued with a voucher for 1997–98 and 1998–99, along with forecasted outturn figures for 1999–2000, in England.

Table 2 shows the totals for the total committed spend on electrically powered indoor/outdoor wheelchairs, and total actual spend on vouchers for 1997–98 and 1998–99, along with forecasted expenditure figures for 1999–2000, in England.

A breakdown by each health authority of these national figures has been placed in the Library.

Table 1

	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000
Numbers of electronic indoor/outdoor wheelchairs issued to users	4,464	4,033	3,263
Numbers of people issued with a voucher	560	5,010	6,217

	Total committed spend on powered indoor/outdoor wheelchairs	Total actual spend on vouchers
1997–98	6,428,468	764,000
1998–99	8,098,511	3,457,516.51
1999–2000	6,936,225.91	3,968,668.66

Notes:

1. Data are based on National Health Service financial accounting years.
2. Figures for 1999–2000 are based on forecasted returns for quarter 4 1999–2000.
3. As health authorities were required to have voucher schemes in place by 1 April 1998, data returns on numbers of people issued with a voucher were not compulsory during 1997–98.
4. In February 1998–99 health authorities were authorised to transfer any voucher scheme underspends to mainstream or powered wheelchair provision. This expenditure is not reflected in the report of expenditure on actual vouchers.

Mobile Telephone Emissions

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when Sir William Stewart first indicated the likely contents of his report and the conclusions of the inquiry into mobile telephone emissions to officials in his Department; and when this information was made known to ministers. [122334]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 16 May 2000]: From 1 November 1999, the Government publicly stated that,

"Officials of the Department of Health and the Department of Trade and Industry are observers at the Group's meetings while it is taking evidence and may also be observers when the Group considers, in private, its conclusions and recommendations for the report. Such information will not be released outside Government".

Officials saw draft conclusions and recommendations which were being formulated by Sir William Stewart and members of the group during the period to 23 March. Ministers did not see these drafts, nor were they briefed on their contents. Officials were not present for the final deliberations of the Group nor did they see the final set of conclusions and recommendations. Ministers and officials took receipt of the completed report on 3 May 2000.

Pensions (Part-timers)

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what effect the European Court of Justice's ruling on pensions for part-timers will have on NHS pensions; and what estimate he has made of the maximum and minimum cost to NHS pension funds of the ruling. [123263]

Mr. Rooker: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to my written answer on 23 May 2000, Official Report, column 484W.

Grazing Land

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to implement the recommendation of SEAC that the spreading of liquid condensate on grazing land should cease; and if he will make a statement. [118536]

Ms Quin: I have been asked to reply.

We are actively considering how to take forward the SEAC advice and hope to consult on proposals shortly.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Civil Servants

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants, excluding members of the senior civil service, in his Department for 1999–2000; and to what extent the pay awards were staged. [121680]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 18 May 2000]: The headline pay settlement was 2 per cent. on the paybill and, together with the additional funds from staff turnover, staff in post received in total performance related increases averaging 4 per cent. The increases were not staged.

Methyl Tertiary Butyl Ether

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 3 April 2000, Official Report, column 325W, if he will list the companies and sites in the United Kingdom that manufactured methyl tertiary butyl ether in 1999. [123453]

Mrs. Liddell: One company, TotalFina Great Britain Ltd., manufactured methyl tertiary butyl ether (MTBE) in the UK in 1999, at Lindsay Oil Refinery, South Killingholme, Humberside.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 3 April 2000, Official Report, column 325W, what large-scale manufacturing processes in the United Kingdom other than in the petroleum industry include the use of methyl tertiary butyl ether. [123449]

Mrs. Liddell: Methyl tertiary butyl ether (MTBE) is used in small amounts by the oil refining industry, with the average concentration of MTBE in UK petrol about 1 per cent., well below that permitted under EU law. The chemicals and pharmaceuticals industries also use MTBE in small amounts.

Northern Region (Relocations)

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the executive agencies, non-departmental public bodies and local public spending bodies for which his Department is responsible that (a) have been transferred since 1992 and (b) are planned to be transferred (i) to and (ii) from the Northern Region. [123408]

Dr. Howells: None of the Department's executive agencies or non-departmental public bodies has relocated since 1992 either to or from the area covered by the North East and North West Government Offices. There are no current plans for such relocations.

Coal Industry Pension Schemes

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to reduce the percentage of the surpluses from the Mineworkers Pension Scheme and British Coal Staff Superannuation Scheme taken by the Government. [123438]

Mrs. Liddell: Since 1994, the DTI has acted as guarantor to the former British Coal pension schemes. In doing so it underwrites 100 per cent. of any downside risk to guaranteed benefits in the event of scheme deficits. The guarantee means that basic pensions will always rise at least in line with inflation and will never fall in cash terms. In return the Government receive 50 per cent. of any actuarial scheme surpluses—the remaining 50 per cent. being available to the scheme Trustees for distribution among their memberships. The Government have no plans to re-open the guarantee arrangements, but it is discussing with the Trustees whether there are opportunities to build upon them to the mutual benefit of Scheme members and Government.

Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next plans to meet trade unions to discuss the use of the surplus in the Mineworkers' Pension Scheme and the British Coal Staff Superannuation Scheme. [123126]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 24 May 2000]: Decisions on the allocation of the members' share of any surpluses in the coal pension schemes are principally issues for the Trustees of the schemes. I meet representatives of the mining unions regularly and I am always prepared to discuss a broad range of issues including the Mineworkers' Pension Scheme.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action the Government are taking to support manufacturing industry in the north-west; what related discussions he has had in the north-west during the last year; and if he will make a statement. [123527]

Mr. Caborn: Support for manufacturers is listed at Annexe A of the DTI report, "Manufacturing in the Knowledge Driven Economy". This report provides contact details for further information and can be found on the DTI website: www.dti.gov/comp/knowledge.htm.

In addition there are a number of initiatives which will assist in the creation and development of manufacturing companies—Regional Capital Venture Funds; a Phoenix Fund, the UK High Technology Fund and the Innovative High Growth Start Up Initiative which will be open to companies across the whole of the North West. As part of the Government's response to the financing problems of SMEs, we have introduced the new Enterprise Grant scheme. It is proposed that this will cover 64 per cent. of the population in the north-west.

We are also consulting Regional Development Agencies on the potential for the development of Regional Centres for Manufacturing Excellence and Productivity.

Ministers have regular discussions on regional matters. As my hon. Friend is aware, I am due to be in the region on 2 June to meet him and my hon. Friends the Members for Rossendale and Darwen (Janet Anderson) and for Hyndburn (Mr. Pope).

Regulations

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many regulations have been repealed by his Department since May 1997; and what estimate he has made of the resulting cost savings. [123302]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 23 May 2000]: My Department revoked seven regulations between May 1997 and the end of March this year. In most cases the effects were cost neutral. In the period between May 1995 and May 1997 only four regulators were revoked. These were cost neutral.

Regional Selective Assistance

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to submit an application to the European Commission for the approval of £25 million of regional selective assistance for the proposed new Marconi site at Ansty; and if he will make a statement. [123307]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 23 May 2000]: The Government's offer of Regional Selective Assistance for this high quality project is, like any such offer, subject to the rules governing state aids. Individual notification of the project to the European Commission will not be required.

Opinion Research

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will list opinion research projects undertaken on behalf of his Department in the financial year 1999–2000, broken down into (a) focus group research, (b) quantitative surveys and (c) other market research surveys; and if he will list in each case where and when the results were published; [123308]

(2) how much his Department spent on opinion research in the financial year 1999–2000. [123309]

Mr. Byers [holding answers 23 May 2000]: (i) The following table lists all surveys carried out by the DTI and it's agencies in the financial year 1999–2000, which involved an element of opinion research, and which are subject to survey control. All of the surveys listed are considered to contain an element of opinion research, but it is not possible to break these down further into Focus Group, Quantitative and other sub-divisions with any accuracy. Details of where and when results have been published can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

(ii) The total cost to the department for all surveys carried out in the financial year 1999–2000 containing an element of opinion research was about £578,000.

Queen's Awards

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the impact of the Queen's Awards to Industry. [123547]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 24 May 2000]: The Queen's Awards for Export, Technological and Environmental Achievement (formerly The Queen's Award for Industry) were reviewed in 1999 by a Committee under the chairmanship of HRH The Prince of Wales. The Review Committee made 16 key recommendations including a new generic title, "The Queen's Awards for Enterprise", with broader criteria for the three categories: International Trade, Innovation, and Environmental Achievement. The Committee also recommended further work to define criteria for a Queen's Award in the field of sustainable development to be incorporated into the Awards in 2001. The Committee's recommendations were accepted in full by Her Majesty The Queen and the Prime Minister in September 1999.

The Review commissioned market research into perceptions of the Queen's Awards among a structured sample of businesses across a wide range of sectors of business activity. Almost 90 per cent. of all respondents said that British business continued to attach importance to the Queen's Awards; over 90 per cent. of organisations said that people employed in Award winning units continued to be enthusiastic about the Awards and that the Awards provided recognition of outstanding achievement; 74 per cent. of respondents said that the Queen's Awards were the most prestigious awards for achievement in the UK economy; and 78 per cent. of Award winners said that the Awards provided an incentive to outstanding achievement.

Since the Awards were first introduced in 1966, a total of 45,534 applications have been submitted with a total of 4,282 applicants being granted a Queen's Award. Each year many previous Award winners reapply because of the highly positive effect on their marketing of the use of the Queen's Awards emblem on their products, stationery and advertising material. They also cite the enhanced morale and team spirit among their staff which flows from the company winning such a prestigious accolade.

SMART and SPUR

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the ratio of (a) sales and (b) profit to Departmental grant under the SMART and SPUR schemes in each year since the inception of the schemes. [123537]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 24 May 2000]: The data are not available to provide all the information requested. However, an evaluation of SMART in 1991 forecasted a grant:profits ratio of 9:20 resulting from awards made in 1988. A second evaluation of SMART in 1994 calculated a grant:sales ratio of 1:6. An evaluation of SPUR in 1994 concluded that it was too early to assess the grant:profit ratio, given that SPUR had only started in 1991. A further evaluation of Smart is planned for later this year.

Ilisu Dam

Mr. Gummer: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which Middle East countries have informed him of their support for Turkey's planned Ilisu dam project. [123797]

Mr. Caborn: No Middle East countries have notified us that they support the project.

Mr. Gummer: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent assessment he has made of the impact of the proposed Ilisu dam on the built heritage in the area to be inundated. [123826]

Mr. Caborn: We are currently awaiting the updated Environmental Impact Assessment Report, which is expected to cover, among other issues, the impact on heritage, and the Turkish plans for mitigating this.

Mr. Gummer: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry against what environmental consideration the Ilisu dam will be assessed in relation to ECGD support. [123775]

Mr. Caborn: ECGD support for Ilisu will be assessed on the basis of the updated Environmental Impact Assessment Report, which will be reviewed in the light of internationally accepted standards.

Fuel Market

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what evidence he has of smuggled petroleum products being offered to petrol retailers in the North West of England since 1999. [122946]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 24 May 2000]: There is no substantiated evidence of smuggled products being offered to petrol retailers in the North West of England.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the size of the road transportation retail fuel market in England and Wales for (a) diesel and (b) petrol in (i) 1998 and (ii) 1999. [122945]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 24 May 2000]: Retail sales for all types of petrol in England and Wales were 19,662 thousand tonnes in 1998 and 19,444 thousand tonnes in 1999. Retail sales for automotive diesel (DERV) were 6,018 thousand tonnes in 1998 and 6,329 thousand tonnes in 1999. These figures exclude direct deliveries to commercial customers. The 1999 data are provisional.

Office of Fair Trading

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he plans to appoint a new Director General of the Office of Fair Trading. [123751]

Mr. Byers: A successor to John Bridgeman as Director General of Fair Trading is currently being recruited through open competition. My intention is to appoint someone to take over when John Bridgeman's term ends on 30 September 2000.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the cases where he has referred mergers to the Competition Commission (a) on the advice of and (b) against the advice of the Director General of the Office of Fair Trading. [123782]

Mr. Byers: The table lists all the merger cases that I have referred to the Competition Commission.

The Director General of Fair Trading (DGFT) does not advise on newspaper mergers. With the exception of NTL/CWC, all other references were made in accordance with the advice of the DGFT.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will make a statement on the (a) role, (b) size and (c) powers of the board he is proposing for the Office of Fair Trading; [123750]

(2) when he plans to introduce legislation to change the structure of the Office of Fair Trading. [123749]

Mr. Byers: I have proposed that a new Authority for the Office of Fair Trading (OFT) should be established to increase the breadth of experience and expertise guiding the OFT's work. Recent legislation including the Competition Act 1998 has increased the regulator's powers significantly. The role of the new Authority will be to work under the chairmanship of the Director General of Fair Trading to promote effective and competitive markets which benefit consumers. The Authority will have a minimum of five members. The Authority will have the powers currently vested in the Director General of Fair Trading. We will introduce legislation to create an Authority when parliamentary time allows.

Vertical Integration (Competition)

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what his Department's policy is on vertical integration in relation to competition matters; and if he will make a statement. [123637]

Dr. Howells: I examine each merger case that comes before me on its own merits. I reach my decision in the light of the Director General of Fair Trading's advice.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what assessment his Department has made of the views expressed by the OFT in November 1999, concerning further vertical integration of BUPA's private healthcare activities; and if he will make a statement; [123636]

(2) what assessment he has made of the risks posed by vertical integration in the private healthcare sector in respect of (a) competition in the provision of private medical insurance, (b) competition in the provision of private hospital services, (c) the interests of consumers of medical insurance and (d) the interests of consumers of private hospital care; and if he will make a statement. [123632]

Mr. Byers: An assessment of the private medical insurance (PMI) and private medical services (PMS) market was made by the Office of Fair Trading (OFT), which under UK competition law in the first instance has the responsibility to investigate allegations of anti-competitive behaviour and possible abuses of a dominant position.

The OFT announced the results of its inquiry on 5 November 1999. It cleared the sector of major competition problems, but highlighted the need for much greater clarity and accuracy in the information available to policy holders.

The OFT said that it would consider very carefully any further vertical integration of BUPA's or PPP's businesses.

In the specific case of BUPA's proposed acquisition of Community Hospitals Group, I will decide whether or not to refer this case to the Competition Commission in the light of the Director General of Fair Trading's advice. Each case is considered on its individual merits.

Minimum Wage

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the number of companies in Wales which are not paying the minimum wage. [123935]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Government have asked the Low Pay Commission to assess the impact of the minimum wage. Their Second Report, published on 15 February, said early indications were that the vast majority of businesses throughout the UK were meeting their obligations to pay the national minimum wage and that the Inland Revenue had made a successful start to enforcement. As at the end of April 2000, minimum wage compliance offices have dealt with 204 cases of suspected underpayment of the national minimum wage in Wales.

Power Station, Runcorn

Mr. Roy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will announce his decision on ICI Chemicals and Polymers Ltd.'s proposal to build a combined heat and power station at Runcorn, Cheshire. [124315]

Mrs. Liddell: I have today given clearance under Section 14 of the Energy Act 1976 to ICI Chemicals & Polymers Ltd. to build a 250 MW gas-fired combined heat and power station at the ICI Chlor-Chemicals works, Runcorn, Cheshire. The decision has been taken in accordance with the policy set out in the White Paper entitled "Conclusions of the Review of Energy Sources for Power Generation and Government response to fourth and fifth Reports of the Trade and Industry Committee" (Cm 4071).

The decision to give clearance to the proposal on energy policy grounds is without prejudice to any decision that may be taken on whether or not consent is granted under section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989.

Copies of the Press Notice and the clearance letter are being placed in the Library of the House.

Laptops

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many laptop computers used by Ministers, officials and special advisers in his Department have been (a) lost and (b) stolen since May 1997. [123745]

Dr. Howells: During the period since May 1997 there have been 10 laptop computers stolen and three lost from my Department. These figures reflect central records for the core Department and exclude Executive Agencies.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Euro

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which (a) local education authorities and (b) organisations for which his Department has budgetary responsibility (i) have set up and (ii) are setting up projects to prepare for the UK adopting the euro; what these projects are costing each organisation; what the total cost to the Department is; and from which budget sums already spent have come. [122812]

Ms Jowell: An update on changeover planning in the public sector was given in the second Outline National Changeover Plan published on 9 March.

Teacher Re-training

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make available grants for re-training to qualified teachers seeking to re-enter the profession. [123132]

Ms Estelle Morris: In the current academic year, the Teacher Training Agency is providing funding for 56 courses for teachers who wish to refresh their skills. Course structures and the tuition fees charged by providers vary considerably. Local education authorities have power to make grants to teachers who attend these courses under the local education authority (Post-Compulsory Awards) Regulations 1999.

College Lecturers (Silver Book Contracts)

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many college lecturers are still employed on Silver Book contracts; and what proposal he has for their assimilation onto new contracts. [123277]

Mr. Wicks: Over 95 per cent. of all lecturers have agreed to new contracts which are not based on the Silver Book. Contracts are a matter to be agreed between individual colleges and their staff.

Equal Opportunities Legislation

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many applications have been made to industrial tribunals under the Equal Pay Act 1970 and the Sex Discrimination Act 1975; and what percentage of such applications were successful through being settled with an award (a) before a hearing and (b) following a hearing. [123466]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 23 May 2000]: The following tables show employment tribunal statistics for sex discrimination and equal pay cases since 1976. The percentage of cases each year which were settled through arbitration is given. Information is not available on whether cases were settled before or after a hearing. The percentage of those cases heard at a tribunal each year which were successful is also given.

Teachers (Early Retirement)

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many teachers in each local education authority were offered early retirement in each of the last 20 years. [123113]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The number of teachers taking early retirement from the maintained nursery, primary, secondary and special sector in each local education authority in England for the last 20 years is contained in tables, copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Astra Group Pension Scheme

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the winding-up of the Astra Group Pension Scheme. [123324]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 23 May 2000]: The process for winding-up the Astra Group Pension Scheme started on 1 April 1999. Since then no new pensions have been awarded as members reach age 60, but payments to existing pensioners have continued to be made. The scheme's administrators still have some outstanding issues about the restoration of members' rights in the state pension scheme. These need to be resolved to establish the amount of money available to buy annuities to protect current pensioners and preserved annuities for members with preserved pensions. Until this process is completed, nobody will know the extent of any shortfall in the scheme's assets to meet its liabilities.

I am unable, at this stage, to give any indication of when the winding-up process will be completed.

Pupil Performance

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent research he has commissioned on the performance of the upper quartile of 15-year-old pupils in (a) comprehensive schools and (b) selective schools; and if he will make a statement. [123503]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 24 May 2000]: The Secretary of State has not commissioned any recent research on this topic. Analytical Services have calculated the comparative performance of 15-year-old pupils in (a) comprehensive schools and (b) selective schools and the statement reflects the comparative performance of the two groups.

The first group (a) included the top 25 per cent. (or quartile) of 15-year-old pupils in comprehensive schools—based on their total GCSE/GNVQ point score (in order not to include and exclude some pupils with the same point score, the actual percentage of pupils included was 24.5 per cent.). Their results were:

	Percentage/ average point score
Percentage achieving 5+ grades A*-C at GCSE/GNVQ	100
Percentage achieving 1+ grades A*-G at GCSE/GNVQ	100
Average point score per 15-year-old pupil	60.9

The second group (b) included all 15-year-olds in selective schools. Their results were:

	Percentage/ average point score
Percentage achieving 5+ grades A*-C at GCSE/GNVQ	96.4
Percentage achieving 1+ grades A*-G at GCSE/GNVQ	99.6
Average point score per 15-year-old pupil	60.7

Ofsted Inspections

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what was the average amount paid per day to Ofsted inspectors, and what was the average profit made by organisations carrying out inspections in (a) secondary and (b) primary schools, in the last year for which figures are available; [123787]

(2) what was the average cost, per pupil, of Ofsted inspections in (a) secondary schools and (b) primary schools in the last year for which figures are available. [123793]

Ms Estelle Morris: These are matters for HM Chief Inspector of Schools, Chris Woodhead. I have asked him to write to my hon. Friend and to place a copy of his letter in the Library.

Autism

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what studies he has carried out of the incidence of autistic conditions among the school population; and what guidance he has issued to local education authorities in connection with these conditions. [123162]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 24 May 2000]: Figures are not collected on the incidence of particular types of special educational need. Provisions in the Education Act 1981, now consolidated into the Education Act 1996, require schools to submit information on numbers of pupils with special educational needs. In accordance with the recommendation of the Warnock Committee, there is no requirement for them to record the nature of the disability or learning difficulty and we have no current intention to require them to do so.

Guidance on meeting children's special educational needs is contained in the "Code of Practice on the Identification and Assessment of Special Educational Needs". The Department has established an Autism Working Group which is investigating examples of good practice and will be publishing practical advice on early identification and making provision for children with autism. In its advice the Group will be taking account of the work of the special educational needs regional co-ordination projects, one of which, in the West Midlands, has been concentrating on provision for children with autism.

Instructors

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will break down by subject the instructors in service in maintained schools in England in January, as referred to in Statistical First Release 13/2000; and how many of these instructors have the same basic maths and English qualifications as qualified teachers. [123589]

Ms Estelle Morris: Information is not available centrally on instructors' basic qualifications or subject taught.

Pensions (Part-timers)

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the maximum and minimum costs to teachers' pension funds of the European Court of Justice's ruling on pensions for part-timers. [123262]

Mr. Rooker: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to my written answer on 23 May 2000, Official Report, column 484W.

NORTHERN IRELAND

RUC Mobile Support Unit, Mahon Road

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list by rank the number of officers within the Royal Ulster Constabulary Mobile Support Unit based at Mahon Road, Portadown. [119712]

Mr. Ingram: There are two Mobile Support Units based at Mahon Road, Portadown. In 1997, the establishment of each MSU was:

One Inspector; four Sergeants; and 21 Constables and Reserve Constables.

One Inspector; four Sergeants; and 23 Constables and Reserve Constables.

Both units are not normally on duty at the same time.

Travellers

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made in effecting the transfer of responsibility for traveller accommodation to the Housing Executive. [123061]

Mr. George Howarth: Responsibility for providing housing for those travellers who wish to move into settled accommodation already rests with the Housing Executive and many traveller families have been provided with homes in existing Housing Executive estates. In addition, work to provide three pilot group housing schemes, specifically tailored for extended traveller family groups, is due to commence in the current financial year.

It is proposed to transfer responsibility for serviced sites from District Councils to the Housing Executive and provision for this will be included in future legislation.

Prisoners (Reintegration)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland further to the undertakings given in the 6 May letter jointly signed by the Prime Minister and the Irish Taoiseach, (a) what measures are being taken to facilitate the reintegration of prisoners into the community, (b) what related issues are being addressed and (c) what body has been tasked with responsibility for implementation of each measure. [123058]

Mr. Ingram: The Government are committed to meeting their obligations under the Good Friday Agreement. Government policy is that prisoners should be given every assistance to enable them to play a full and active role in society, and that they should have full, though not preferential, access to the range of social support generally available to members of the public.

The Government are conscious that the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998 has resulted in the release over a relatively short period of significant numbers of long-term prisoners, many of whom will not have been able to prepare for release in the normal way. In order to meet its overall aims within these special circumstances, the Government set up a co-ordinating group to ensure that released prisoners had proper access to support services, and that services themselves were aware of and geared to cope with the likely patterns of release. Potential difficulties in both immediate and longer-term provision for prisoners have been addressed in a manner consistent with ensuring that there is no differential in provision between ex-prisoners and the general public.

Many wider reintegration issues would involve changes to current practices or laws. The Government are reluctant to make changes to existing legislation without the support of the Assembly, given the particular sensitivity of reintegration and the fact that many of the matters of concern are the responsibility of the devolved administration.

I have had meetings with Assembly party representatives to discuss reintegration issues prior to devolution. The Government are committed to working co-operatively with the devolved administration on these issues.

Irish Language TV and Film Production

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what body has been tasked with drawing up a two-year implementation plan for the Irish language TV and film production pilot announced to start by April 2001. [123059]

Mr. George Howarth: The Department for Culture, Arts and Leisure is currently considering with other Departments how to give effect to the undertaking to begin an Irish language, television and film pilot by April 2001.

Maze Prison

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland who was the duty governor in charge of HMP Maze on 27 December 1997. [123231]

Mr. Ingram: On security grounds, I am not prepared to name the governor in question.

Rate Collection Agency

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what performance targets have been set for the Rate Collection Agency in 2000–01. [124427]

Mr. Ingram: For 2000–01, the following performance targets have been set for the RCA:

Output

To collect 97.55 per cent. (or the 1999–2000 outcome if higher) of the Gross Domestic Collectable Rate (excluding late assessments) by 31 March 2001.

Efficiency

To achieve a forecast unit cost of £11.56 (representing a 2 per cent. improvement in the real value of the unit cost) for collecting rates per hereditament by 31 March 2001.

To achieve a forecast unit cost of £18.54 (representing a 2 per cent. improvement in the real value of the unit cost) for processing Housing Benefit cases by 31 March 2001.

Quality of Service

To process 98 per cent. of Housing Benefit claims free from error.

To achieve an average turnaround time of 28 working days for [1]regular non-annual Housing Benefit applications.

Financial Management

To live within budget allocations for 2000–01.

[1] Where the Agency is not required to seek any additional information to determine the outcome of the application.

[2] Where the Agency has all the necessary relevant information to enable the refund to be processed.

SCOTLAND

New Deal

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will assess the success of the New Deal in creating opportunities for employment and training in Glasgow and across Scotland. [121472]

Dr. Reid: The success of the New Deal is making a significant contribution to increasing employment in Glasgow and across Scotland. Employment in Glasgow rose by 11,000 in the year to February 2000 and across Scotland by 26,000 in the year to March 2000, and is at around its highest level since 1966.

Shipbuilding (Clyde)

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what actions he has recently taken to help retain shipbuilding on the Clyde. [121807]

Dr. Reid: This Government are firmly committed to improving the competitive position of the shipbuilding industry not just on the Clyde but across the whole of the UK. I have had recent meetings with ministerial colleagues, trade unions and management of the Govan shipyard and continue to promote the strengths in shipbuilding that exist on the Clyde.

Penalty Clauses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the contracts entered into with private sector companies for the provision of goods or services since May 1997 where penalty clauses were triggered for non-performance; and if he will make a statement. [122013]

Dr. Reid: The information requested is not held centrally and could be collated in respect of the period before 1 July 1999 only at disproportionate cost. Procurement by the Scottish Executive since 1 July 1999 is a matter for the Scottish Parliament. There have been no requirements to trigger penalty clauses in the Scotland Office since 1 July 1999.

Assisted Areas

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 9 May 2000, Official Report, column 378W, how many responses received by his Department in respect of the revised assisted areas map (a) objected to and (b) supported the removal of Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey from the proposed map. [122149]

Dr. Reid: The responses received are not readily capable of analysis in the form requested by my hon. Friend.

Copies of the consultation responses received by my Department will be placed in the Library of the House in due course.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles operated by his Department were manufactured (i) in the UK, (ii) in the EU and (iii) elsewhere. [122255]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 17 May 2000]: My Department does not operate any cars or commercial vehicles. Details of vehicles operated by the Government Car and Despatch Agency, for the Government as a whole, were given in the reply from my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Cabinet Office on 17 May 2000, Official Report, column 141W.

Ferry Services

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has had with the European Union over the future of the Highlands and Islands ferry services; and if he will make a statement. [123072]

Dr. Reid: My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Scotland Office, recently met in Brussels with representatives of the European Commission to discuss a wide range of issues affecting transport in remote and peripheral regions in Scotland and elsewhere in Europe. Responsibility for ferry services operating within the Highlands and Islands is a matter for the Scottish Executive who have been kept fully informed of the Commission's views as they affect these services.

Skye Bridge

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the DTZ Pieda Economic Impact Assessment on the Skye Bridge will be published. [123283]

Dr. Reid: The Scottish Office commissioned the Economic Impact Assessment of the Skye Bridge, by DTZ Pieda, which was carried out between May 1998 and June 1999. The publication of the results of this assessment are now a matter for the Scottish Executive.

Statistics

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what statistics relating to the responsibilities of his Department are collated by parliamentary constituency, indicating the dates covered in each case. [123838]

Dr. Reid: Monthly statistics on unemployment and New Deal figures are allocated on a constituency basis.

DEFENCE

Serbia

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment the Government have made of the views recently expressed by NATO's Supreme Allied Commander Europe concerning use of electronic methods against Serbia as an alternative to aerial assault. [122637]

Mr. Spellar: I assume that my hon. Friend is referring to the comments made by the previous SACEUR, General Clark, at the Senate Committee on Armed Services on 21 October 1999. No formal assessment has been made by MOD of the views he expressed then. However, we agree that co-ordinated international pressure on all fronts, diplomatic, economic (trade and financial) as well as military, is an important factor during crises. Electronic methods on their own would be unlikely to have achieved the desired result against Serbia.

Kosovo

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the number of Federal Republic of Yugoslavia tanks and armoured personnel carriers destroyed during the war in Kosovo. [122636]

Mr. Spellar: NATO's assessment of the number of Federal Republic of Yugoslavia tanks and armoured personnel carriers destroyed during the Kosovo conflict was made public by the then Supreme Allied Commander Europe, General Wesley Clark, on 16 September 1999. General Clark's analysis, based on access to a wide range of sources, concluded that 93 tanks/self-propelled artillery pieces were successfully struck (in other words destroyed or damaged), with physical evidence of 26 such vehicles having been destroyed (14 tanks and 12 self-propelled artillery pieces) remaining on the ground after NATO had entered Kosovo—the remainder of the assessment is underpinned by evidence from other sources. NATO assessed there to have been 153 successful strikes against Armoured Personnel Carriers, with the destruction of 12 such vehicles confirmed by evidence on the ground. The methodology used to put together the NATO assessment is explained in detail in the transcript of General Clark's presentation, available on the internet at the NATO website: www.nato.int/kosovo/press/p990916a.htm. Battle Damage Assessment is not an exact science, but these are the most comprehensive figures available.

Royal Artillery Radar

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the cost of procurement of the Mobile Artillery Monitoring Battlefield Radar for the Royal Artillery; what is the time scale for this programme and the total cost; and if he will make a statement. [122375]

Dr. Moonie: The MAMBA programme covers the procurement of radar systems to meet the Army's requirement for a lightweight and mobile weapon locating radar. It is currently in the concept stage of the procurement process and it is planned to commence the assessment phase in June 2000 when the procurement options and associated costs will be addressed in detail.

The current plan is for the radar systems to be in Service by 2008–09. However, in order to satisfy a capability gap identified by the Service Customer, it is planned to provide an initial operating capability by 2002–03 with the balance of deliveries by 2008–09.

Light Weight Howitzer

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assistance has been requested from the Ministry of Defence by BAE Systems to develop a US production base for the XM777 Light Weight Howitzer; and if he will make a statement. [123001]

Dr. Moonie: XM777 is based on the Ultra-lightweight Field Howitzer (UFH), which was designed as a private venture in the United Kingdom by the then Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Ltd., now part of Royal Ordnance Defence. The UFH won a competition run by the US Marine Corps and became the XM777 Light Weight Howitzer in the US Engineering and Manufacturing Demonstration (EMD) phase of acquisition.

No request for assistance to develop a US production base has been received by the Defence Procurement Agency.

ALSL

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his Department's requirements are for the Alternative Landing Ship Logistics; what is the payload breakdown of the ALSL; when the final decisions on awarding contracts for construction will be made; what is the target price; and if he will make a statement. [122980]

Dr. Moonie: The ALSLs are required to move men, equipment and stores to wherever they are required in the world and to be able to deploy them as a fighting force. Each vessel's minimum payload will include 350 military personnel, 500 linear metres of vehicles, 106 tonnes of war maintenance reserve plus two Landing Craft Vehicle and Personnel (LCVPs) and two Mexeflote powered rafts. The achievement of greater payloads, within cost constraints, is being sought in the Invitation to Tender.

Contract placement for the design and build of two new ALSLs is planned to occur later this year. The estimated target price for the construction of the two vessels is approximately £138 million.

Shipbuilding

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the planned timetable for his Department's shipbuilding orders this year. [122901]

Mr. Hoon: We expect to place contracts for two Survey Vessels during this summer, and, by the end of this year, for the Demonstration and First of Class manufacture of the new Type 45 Anti War Warfare Destroyer, and for two Alternative Landing Ships Logistics. These ships will all be built in the UK. We also plan to procure a range of smaller craft during the year.

It is also intended to procure a strategic sealift under Private Finance Initiative arrangements later this year which will involve the construction of six ro-ro ferries although in this case the vessels themselves would be ordered by the service provider not by the MOD.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Line of Route

Mr. Gale: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee if the Committee is in a position to advise the House of the likely amount visitors will be charged for a guide in order to undertake line of route tours during the summer Adjournment. [124312]

Mrs. Roe: Following negotiations between the authorities of both Houses and organisations able to carry out the booking and guiding arrangements, it has been established that two separate companies will be required for these functions. The result of having to divide these services means that a minimal charge of £3.50, to cover the guide fees and ticketing arrangements, will have to be made. Pre-booked tickets for a timed guided tour will go on sale after the Whitsun Adjournment.

Pensions (Part-timers)

Mrs. Lait: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, what estimate the Commission has made of the maximum and minimum costs to the House of Commons pension fund of the European Court of Justice's ruling on pensions for part-timers. [123288]

Mr. Kirkwood: The House of Commons Staff Pension Scheme anticipates very minimal costs, arising from the European Court of Justice's ruling on pensions for part-time staff. The House has always sought to employ part-time staff to work more than the 15 hours per week limit which in the past would have excluded staff from the pension scheme.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Stakeholder Pensions

Kali Mountford: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the stakeholder pensions regulations will be laid. [124340]

Mr. Rooker: Following extensive consultation on the detailed arrangements and the draft regulations, the Stakeholder Pension Schemes Regulations 2000 (SI 2000/1403) have been laid today. Copies are available in the usual way and the regulations will also be available on the internet at www.legislation.hmso.gov.uk.

State Pension

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the level of the basic state pension if it represented the same percentage of the average wage as it did in November 1982; and if he will estimate what would be the annual cost of raising the basic state pension to that level. [122682]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the tables.

The link between the basic pension and average earnings was broken in 1979. No-one is expected to live on the basic pension alone. Latest figures for single pensioner incomes are £132 a week, 36 per cent. of average earnings.

Rate of full category A basic state pension, assuming same percentage of average earnings as November 1982

	April 1999	April 2000
Average weekly earnings	£400.10	[1]£422.51
Basic pension rate as a percentage of earnings in November 1982	23.1	23.1
Assumed rate of basic pension	£92.40	£97.60

[1] Assumed

Costs of raising basic state pension to levels shown in Table 1

£ billion

	1999–2000	2000–01
Gross	14.8	17.3
Net	11.7	13.8

Notes:

1. Average weekly earnings figure for April 1999 is for all full-time employees, taken from the New Earnings Survey. An equivalent April 2000 earnings figure is not available. The assumption used to derive April 2000 figure is that April 1999 earnings grow by 5.6 per cent. over following year (based on March 2000 annual growth in the average earnings index).

2. Basic state pension rates are rounded to the nearest 5p.

3. Costs are rounded to the nearest £100 million and are in 2000–01 benefit rate terms.

4. Gross costs are estimated by the Government Actuary's Department.

5. Costs net of income-related benefits are estimated using the Policy Simulation Model.

6. Source of pensioners' incomes figure Family Resources Survey and New Earnings Survey.

7. The latest data for which pensioners' incomes estimates are available is 1997–98. This is expressed as a percentage of average earnings in April 1997, £368.

Press Officers

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many press officers his Department employed in (a) May 1997 and (b) May 2000. [122475]

Mr. Rooker: The information is as follows:

Number of press officer posts within this department and its agencies

Year	Number
May 1997	[1]28.25
May 2000	22.25

[1] Includes two posts held in the Contributions Agency which transferred to the Inland Revenue in May 1997.

Note:

It should be noted that the structure of the Department has changed during the intervening period. Direct comparison of numbers between the years in question would therefore not be appropriate.

Parental Leave

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the gross cost to the Exchequer on an annual steady-state basis of paying parental leave at the rate of (a) £60 and (b) £100 a week, assuming the take-up by fathers is (i) 10 per cent., (ii) 15 per cent., (iii) 20 per cent., (iv) 25 per cent. and (v) 30 per cent. and the take-up by mothers is (1) 30 per cent., (2) 40 per cent., (3) 50 per cent., (4) 60 per cent. and (5) 70 per cent. [123437]

Mr. Bayley: The information is in the table.

The gross cost to the exchequer on an annual steady state basis of paying parental leave for 13 weeks to employees who have a child under five at the specified rates

£ million

Take up—percentage	£60 a week	£100 a week
Fathers
10	30	55
15	50	80
20	65	110
25	80	135
30	95	160
Mothers
30	75	125
40	100	165
50	125	250
60	150	250
70	175	290

Notes:

1. Take-up is assumed to be the same across the entire earnings distribution. Up to 415,000 fathers, and 315,000 mothers, would become entitled each year.

2. The assumptions on which these calculations have been made are:

that the Exchequer meets the full costs of the paid parental leave;
that the 13 weeks of parental leave are spread evenly over the first five years of the child's life;
that every parent has only one child in the age group;
that no qualifying periods by length of service are taken into account.

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the gross cost to the Exchequer on an annual steady-state basis of paying parental leave at (a) full earnings replacement value, (b) 90 per cent. of earnings replacement value, (c) 50 per cent. of earnings replacement value and (d) 30 per cent. of earnings replacement value, assuming the take-up by fathers is 50 per cent. and the take-up by mothers is 90 per cent. [123436]

Mr. Bayley: The information is in the table.

Gross cost to Exchequer on an annual steady-state basis of paying parental leave for 13 weeks to employees who have a child under 5

£ million

Rate of payment	Mothers	Fathers
Full earnings replacement	745	1,305
90 per cent. earnings replacement	670	1,175
50 per cent. earnings replacement	375	650
30 per cent. earnings replacement	225	390

Notes:

1. Take-up for fathers of 50 per cent., and mothers of 90 per cent. is assumed to be the same across the entire earnings distribution. Up to 415,000 fathers, earning on average £480 a week, and 315,000 mothers, earning on average £200 a week, would become entitled each year.
2. The figures above correct the answer given to the Written Answer on 17 May 1999, Official Report, columns 251–52W.
3. The assumptions on which these calculations have been made are:

that the Exchequer meets the full costs of the paid parental leave;
that the 13 weeks of parental leave are spread evenly over the first 5 years of the child's life;
that every parent has only one child in the age group;
that no qualifying periods by length of service are taken into account.

Pension Forecasts

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if his proposals to provide all national insurance contributors with annual pension forecasts is on target; and if he will make a statement. [123289]

Mr. Rooker: The first combined pension forecasts, which include details of both state and private pension rights, were issued to Prudential customers in April as part of a series of pilots. Other pilot employers and pension providers will issue combined forecasts later this year. We are on course to meet or exceed our target to start the full-scale service from 2002.

We are committed to providing better pensions information. Combined pension forecasts will, for the first time, provide individuals with a clear indication of what sort of retirement income to expect. This will enable them to make better-informed decisions on what savings they need to make.

Older People

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) which organisations representing older people the members of the Inter-Ministerial Group for Older People consulted during 1999; and in which regions the programme of public consultation took place; [123033]

(2) what issues and concerns were raised during the public consultation undertaken by the Inter-Ministerial Group for Older People; [123034]

(3) how he plans to respond to the results of the consultation undertaken during the past year by the Inter-Ministerial Group for Older People. [123035]

Mr. Rooker: During 1999 the Inter-Ministerial Group for Older People led a programme of listening events across the UK. The events were put on by a partnership between the Inter-Ministerial Group, the UK Secretariat for the International Year of Older Persons and mainly voluntary sector organisations working with older people. The locations where these events took place and representative organisations involved are set out in the newsletter report "Life begins at 50—the 1999 Listening Events" and summarised in the table.

A number of issues and concerns were raised during the listening events programme. These are covered in the research report "Building a Better Society for Older People—Report on the Listening Events to the Inter-Ministerial Group for Older People" by Annette Boaz and Carol Hayden, Warwick Business School, the University of Warwick.

We published on 17 May a report "Life begins at 50—A Better Society for Older People" setting out the key points raised by older people at 1999 listening events, the action the Government have already taken to address them, and the action they will take in the future. On the same day the Secretary of State hosted a National Event in London aimed at promoting positive perceptions of older people; feeding back to those people who had been involved in listening events; and setting out plans to help build a better society for older people.

Copies of all the above publications are in the Library.

Minimum Income Guarantee

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners in (a) Shrewsbury and Atcham and (b) Shropshire will benefit from the minimum income guarantee increases in April 2001; and if he will make a statement. [123096]

Mr. Bayley: We estimate that some 8,000 pensioner households in Shropshire will benefit from increases to the minimum income guarantee in April 2001. This includes 3,000 in the constituency of Shrewsbury and Atcham.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security of those pensioners who are excluded from gaining the minimum income guarantee because of (a) ownership of excess capital, (b) receipt of an occupational pension and (c) both ownership of excess capital and an occupational pension, however many and what proportion have a total income or calculated income (i) £0-£5 above, (ii) £5 to £10, (iii) £10 to £15 and (iv) £15 to £20 above the minimum income guarantee. [121621]

Mr. Bayley [holding answer 11 May 2000]: The information is in the tables.

1. This question has been answered using the Policy Simulation Model (PSM) for Income-Related benefits, based on 1997–98 Family Resources Survey data. This is uprated to 2000–01 prices and benefit levels.
2. The State Earnings-Related Pension Scheme has been excluded from the calculation of occupational pensions.
3. Pensioners with incomes below the minimum income guarantee are excluded on other grounds such as full-time employment if appropriate.
4. Numbers are rounded to the nearest 10,000 and shown in thousands.
5. Sums may not total because of rounding.
6. Tariff income is calculated using all capital held by a case above the lower limit.

Winter Fuel Payments

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will backdate winter fuel payments for 1999 for those who were in temporary respite care over the period 20 to 26 September 1999; [123071]

(2) what plans the Government have to make eligible those people who will be in temporary respite care for 12 weeks or less from the week commencing 18 September 2000 for winter fuel payments. [123054]

Angela Eagle: To ensure that no-one who enters residential care for a temporary period misses out on receiving a winter fuel payment the eligibility rules have been amended from next winter.

Under the revised regulations, someone who has been in residential care for less than 13 weeks at the end of the qualifying week (week ending 24 September 2000) will be treated as being temporarily in residential care and will be eligible for a winter fuel payment on the basis of their usual home circumstances.

These revisions can apply only to next winter's payments and future payments. They cannot apply to any of the three previous winters.

Christmas Bonus

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much has been spent in each of the past five years on the pensioners' Christmas bonus. [122571]

Mr. Bayley: The information is in the table.

The Christmas Bonus is not paid exclusively to pensioners. It is also paid to other groups, such as widows and disabled people, who meet the qualifying conditions.

Laptops

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many laptop computers used by Ministers, officials and special advisers in his Department have been (a) lost and (b) stolen since May 1997. [123744]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

From the available information, none of these losses/thefts have been incurred by Ministers or special advisers.

Opinion Research

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will place copies of the results of all market and opinion research carried out by his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies since May 1997, in the Library. [123814]

Mr. Rooker: Research commissioned under the Department's Research Programme has included public opinion research to inform the development and evaluation of policy. All such research is published on completion and available in the Library. In addition, the War Pensions Agency carries out a Customer Service Survey annually, the results of which are published.

The Communications Directorate of the Department commissions research to develop and evaluate publicity campaigns or to inform other presentational issues. All reports are either placed in the Library or are available on request. If a report is not available, this may be because the full research has not yet been completed (i. e. reports not yet finalised by contractors, or the fieldwork is still in progress) or findings are still being employed to inform communications activity.

Statistics

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what statistics relating to the responsibilities of his Department are collated by parliamentary constituency, indicating the dates covered in each case. [123844]

Mr. Rooker: The information is as follows:

Income Support: Figures for this benefit are available at Parliamentary Constituency level on a quarterly basis from August 1998, the latest available being November 1999, with February 2000 due to be published 25 May 2000.

Jobseeker's Allowance: Figures for this benefit are also available at Parliamentary Constituency level for August 1998, and the two quarters August 1999 and November 1999, with February 2000 due to be published on 8 June 2000.

Family Credit: These figures are available at Parliamentary Constituency level only for May 1999 and was replaced by Working Families Tax Credit in October 1999.

Attendance Allowance: Figures at Parliamentary Constituency level, based on a 5 per cent. sample, are available for this benefit on a quarterly basis as far back as November 1995. However, figures based on 100 per cent. data (and therefore more accurate) are available for August 1996, May 1998, and May 1999.

Disability Living Allowance: Figures at Parliamentary Constituency level, based on a 5 per cent. sample, are available for this benefit on a quarterly basis as far back as August 1992. However, figures based on 100 per cent. data (and therefore again more accurate) are available for May 1998, and May 1999.

Incapacity Benefit: Figures are not normally published for this benefit at Parliamentary Constituency level, although they are available on request depending on sample sizes.

Client Group Analysis of the Working Age: Figures on the number of people of working age claiming a key Social Security Benefit by Parliamentary Constituency, are available on request relating to May 1999 or August 1999. November 1999 figures will become available from 29 June 2000.

No information is available at Parliamentary Constituency level for Housing Benefit, Council Tax Benefit, Retirement Pensions, Occupational Pensions, Lifetime Labour Market Database, Industrial Injuries Disablement Benefit, Invalid Care Allowance, Child Benefit, and War Pensions. It is hoped however, that information at Parliamentary Constituency level will become available for Child Benefit and War Pensions within the next three months.

Note:

Cases are allocated to each Parliamentary Constituency by matching the postcode against the relevant version of the Postcode Directory for the relevant year. Constituency boundaries are represented as at May 1997.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Victim Support

Ms Rosie Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures he is taking to improve the position of victims in the criminal justice system. [124313]

Mr. Straw: I shall be announcing tomorrow my plans to give victims and their relatives a greater say in the criminal justice process.

Stafford Prison

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the 1999 Annual report of the Board of Visitors of HM Prison Stafford, with particular regard to the issue of health care. [123098]

Mr. Boateng: Since the Board of Visitors' report was submitted, significant improvements have been made in the standard of health care at Stafford prison. In a recent audit, standards were rated satisfactory. A health needs assessment is currently being conducted by the prison in partnership with the Stafford Health Authority. That assessment will form the basis for developing a health improvement programme.

I am arranging for a copy of my full reply to the report to be placed in the Library.

Child Pornography

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) men and (b) women have been convicted and imprisoned for possession of child pornography in England and Wales during the last 12 months. [123377]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The available information, taken from the Home Office Court Proceedings Database, is given in the table.

Cyclists (Fixed Penalties)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cyclists have been fined for riding on pavements since the introduction of the fixed penalty. [123381]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information on the new fixed penalty offences introduced on 1 August 1999 is not yet available, nor is information on court imposed fines since that date.

Police forces have been asked to monitor the new fixed penalty provisions and it is hoped to publish the figures later in the year.

Working Time Directive

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the impact of the Working Time Directive upon fire authorities dependent upon retained firemen; and if he will make a statement. [123298]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Under the Central Local Partnership, the Home Office works closely with the Local Government Association's Fire Service Expenditure Forecasting Group to assess future resource demands. The Group has estimated the cost to the fire service in England of the new arrangements for paid annual leave for retained firefighters, agreed in the light of the Working Time Directive, as £3-£4 million a year, with back pay costs of up to £9 million.

Green Transport

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the key buildings for which his Department (a) submitted and (b) did not submit green transport plans by March. [122621]

Police Officers (Funding)

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers are funded (a) in full and (b) in part by parish councils. [122278]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 15 May 2000]: Parish Councils may provide grants to police authorities under section 92 of the Police Act 1996. They also have powers under Section 31 of the Local Government and Rating Act 1997 to install and maintain equipment for the detection or prevention of crime in their area.

The Crime and Disorder Act 1998 requires local authorities and the police to work together at district level to develop and implement strategies for reducing crime and disorder in the area. In doing so, they must work in co-operation with a number of other key agencies including parish councils. These partnerships can assist the police in considering how best to deploy existing resources to target local needs.

No detailed information is available centrally on these forms of support.

Immigration

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will (a) investigate the immigration status of Sheikh Abu Hamza and Sheikh Omar Bakri Mohammed and (b) request the United States authorities to investigate the immigration status of Muhammed Jameel; and if he will make a statement. [123662]

Mr. Straw: The person referred to as Sheikh Abu Hamza was granted British nationality in 1986. Omar Bakri Mohammed was granted infinite leave to remain in the United Kingdom in 1993. The immigration status of any individual in the United States of America is a matter for the United States of America authorities.

Opinion Research

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place copies of the results of all market and opinion research carried out by his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies since May 1997, in the Library. [123810]

Mr. Straw: I refer to the reply I gave the hon. Member on 19 July 1999, Official Report, columns 391–92W, giving details of market and opinion research undertaken by my Department. I propose to write to the hon. Member further as soon as my officials are able to update the available information and I will place a copy of the letter in the Library. I also refer to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) on 9 February 2000, Official Report, columns 164–65W, which covers publication of research commissioned by my Department.

The Department conducts or commissions market or opinion research only when it is justified by the specific needs of a particular policy or programme and this is the most economical, efficient and effective way to achieve the purpose. Consulting and involving the public helps inform both policy formulation and the delivery of better quality public services.

Probation Service

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he will roll out a further version of the CRAMS, to be known as 4.6.1, for the Probation Service in England and Wales; [123594]

(2) how the proposed probation IT system Copernicus differs from the existing system, known as CRAMS; and if he will make a statement; [123590]

(3) when Bull Information Systems will set up a Helpdesk to deal with user problems with Probation Service IT; what is the cost of the contract providing this service; and if he will make a statement; [123596]

(4) if he will list the errors and user difficulties which are currently identified in the Case Recording and Management System for the Probation Service in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement; [123592]

(5) if the new version of CRAMS will be accompanied by release notes and acceptance certificates; [123595]

(6) if Bull Information Systems have been given a new contract to maintain and correct faults contained in the Case Recording and Management System for the Probation Service in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement; [123591]

(7) how many faults have been identified in the Case Recording and Management System version 4.6 for the Probation Service in England and Wales; how those faults are being prioritised; and if he will make a statement. [123593]

Mr. Boateng: Bull provides support and maintenance of the Probation Service infrastructure. A replacement contract has recently consolidated a number of previously separate contracts. This does not extend the lifespan of the Bull contract and there is no new provision.

Within the overall support and maintenance arrangements, there is a process in place for users to bring problems to the attention of Bull and the Probation Unit via a Helpdesk. We keep the overall position, including priorities for action, under constant review. It would not be appropriate to list specific issues as these are commercial in confidence.

The existing version of CRAMS in use by Services is 4.6.1. There are no plans for further versions of CRAMS. However, outstanding user issues are considered for inclusion in planned maintenance releases of CRAMS. The next is being planned for late summer. This will be known as release 4.7.

Planned maintenance releases of CRAMS are quality assured and accepted before release. Release notes will accompany the release planned for late summer.

The Copernicus system is being designed to meet the future needs of Probation Service staff. It will replace CRAMS and be designed specifically to support National Standards and performance management.

Details of costs are commercial in confidence and, therefore, cannot be disclosed.

Blantyre House

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many day releases were authorised at HMP Blantyre House during 1999. [123639]

Mr. Boateng: The exact figure is not available, but it is estimated that there were approximately 16,000 day releases in connection with work and community placements. The available information is that there were 15,118 releases on temporary licence between 1 April 1999 and 31 March 2000. However, this figure includes authorised absences for periods of less than a whole day and also for longer periods, while for prisoners involved in work or community placements, a single licence may cover a number of daily absences.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners at HMP Blantyre House are on work and community placements. [123640]

Mr. Boateng: The numbers fluctuate slightly from day to day. On 23 May, there were 19 prisoners on community placements, five on work experience and 38 at work.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many assaults were registered at HMP Blantyre House in 1999. [123643]

Mr. Boateng: None.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reasons a search was authorised by the Prison Service at HMP Blantyre House on 5 May; how many staff were used on 5 May to search and secure HMP Blantyre House; what was the outcome of the search and if he will list those items found; what were the results of the drug tests on prisoners taken following the search; and if he will make a statement. [123644]

Mr. Boateng: The Director General of the Prison Service authorised the search in the light of intelligence suggesting that some prisoners on the working out scheme might be engaging in criminal activity.

Sixty-two officer grades (prison officers, senior officers and principal officers) from other establishments were involved in the operation. This included 28 officers in specialist control and restraint teams who were primarily on hand in case of any indiscipline on the part of prisoners. In the event, they were not required for this role and were redeployed to expedite the completion of the search.

The search made 98 finds of unauthorised articles, including cash to the value of £370, nine mobile telephones, 25 bank and credit cards and banks' books, a small quantity of illicit drugs, 12 cameras, two computers, two televisions, a set of building tools, seven examples of hard core pornography, tattooing equipment, computer disks, screwdrivers and blank visiting orders for Elmley prison.

Blantyre House carries out important resettlement work with long-term prisoners. I do not expect this operation to lead to any change in Blantyre House's ethos and role, but it was necessary to maintain the confidence in the establishment without which its valuable work could have been jeopardised.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the reconviction rate for prisoners discharged from HMP Blantyre House in the latest 12 months for which figures are available. [123641]

Mr. Boateng: The two-year reconviction rates for prisoners discharged from Her Majesty's Prison Blantyre House in 1995 was 20 per cent. The reconviction rate has been derived by analysing a stratified random sample of discharges from all prisons during the year; the sample contained just 12 offenders who were discharged from Blantyre House.

There is a selection criteria for inmates of Blantyre House which means that the reconviction rates for this prison are not directly comparable with reconviction rates for other prisons.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many drug tests were positive at HMP Blantyre House in 1999. [123642]

Mr. Boateng: The available information is for the 12 months to 31 March 2000. In this period, there were two positive drug tests at Blantyre House.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average population was at HMP Blantyre House in 1999. [123638]

Mr. Boateng: Provisional information shows that the average population at Blantyre House Prison in 1999 was recorded as 115 persons.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to publish the next HM Inspectorate of Prisons report on HMP Blantyre House; and if he will make statement. [123645]

Mr. Boateng: The last inspection of Blantyre House took place on 21–25 January this year. No publication date for the report has yet been set.

Under the protocol on the publication of inspection reports, the Prison Service is given the opportunity to check the report in draft for any factual inaccuracies. The Director General of the Prison Service is currently discussing a number of points from the draft with the Chief Inspector.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many senior staff have been removed from HMP Blantyre House since 4 May; and if he will make a statement. [123646]

Mr. Boateng: The governing governor, Eoin McLennan-Murray, was transferred to the post of deputy governor at Swaleside prison on 5 May. Another governor grade was also moved on detached duty to fill an essential specialist post elsewhere.

Reoffending Rates

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent research his Department has conducted into (a) short-term and (b) long-term reoffending rates for criminal offences; and if he will place copies of that research in the Library. [123862]

Mr. Boateng: Reconviction rates for offenders discharged from prison during 1995 and those sentenced to community penalties during 1995 were published in Home Office Statistical Bulletin issue 19/99 on 25 October 1999. Further information on reconviction rates for prisoners appears in chapter 9 of "Prison Statistics England and Wales 1998". Copies of both publications have been placed in the Library.

There are several ongoing research projects on offenders participating in various crime reduction programmes. Reconviction rates are used as one of the measures of success for many of these projects, which include evaluations of Welfare to Work and the effectiveness of probation programmes via the Pathfinder and other projects. Copies of the latest findings from these research projects will be placed in the Library upon completion.

Offences against Children

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) in the latest year for which figures are available, how many people were convicted of, and what was the (a) average prison and (b) maximum sentence received for, (i) offences against children listed in paragraphs one, two and three of Schedule 4 to the Criminal Justice and Court Services Bill, (ii) assault occasioning actual bodily harm committed against a child, contrary to the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 and (iii) unlawful supply of drugs to a child, contrary to the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971; [123863]

(2) how many persons were convicted in the last five years for which figures are available of (a) offences under section 54 of the Criminal Law Act 1977, (b) offences under section 1 of the Indecency with Children Act 1960, (c) offences under section 1 of the Protection of Children Act 1978, (d) offences under section 160 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 and (e) offences under the following provisions of the Sexual Offences Act 1956 committed against persons (i) under and (ii) over the age of 16 years (1) section 1 (rape), (2) section 5 (intercourse with a girl under 13), (3) section 6 (intercourse with a girl between 13 and 16), (4) section 10 (incest by a man), (5) section 11 (incest by a woman), (6) section 12 (buggery), (7) section 13 (gross indecency), (8) section 14 (indecent assault on a girl), (9) section 15 (indecent assault on a boy), (10) section 16 (assault with intent to commit buggery), (11) section 23 (procuration of girl under 21) and (12) section 28 (causing or encouraging prostitution of, intercourse with, or indecent assault on, girl under 16); and what was the average sentence (A) received and (B) served for each offence. [123600]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I will write to the hon. Member.

Kudlip Sander

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Government's response to the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in the case of Kudlip Sander. [123601]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The court's judgment, which was limited to the facts of this case, means that in future similar cases where the judge is aware of evidence of jury bias it may be necessary to discharge the jury to achieve a fair trial. The Judicial Studies Board, which includes training on equal treatment issues in its core training for judges, is currently considering the training implications of this judgment. Notices will also be placed in jury retiring rooms, reminding jurors of their duty to be impartial in trying the case.

Criminal Justice (Mode of Trial) Bill

Sir Nicholas Lyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe), of 2 March 2000, Official Report, column 377W, on the Criminal Justice (Mode of Trial) Bill, (1) what proportion of the total number of Crown Court defendants in either way cases is represented by the 14,000 defendants who would be tried in the magistrates courts, indicating (a) the total assumed number of such defendants, (b) the proportion of the total who are assumed to plead guilty, (c) the proportion of the total that are assumed to have been tried according to the evidence, (d) the proportion of the 14,000 assumed to have pleaded guilty in the Crown Court, (e) the proportion of the 14,000 assumed to have been fully tried in the Crown Court, (f) the proportion of those fully tried which it is assumed would have been convicted and (g) the average sentences which it is assumed those convicted would have received; [123856]

(2) of the 14,000 defendants assumed to have remained in the magistrates court, what proportion (a) would have pleaded guilty, (b) would have been fully tried and (c) would have been convicted; what is the average length of trial assumed in the magistrates court; what legal prosecution and defence costs are assumed in the cases of (i) plea of guilty and (ii) full trial; what proportion of those convicted are assumed to have received a custodial sentence and of what length; what profile of sentences of non-custodial sentence is assumed in relation to what proportion of the remainder; and on what basis assumptions as to the relevant length of sentence have been made; [123857]

(3) what average remand times have been assumed in respect of Crown Court cases, and magistrates court cases in relation to savings from shorter sentences; what profile of offences has been assumed and what average sentence has been assumed in relation to each such offence in the Crown Court and the magistrates court; and how many relevant previous convictions have been assumed in each case; [123858]

(4) how many separate hearings have been assumed in the Crown Court, and in the magistrates court, in relation to each case; [123860]

(5) what has been taken as the average length and costs of a contested trial in (a) the Crown Court and (b) the magistrates court; and what are the equivalent figures in each court in respect of cases where the defendant eventually pleads guilty. [123859]

Mr. Charles Clarke: In 1997, some 63,000 defendants were committed for trial at the Crown Court in either-way cases; 14,000 represents about 22 per cent. of that number. In 1998, the proportion of defendants pleading guilty to either-way offences in the Crown Court was 66 per cent., but, for costing purposes, our model assumes a higher guilty plea rate of 80 per cent., which has the effect of minimising the savings which might be expected from the reform. About 38 per cent. of defendants contesting either-way offences in the Crown Court were convicted, and a similar rate was assumed for costing purposes.

The savings for the Criminal Justice (Mode of Trial) (No.2) Bill were measured using the flows and costs model which was developed by the Home Office in collaboration with the Lord Chancellor's Department and Crown Prosecution Service to estimate the cost of initiatives in the criminal justice system. The costs are based on a theft and handling case in the Crown Court and an average indictable case in the magistrates courts. The particular assumptions made in relation to the 14,000 defendants who would be tried in the magistrates courts as a result of the Bill are given in the table:

Assumption
Remand time avoided	9 weeks
Timeous guilty plea rate	80 per cent.
Late guilty plea rate	10 per cent.
Not guilty plea rate	10 per cent.
Appeal against mode of trial decision	25 per cent.
Average sentence imposed at the Crown Court	10.9 months
Average sentence imposed in the magistrates courts	3.6 months
Custodial sentence rate in Crown Court	46.5 per cent.
Custodial sentence rate in the magistrates courts	22.5 per cent.

It has also been assumed that these cases involve no more and no fewer hearings then equivalent cases in their class and venue. There are a number of other variables, such as length of trial, which are not specifically included in the costing exercise but which were reflected in the costs and flows model. Assumptions have been made about remand time avoided rather than about average remand times. No information is available on the cost of proceedings and sentences by number of previous convictions.

The background to the costs and flows model is available on the internet at http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/rds/areas/econpf.htm

Animal Welfare (Circuses)

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received on the welfare of animals used in circuses. [122415]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: This year, the Home Office has received 50 letters about the welfare of circus animals from individual members of the public and Members of Parliament. There have been six Parliamentary Questions on the subject. In addition, over 1,500 pre-printed letters have been received as part of an Animal Defenders campaign connected with elephants in a particular circus. A large Animal Defenders petition to the House of Commons, seeking a ban on the use of animals in travelling circuses and the licensing of circus winter quarters, has also recently been passed to the Home Office. I met representatives of Animal Defenders and the Captive Animals Society on 31 January.

Terrorist Training

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make a statement about the activities of Al-Muhijiroon; [123661]

(2) what action he proposes to take in respect of the activities of Salina Security Services relating to British Islamic fundamentalists and firearms and explosives training in the United States; and if he will make a statement; [123666]

(3) if he will raise with the United States enforcement authorities the activities of Muhammed Jameel and Salina Security Services; and if he will make a statement; [123664]

(4) if he will make a statement about links between Sheikh Omar Bakri Mohammed, Sheikh Abu Hamza and Salina Security Services run by Muhammed Jameel; and if he will make a statement; [123663]

(5) if he will make a statement about the Internet advertisement, The Ultimate Jihad Challenge. [123665]

Mr. Straw: I have seen the recent report about alleged terrorist training of United Kingdom nationals overseas. The investigation of any illegal criminal activity is, of course, a matter for the police. I understand that they are aware of these latest allegations and are looking into them. The police meet with their United States counterparts on a regular basis to discuss matters relating to terrorism.

Criminal Justice and Court Services Bill

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the average cost to public funds of a drug abstinence order made under part III of the Criminal Justice and Court Services Bill; what estimate he has made of the number of orders that will be made annually; what estimate he has made of the number of other community orders that will include drug abstinence requirements; if magistrates courts will be able to make such an order; and if he will make a statement. [115823]

Mr. Straw [pursuant to his reply, 22 March 2000, c. 560W]: In referring to piloting the Drug Abstinence Order and Drug Abstinence Requirement, the correct estimate of numbers receiving either, should have been 225 each year. The figure of 3,500 offenders, included in my reply, is the estimate for national roll-out.

Institutional Racism

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the extent to which (a) his Department and (b) other Government Departments, non-departmental public bodies and executive agencies are institutionally racist; what criteria he uses to define institutional racism; and if he will make a statement. [121996]

Mr. Straw [pursuant to his reply, 12 May 2000, c. 519W]: The information contained in the third paragraph was incorrect. That paragraph of the reply should have read:

> The Government are determined that the public sector should lead on race equality. The legislation currently going through Parliament will, when enacted, outlaw discrimination in public functions not currently covered by the Race Relations Act 1976, place a positive duty on all public authorities to promote race equality, and prove a key lever in tackling institutional racism.

Pensions (Part-timers)

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the maximum and minimum cost to police and fire service pension funds of the European Court of Justice's ruling on pensions for part-timers. [123265]

Mr. Rooker: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to my Written Answer on 23 May 2000, Official Report, column 484W.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Serious Fraud Office

33. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Solicitor-General how many prosecutions were pursued by the Serious Fraud Office in 1997 and 1998; what percentage of those resulted in convictions; and if he will make a statement. [122435]

The Solicitor-General: In the year 1997–98 the Serious Fraud Office obtained 37 convictions from the 39 defendants tried, a conviction rate of 94.9 per cent. In 1998–99, it obtained 34 convictions from the 42 defendants tried, a conviction rate of 81.0 per cent.

CPS

34. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Solicitor-General what steps are being taken following the recent stress survey to ensure that the views of Crown Prosecution Service staff at all levels are taken into account as the reforms of the Crown Prosecution Service are implemented. [122436]

The Solicitor-General: CPS staff are being consulted on the findings of the staff survey and stress audit. An action plan is being drawn up by a steering group which includes Area staff and representatives of the main departmental trades unions. The action plan will be presented to the CPS Board shortly. The network of Area Sounding Boards will provide feedback from staff at all levels on the results of the survey and audit as well as on the wider reform programme. As I explained to my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman) on 13 January 2000, Official Report, columns 420–21, the CPS has an extensive consultation programme in place which provides regular feedback from staff on progress with the reforms.

Travellers

35. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Solicitor-General if he will make a statement on the Government's policy concerning the prosecution of offences arising from travellers' trespassing. [122437]

The Solicitor-General: The principles applied by the Crown Prosecution in relation to offences involving travellers trespassing, as with any other offence, are governed by the Code for Crown Prosecutors. In order to prosecute, a Crown Prosecutor must be satisfied that the evidential and public interest tests set out in the Code are met.

UK/Scotland Liaison

36. Mr. David Heath: To ask the Solicitor-General what arrangements he has for consultation with the Advocate-General before providing advice to the Government on matters which may affect both UK and Scottish legislation. [122439]

The Solicitor-General: The Attorney-General, Advocate-General and I consult frequently on matters of mutual interest, such as matters which may affect legislation both in Scotland and England.

Laptops

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Solicitor-General how many laptop computers used by Ministers, officials and special advisers in his Department have been (a) lost and (b) stolen since May 1997. [123740]

The Solicitor-General: No laptop computers used by Ministers, officials and special advisers in my Department have been either lost or stolen since May 1997.

Mr. Bernard Griffin

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Solicitor-General for what reason the Northern Ireland Director of Public Prosecutions dropped charges against Mr. Bernard Griffin. [123561]

The Solicitor-General: The Department of the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland issued a direction of no prosecution in relation to charges brought against Mr. Griffin and his brother Mr. Kenneth Griffin because it was concluded that notwithstanding the provisions of section 13 of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996 there was insufficient evidence to afford a reasonable prospect of conviction of either person for those offences.

The Department wrote to the solicitors acting for Mr. Griffin and his brother giving the reasons for the decision in general terms on 19 January 2000. Following a request for detailed reasons, the Department provided further information explaining the decision on 12 May 2000.

Road Accidents (Prosecutions)

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Solicitor-General how many drivers were prosecuted in the last five years for which figures are available in relation to fatal road accidents involving cyclists; and with what offences they were charged. [123588]

The Solicitor-General: The Crown Prosecution Service holds no central records in respect of specific offences. The information is held on individual case files and could only be obtained by examining every relevant file in each CPS office. The cost of this exercise would be prohibitive.

WALES

Opinion Research

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will place copies of the results of all market and opinion research carried out by his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies since May 1997, in the Library. [123816]

Mr. Paul Murphy: For the former Welsh Office for the period from May 1997 to the end of June 1999, this information could be provided only at disproportionate cost, as explained in the reply to the hon. Member's previous question on 6 July 1999, Official Report, column 505W.

The Wales Office does not have any agencies or non-departmental public bodies, and has not carried out any market or opinion research since it was established on 1 July 1999.

Laptops

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many laptop computers used by Ministers, officials and special advisers in his Department have been (a) lost and (b) stolen since May 1997. [123746]

Mr. Paul Murphy: From May 1997 to 30 June the Welsh Office had (a) no recorded cases of lost laptop computers and (b) two reported thefts of laptop computers.

From 1 July 1999 to date, the Wales Office has not recorded any cases of either lost or stolen laptop computers.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

GM Crops

Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what advice the Commissioners have received about the growing of GM crops on their land; how they intend to monitor the result of the current round of trials; and if he will make a statement. [123048]

Mr. Stuart Bell: Following extensive study and wide consultation, the Church of England's Ethical Investment Advisory group has recommended to the Commissioners that new agricultural tenancies should contain a clause restricting the use of genetically modified seeds. Therefore genetically modified seed could only be grown on church land with the express consent of the Church Commissioners. The Commissioners have considered and accepted this advice. Currently no GMO crop trials are taking place on Church land.

The Advisory Group is currently establishing a process to monitor the GMO crop trials programme in collaboration with government agencies and respected plant science organisations. The Commissioners will therefore continue to receive expert advice as the GMO testing trials proceeds.

The Ethical Investment Advisory's Group guidance is published in full and is available on request and on the Church of England's website at www.cofe.anglican.org. I am also arranging for a copy to be placed in the House of Commons Library.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Laptops

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many laptop computers used by Ministers, officials and special advisers in her Department have been (a) lost and (b) stolen since May 1997. [123739]

Clare Short: (a) No laptops have been lost.

(b) Since May 1997, eight laptop computers have been stolen from DFID. Seven of these computers were stolen from DFID premises, and one from a car belonging to a member of staff.

The breakdown of these thefts by year is as follows:

1997: Three unallocated laptops were stolen from Abercrombie House.

1998: Two unallocated laptops stolen from 94 Victoria Street.

1999: One laptop stolen from an adviser in 94VS.

2000: One new, but unissued laptop stolen from 94VS.

One laptop was stolen from an AH official's car.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many (a) cars and (b) commercial vehicles operated by her Department were manufactured (i) in the UK, (ii) in the EU and (iii) elsewhere. [122266]

Clare Short: My Department makes use of three official cars supplied by the Government Car and Despatch Agency. All three are manufactured in the EU.

Street Children

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what were the total UK bilateral aid contributions for street children in (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999; and if she will provide a breakdown by country and region. [123290]

Clare Short: Our development support for street children includes programmes in Brazil, Ecuador, Kenya, South Africa, Russia, Bangladesh, India, Tanzania, Zambia, Uzbekistan, Kardistan. In addition to country specific initiatives, we support organisations with programmes for street children in a large number of countries. These include the Consortium for Street Children, UNICEF and the International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour of the ILO.

Much of our work in support of street children is done in the context of broader based activities, and it is therefore not possible to provide specific figures for work in this particular area.

CABINET OFFICE

COI Targets

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what performance targets she has set out for the Central Office for Information for 2000–01. [124338]

Mr. Ian McCartney: I have set the following key performance targets for the Central Office of Information for 2000–01.

Financial

1. To achieve break even on an accruals basis.

Efficiency

2. To achieve a unit cost reduction of 2 per cent.

Quality of service:

To obtain the following results from customer satisfaction feedback:

(a) an overall customer satisfaction score of at least 8.25 (out of 10);

(b) at least 96 per cent. of returns to score 6 or more;

(c) a 5 per cent. increase in the response rate (from 54 per cent. to 56.7 per cent.).

Pensions (Part-timers)

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what estimate he has made of the minimum and maximum cost to the Civil Service Pension Fund of the European Court of Justice's ruling on pensions for part-timers. [123264]

Mr. Rooker: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to my Written Answer on 23 May 2000, Official Report, column 484W.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Fur Farming (Prohibition) Bill

9. Mr. Love: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received concerning the Fur Farming (Prohibition) Bill. [122409]

Mr. Morley: In excess of 2,500 representations have been received about the Bill. All but a few have been from members of the public and animal welfare organisations supporting the banning of fur farming.

Global Warming

11. Shona McIsaac: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent assessment he has made of the threat of global climate change to low-lying areas of the UK. [122412]

Mr. Morley: Low lying areas are already at risk from flooding and depend on flood and coastal defences. They could be at increased risk through climate change. We need to respond to this challenge primarily by ensuing that, where necessary and appropriate, existing defences are replaced and upgraded.

Fishing

12. Mr. Michael Jabez Foster: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to combat the illegal landing of fish in the UK. [122413]

Mr. Morley: As I have made clear on previous occasions, the conservation of fish stocks is essential for the long-term future of the fishing industry, and all concerned—fishermen, merchants and processors—have a key part to play in preventing the trade in blackfish. This Government have not flinched from taking tough measures to curb such activity whether at the national level or through the Community.

Pet Travel Scheme

13. Mr. McCabe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the implementation of the pet travel scheme. [122414]

Ms Quin: The Pet Travel Scheme has been a radical and welcome change for pet owners throughout Britain and Western Europe. It allows pet cats and dogs to enter the UK without quarantine for the first time in decades without increasing the risk of importing rabies. Over the first 11 weeks of the scheme, 2,243 pets have entered the UK without having to go into quarantine.

EU Enlargement

14. Mr. MacShane: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to reform the common agricultural policy with a view to EU enlargement. [122416]

Ms Quin: We are pursuing opportunities created by anticipated market pressures, the reviews contained within the Agenda 2000 agreement and the existing commitment to review the sugar regime by 2001 to push for the reform process started at Berlin to be completed. Such an outcome would facilitate enlargement.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what estimates he has made of the cost to the existing members of the EU of accepting into the Common Agricultural Policy (a) Poland, (b) Hungary, (c) the Czech Republic, (d) Estonia, (e) Malta, (f) Cyprus, (g) Slovakia, (h) Bulgaria, (i) Romania, (j) Slovenia, (k) Latvia, (l) Lithuania and (m) Turkey; [122962]

(2) what the Government's policy is on the funding of the additional costs involved in accepting (a) Poland, (b) Hungary and (c) the Czech Republic into the Common Agricultural Policy. [122963]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The Financial Perspective for 2000–06 agreed at the Berlin Council in March 1999 set aside around 12.5 billion euro at 1999 prices to finance the CAP for up to six new member states over the period 2002–06. The Government's aim is to ensure that this ceiling is not breached.

Farming Business Advice

15. Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he is taking to provide business advice to farmers. [122417]

Mr. Nick Brown: Under the Action Plan for Farming announced on 30 March, farmers in England will benefit from business advice worth in excess of £8.5 million in the current financial year. Additional support will also be provided for farmers involved with diversification projects under the England Rural Development Plan.

21. Mrs. Dean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps his Department is taking to help farmers in marketing and product development. [122423]

Ms Quin: We have a range of measures to help farmers improve their marketing and better meet the needs of consumers. These include the Agricultural Development Scheme, which is currently open for applications, and new schemes under the England Rural Development Plan, which will be introduced in the summer, subject to clearance by the European Commission.

Exports

16. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the value of food and drink exports from the UK to the European Union in the past three years. [122418]

Mr. Nick Brown: UK exports of food and drink products to the European Union have exceeded £5 billion in each of the last three years.

Organic Farming

17. Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what forecasts his Ministry has made for the economic prospects of the organic farming sector over the coming year. [122419]

Mr. Morley: Estimates made by the organic sector itself indicate the size of the retail market for organic food to have been just short of £400 million in 1998–99 and project its growth to £1,500 million by 2002–03.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many farms (a) with registered organic status and (b) in the process of conversion to organic status are likely to lose that status due to the presence of genetically modified crops nearby in the next year. [123076]

Mr. Morley: We understand that no organic farmer is currently facing deregistration because of proximity to a GM crop. However, the organic inspection bodies' investigations are not yet complete.

Countryside Stewardship Scheme

18. Helen Jackson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to expand the countryside stewardship scheme. [122420]

Mr. Morley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow) on 13 January 2000, Official Report, column 239W.

I announced plans for a major expansion of the Countryside Stewardship Scheme on 7 December. Over the next seven years, spending on agri-environment schemes will double. Of the £1 billion to be allocated during this period to these schemes, £500 million will be for the Countryside Stewardship Scheme. The extra money will bring the total budget in 2000–01 to over £35 million, rising to £126 million in 2006–07. Initial predictions are that when this year's application round closes on 31 May, we shall be able to accept around 3,000 new agreements, more than double the number in 1999.

Agenda 2000

19. Helen Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the impact on food prices of the Agenda 2000 reform of the common agricultural policy. [122421]

Ms Quin: Once the reform has been fully implemented, and provided price reductions are passed on in full to retail, food retail prices will be 2 per cent. lower than otherwise, equivalent to 0.25 per cent. off the All Items Retail Prices Index.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the benefit to livestock farming of the Agenda 2000 reforms of the CAP. [122406]

Ms Quin: Agenda 2000 represents a very good deal for our producers. We forecast that, compared with the position in the absence of Agenda 2000, incomes on cattle and sheep farms will increase once all the reforms are implemented.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from his counterparts in non-EU OECD nations in regard to the outcome of the Agenda 2000 negotiations on CAP reform, stating for each nation the nature of its reaction. [122959]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 22 May 2000]: Since the adoption by the European Union of the Agenda 2000 CAP reforms I have met Ministers from Australia, New Zealand and the USA. They were generally supportive of the direction of CAP reform achieved in Agenda 2000 but would have preferred it to have gone further.

Common Agricultural Policy

20. Dr. George Turner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the Government's priorities for further reform of the common agricultural policy on modulation issues. [122422]

Mr. Nick Brown: The Agenda 2000 agreement takes us a significant step closer to securing a more competitive and sustainable industry with a stronger market orientation. It lays down the foundation for a new European agricultural and rural development framework in which lower levels of direct support for agricultural production will be complemented by higher levels of targeted assistance for sustainable rural development. The UK is implementing modulation to bring about a limited shift from production support towards rural development measures within this framework.

We continue to press for the reform process started at Berlin to be completed.

Dairy Industry

22. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what current proposals he has to assist the dairy industry; and if he will make a statement. [122424]

Ms Quin: The Action Plan for farming announced on 30 March indicated that we would be paying around £22 million in agri-monetary compensation to dairy farmers this year. It also included the removal of dairy hygiene inspection charges in England. Dairy farmers will also benefit from the lifting of the maximum weight limit on payments under the over-thirty-months scheme from 5 June. In addition my right hon. Friend the Minister announced last autumn the deferral of cattle passport charges worth some £12 million in total to dairy farmers.

Common Fisheries Policy

23. Dr. Godman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list his main objectives for the review of the Common Fisheries Policy due to take place in 2002. [122425]

Mr. Morley: The Government wish to maintain key features of the present arrangements such as national quotas based on relative stability and access restrictions within national 6/12 mile limits. At the same time, we want to secure improvements to the Common Fisheries Policy including enhancing the regional dimension and integrating environmental considerations more fully.

24. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will assess the effectiveness for the conservation of fish stocks of the European Common Fisheries Policy. [122426]

Mr. Morley: The Government believe that improvements are needed in the Common Fisheries Policy to make it a more effective instrument for conserving fish stocks.

25. Mrs. Humble: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he is taking to secure a greater regional dimension to the common fisheries policy. [122427]

Mr. Morley: The Irish Sea cod recovery programme demonstrates the benefits of a regional approach which involves fishermen directly in developing fisheries management measures affecting them. We were instrumental in securing Commission and Council agreement to this. It indicates the direction in which we want the Common Fisheries Policy to develop.

Rural Development Plan

26. Mr. David Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what evaluation he has made of the effect on farm incomes of the rural development plan for England. [122428]

Ms Quin: The impact of the Plan on farmers is described in section 7 of the England Rural Development Plan, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Animal Welfare

27. Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the implications for animal welfare of further liberalisation of trade in agricultural products. [122429]

Ms Quin: The Government's objective is to achieve agricultural trade liberalisation alongside reductions in production-related support. The relationship with farm animal welfare is complex and varies within and between sectors. However, the guiding principle is that liberalisation should be achieved in a way which takes account of animal welfare along with other non-trade concerns.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what evaluation the Government have made of the use of the Green Box of the World Trade Organisation Agriculture Agreement to compensate farmers for the extra costs of Britain's animal welfare standards. [122991]

Mr. Nick Brown: The Government are pressing for the relationship between farm animal welfare standards and trade rules to be addressed in the World Trade Organisation (WTO). One of these ideas we are currently examining is permitting payments made to offset additional costs associated with farm animal welfare requirements to be included in the "Green Box" under the WTO Agreement on Agriculture. The effect of this would be that any such payments were not included in the aggregate measure of domestic support which is subject to reduction commitments.

EU Farming Regulations

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with his European colleagues about ensuring uniformity of farming regulations across Europe. [122407]

Ms Quin: The Minister and I regularly meet colleagues from the other member states and the European Commission to discuss agricultural legislation. We are committed to the proper implementation of European legislation but also aware of the burdens that regulation can place on farmers. The recent Action Plan for Farming reaffirmed that we will avoid all gold plating of legislation.

Apiculture

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 16 March 2000, Official Report, column 311W, what steps he has taken to ensure beekeepers take appropriate measures to contain varroa in the current season. [122411]

Mr. Morley: In the UK, the Government fund a range of measures costing around £1.5 million annually. The National Bee Unit, in England, provides a free diagnostic and inspection service for the beekeeping industry, and training and guidance for beekeepers.

Sugar

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his oral statement of 11 May 2000, Official Report, column 1027, what the Government's policy is on the appropriate level of support for sugar. [122965]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The Government's view is that the EU sugar regime needs to be reformed and simplified. This was also the view of the previous Administration.

Agri-monetary Compensation

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food from what date agri-monetary compensation has been available to the Government; and what was the maximum amount of agri-monetary compensation available to Britain in each year of the system's existence. [122970]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The UK has been eligible for agri-monetary compensation since 1997. The following amounts became available (in three year degressive packages) in each year:

	£ million
1997	1,036
1998	248
1999	579
2000[1]	291

[1] To date

Hedgerows

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his statement of 11 May 2000, Official Report, column 1036, concerning hedgerows, if the European Commission has abandoned plans to re-interpret IACS rules in a way that would penalise farmers for maintaining hedgerows over a given width. [122992]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The European Commission has accepted that we should continue for this year to apply our existing rules and practices for measuring field margins. As regards 2001 and subsequent years, MAFF officials are continuing to work with the Commission Services to clarify what types of margins will be acceptable for inclusion in aid claims.

Over 30-Months Scheme

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what the level of expenditure on the Over-30-Months scheme was in each year since its introduction; what the expected level of expenditure is in the current year and in each of the next five years; and, for each annual figure, how much is contributed from (a) UK funds and (b) EU funds. [122994]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The information is as follows:

£ million

Year	Expenditure	Contributed from UK funds	Contributed from EU funds
1996–97	858	389	469
1997–98	432	230	202
1998–99	380	195	185
1999–2000[1]	394	208	186
Current forecasts:
2000–01	329	176	153
2001–02	329	176	153

[1] Provisional

The forecasts through to 2001–02 are set out in the MAFF/IB Departmental Report 2000. As part of Spending Review 2000 these forecasts together with forecasts for 2002–03 and 2003–04 are being reviewed. They will be announced as part of the SR2000 settlement in the summer.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if a request was made by the Government to discuss the lifting of the Over-30-months scheme weight limit at (a) the first and (b) the second Beef Management Committee meetings in April. [121429]

Mr. Nick Brown: Officials wrote to the Services of the European Commission on 5 April asking them to make a proposal to the Beef Management Committee on 14 April to remove the weight limit on payments of Over-30-months scheme cattle. The Commission were unable to prepare a proposal in time for submission to that meeting, and there was no second meeting of the Management Committee in April. A proposal to remove the weight limit was agreed at the Beef Management Committee on 12 May.

Farm Waste Grant Scheme

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answers of 18 April 2000, Official Report, column 333W and 5 May 2000, Official Report, column 245–46W, concerning the Farm Waste Grant Scheme, if he will reconcile the figures for expenditure on the Scheme in 2001–02 given in the two answers. [123017]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The figure which I gave to the hon. Member on 17 April, on the aid measures in respect of the Farm Waste Grant Scheme announced as part of the Action Plan for Farming, represents the new funding which will be made available in 2001–02. The figure, which I gave him on 5 May, is the total amount, which will be available to farmers under this Scheme from 2001–02, including the current provision.

Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many staff from his Department were seconded to private sector companies in (a) May 1997 to April 1998, (b) May 1998 to April 1999 and (c) May 1999 to April 2000; and if he will list in each case the companies to which staff were sent, the names and ranks of the staff involved and the duration of the secondment. [123421]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 24 May 2000]: Secondments and attachments are part of the Interchange Initiative which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. All sectors of the economy are involved: Voluntary, Education, Health, Public and Private. Interchange is a key component of the reform agenda. The Modernising Government White Paper committed us to increasing interchange, in particular by bringing in more people on secondment and sending more of our people out.

The information requested in the question subparts:

(a) For the period May 1997 to April 1998 two staff were involved in secondments to:

Coopers and Lybrand, Grade 7 (3 November 1997 to 3 September 1998)

Capita/RAS, Grade 7 (10 November 1997 to 5 February 2000)

(b) For the period May 1998 to April 1999 two staff were involved in secondments to:

Alternative Crops Technology Information Network, HSO (1 June 1998 to 30 November 1999)

Capita/RAS, Grade 7 (15 September 1998 to 30 September 2000); Grade 7 (10 March 1999 to 9 July 2000)

(c) For the period May 1999 to April 2000 see (b).

Websites

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what his Department's policy is on (a) advertising and (b) acknowledging company sponsorship on the websites of his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies; which companies (i) have placed advertisements and (ii) are acknowledged as sponsors on those websites; how much revenue has been received for each financial year since 1997 from such advertisements and sponsorship; and if that revenue has been retained within the budget of his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies. [119551]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 19 May 2000]: As far as core MAFF, its agencies and non-departmental public bodies are concerned, the current position is that there is no commercial advertising or sponsorship on websites.

The acceptance of advertising and the acknowledgement of sponsors by MAFF Non-Departmental public bodies are matters for the discretion of the Accounting Officer of the Non-Departmental public body concerned.

The British Potato Council and the Home Grown Cereals Authority both acknowledge their IT consultants as suppliers. No revenue is received.

The Royal Botanic Gardens, Kew acknowledges on its website the following companies, including Trusts and Foundations, who have supported the Millennium Seed Bank Project: Millennium Commission, Wellcome Trust, Orange plc, The Esmee Fairburn Charitable Trust, Glaxo Wellcome plc, The Maurice Laing Foundation, The Rufford Foundation, Tate and Lyle plc and the Philecology Trust. The total revenue received from sponsors since 1997 is as follows.

Year	£000	$000
1996–97	1,075	0
1997–98	2,355	13
1998–99	5,569	100

The revenue received has been retained to spend on the Millennium Seed Bank Project.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 350

SESSION 1999–2000

15th May—25th May 2000

Printed indexes to Hansard

The volume index is one of three printed indexes to Commons Hansard produced from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Indexing Service (POLIS). It contains references to material in the bound volumes of Hansard. The other indexes produced are:

- The fortnightly index to Hansard. This covers the same date range as the volume index but references are to the column numbering in the daily parts and weekly edition of Hansard.
- The sessional index to Hansard. This contains references to material in the bound volumes for a whole session.

Indexes on the Parliamentary website

Fortnightly, volume and sessional indexes covering material from the beginning of the 1999/2000 session will also appear on the Parliamentary website at http://www.parliament.uk with links to the full text of Hansard.

SCOPE

The indexes include entries covering:

- The content of all material recorded in Hansard, including debates, procedural motions and questions.
- The names of all Members contributing to the Parliamentary business recorded in Hansard.
- The names of some types of Parliamentary business whenever they occur in Hansard. These are 'Ministerial statements', 'Business statements', 'Opposition days' and 'Estimates days'.

ARRANGEMENT

- All headings are in one word-by-word alphabetical sequence, with Members' contribution entries distinguished from other entries by italics.
- Where a Member contributes to Parliamentary business and is the subject of Parliamentary business there are separate contribution and subject entries, the subject entry coming first.
- Entries beginning 'Mac' and 'Mc' are sorted in one sequence as 'Mac'.
- 'St', when abbreviated for Saint, is filed as 'Saint'.
- Numbers are filed as if spelt out, e.g. '10 Downing Street' as if 'Ten Downing Street'.

HEADINGS

Choice of headings

- Specificity—Entries summarise the overall content of a debate or question as specifically as the various POLIS thesauruses allow. For example, Education, Higher education, Universities or the name of a particular university is used depending on the breadth of the item.
- Name headings—Specific entries are included for the names of people, places, institutions, organisations, committees, programmes, initiatives, publications and legislation when these constitute the overall subject of an item.
- Organisations and subjects—Organisation entries are preferred for material about the general performance, administration and staffing of an organisation (for example, United Kingdom Passports Agency, Standards). Subject entries are preferred for what organisations do as part of their duties (for example, Passports, Fees and charges).

Geographical coverage

- Subject headings—Subject headings are assumed to refer to the whole of England, Great Britain or the United Kingdom unless otherwise stated.
- Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales—Material relating to the whole of Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales is indexed under these headings.
- Places within the UK—Material about specific towns, areas and institutions is entered under the name of the specific town, area or institution.
- Foreign countries—Most material relating to foreign countries is collected under the name of that country. Some additional material may be found under the names of—groups of countries, areas within countries, geographical features, place names associated with particular issues, politicians and heads of state, international bodies, and institutions and companies operating in those countries.
- EC/EU material—General material about the European Communities and European institutions as bodies is entered under 'European Communities' and 'EC institutions'. Organisational material about specific communities and institutions is entered under the name of the body, for example 'European Coal and Steel Community' or 'European Parliament'. Material about what the Communities and institutions are doing or propose to do is entered under various subject headings beginning 'EC' such as 'EC environmental policy'.

Parliamentary material and business

- Material about Parliament—This is indexed under 'Parliament', the names of the two Houses, the 'Palace of Westminster' and parts of the Parliamentary estate (such as 'Portcullis House').
- Committees—Material about committees is indexed under 'Committees', types of committee (such as 'Select committees') and the names of individual committees (such as 'Home Affairs Select Committee').
- Parliamentary proceedings/procedures—Material discussing these is indexed under the specific type of proceeding (such as 'Parliamentary questions' or 'Oral questions'), procedure (such as 'Calling of Members') or issue (such as 'Unparliamentary expressions').
- Legislation—Entries for Parliamentary proceedings on bills and statutory instruments are entered under their titles. Where the lead word of the bill or statutory instrument does not provide a full or clear indication of the subject there are additional subject entries when the bill or instrument is debated. For example, debates on the 'Child Support Pensions and Social Security Bill' have entries under 'Pensions' and 'Social security benefits' as well as under the title of the Bill.
- Members' names—These are given in the form by which the Member prefers to be known.
- Speaker and Chair—Contributions by the Speaker and deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speaker and deputies'. Contributions from the chair during Committees of the Whole House are brought together under 'Chairman of Committee of the Whole House'. Significant rulings and statements (as opposed to routine comments) are indicated by the sub-heading 'Rulings and statements' in both cases.

Guidance on headings

- Cross references—'See' references indicate all the material has been entered under another heading. 'See also' references indicate that additional information may be found under another heading.
- Concept thesaurus—A copy of the subject thesaurus to POLIS, listing the concept entries used in the index, is available on the Parliamentary website. A hard copy is available from the Head of the POLIS Unit, House of Commons Library, 1 Derby Gate, London, SW1A 2DG (020 7219 6456).

REFERENCES

- References in the indexes are to columns rather than pages.
- References to debates, but not questions, are accompanied by the date of the item.
- There are separate sequences in Hansard for the material taken on the floor of the House, Westminster Hall sittings and written questions:
  - References consisting of a number by itself indicate material taken on the floor of the House.
  - References ending in 'wh' indicate Westminster Hall sittings.
  - References ending in 'w' indicate written questions.
- References under all headings except the names of Members contributing to Parliamentary business and the titles of legislation are listed in one numerical sequence irrespective of whether the material is taken on the floor of the House, is discussed at a Westminster Hall sitting or is a written question.
- References under the names of Members contributing to Parliamentary business and the titles of legislation are listed in numerical sequence under the following headings:
  - Debates etc. (which includes interventions and points of order as well as significant contributions to debates);
  - Sittings in Westminster Hall (covering all debates held as part of the Westminster Hall sittings); and
  - Questions (which includes written, oral and private notice questions).
